Essential Wisdom from a Master

“Your sleep is deep, and it has to be shattered.”

“Only a consistent hammering will be able to break it.”

“A Master is needed to hammer.”

“I have to hit your head with a hammer;

otherwise you are not going to wake up.”

“It is a long, arduous process; much hammering is needed on your head.”

“One has to go on hammering with meditation.”

The present volume has come about fortuitously, as a by-product of the editor's spiritual search.

The content has been compiled and revised over a period of several years. The gist of it draws on Osho satsangs from the early 70s up to the three-and-a-half-year silent period (1981-1985).

Although most of the content reflects the original transcript sources literally, some (minor) editorial rearrangements and reformulations have been in order for the purpose of synthesis and readability.

For literal quotations, please refer to the source transcripts exclusively.

In Deep Gratitude to the Master;

Life, Love and Laughter to all fellow travelers.

Truth cannot be said, but one cannot be silent about it either.

Truth cannot be said, because words are inadequate.

You cannot be silent about it either, because silence also is inadequate.

Truth is neither in words, nor in silence.

Truth is a transcendence, a transcendence of duality.

How to give people a taste of meditation was my basic reason to speak, so I can go on speaking eternally – it does not matter what I am saying. All that matters is that I give you a few chances to be silent, which you find difficult on your own in the beginning.

These discourses are the foundation of your meditation.

I am making you aware of the silence without any effort on your part. My speaking is for the first time being used as a strategy to create silence in you.

I don't speak to teach something; I speak to create something. These are not lectures; these are simply a device for you to become silent, because if you are told to become silent without making any effort, you will find great difficulty.

I don't have any doctrine; my talking is really a process of de-hypnosis. Just listening to me, slowly, slowly, you will be free of all the programs that society has forced you to believe in.

These questions and answers are really just a game to help you to get rid of words, thoughts... Silence is the question. Silence is the answer. Silence is the ultimate truth. In silence, we meet with existence.

These are not ordinary discourses or talks. I am not interested in any philosophy or any political ideology. I am interested in directly transforming you.

Not knowing oneself hurts; it is a wound. Not knowing oneself makes the whole life meaningless. You may know everything; only you do not know yourself – and that was the first thing to know.

Whatsoever you call love is a frenzy, a fever, a sort of chemical neurosis; it is not love. How can you love? Love happens only as a shadow to meditation. When you have become so alert, there arises a new quality – that is love.

With me, everything is a hypothesis. If you trust me only this much, that you are ready to explore, enquire – that will do. I have no doctrines to teach you, but only methods to find out the truth by yourself. Any truth that is not found by you is not truth. Truth is truth only when you have found it. That is an essential quality of the truth, that it has been found by you, that it is authentically yours, that you can say on your own authority that it is so.

There is a tremendous difference between dropping out and escapism. Escaping is an act of cowardliness, because you could not face the situation. You could not find guts enough to encounter whatever was the situation. You escaped. You showed your back out of fear. The escapist will never be able to forgive himself, that he has been behaving cowardly. The dropout is a different phenomenon. He is not dropping out of a particular structure, society, religion, out of fear. His dropout is a declaration of freedom, individuality. His dropout signifies that he is no more part of a crowd, that now he is going to seek and search on his own, that he is no longer a follower. Now he is becoming a seeker, a searcher, whatever the consequences; he is getting ready to risk everything he has. Because unless one risks everything, one cannot find the truth. Truth is not a compromise. It is a total let-go, risking all. Even if you are saving a little bit, in case it is needed, you will not find the truth. You are still behaving cowardly. Saving a little bit shows your fear. A dropout has to be total. It is not out of fear, it is out of awareness, a certain consciousness that we are living in a bondage of many kinds – social, cultural, racial, political, educational. All kinds of chains are around our being. A dropout simply drops out of all these chains. And the moment he decides to drop out, miraculously he finds those chains cannot prevent him. All that was needed was courage, and a tremendous sense of freedom, excitement of discovery, a grounding into one's own self, a responsibility for the first time felt that I am alive and I have a responsibility to live with my totality. Otherwise, how am I going to answer existence, that life was given to you, and you never lived it? You went on postponing till death destroys everything. A dropout is a revolutionary. The escapist is not a revolutionary; he is a reactionary. That difference has to be remembered.

Enlightenment is not pleasure. Pleasure is always something opposed to pain. It is never separate from pain. So pain can become pleasure, and pleasure can become pain. (…) One thing has to be understood: enlightenment is not pleasure, because it can never become pain. There is nothing opposite to enlightenment. The unenlightened state is not the opposite of enlightenment; it is simply the absence of enlightenment. The unenlightened person is simply asleep; the enlightened person is awake. There is no opposition. Enlightenment is the transcendence of all dualities: pleasure/pain, love/hate, life/death.

Enlightenment is the situation where you have come to a point of witnessing all the opposites as complementaries, and you are only a witness. So I cannot say, it is pleasure; I can say, it is bliss.

The more comfortable you are, the more luxuriously you live, the more richness in all the dimensions of life, the more is the possibility for you to become aware of one thing: that you have everything, but you don't have yourself; that you are surrounded by all the luxuries, there is nothing more to be added to it, but who are you? Living in a palace, but what the hell you are doing here? The question is bound to happen. The poor man cannot ask it. He is looking for bread; he is looking for his children's medicine, he has no house – do you think he will start enquiring about his interiority, about truth, about the meaning of life? It is impossible for a poor man to be religious. Only the rich man has the opportunity to enquire beyond the mundane things. (…) If you don't feel any material need, all material needs are fulfilled, then what you are going to do? There is nothing else than meditation. That is the only door that is left still open. All other doors you have knocked and seen there is nothing. Only one door is still open, inviting. And not anybody who has reached the center of his being was disappointed, felt meaningless, was miserable, committed suicide – not a single exception. That's why I say, meditation is a scientific method.

One of the most important things to be understood about man is that man is asleep. Even while he thinks he is awake, he is not. His wakefulness is very fragile; his wakefulness is so tiny it does not matter at all.

You sleep in the night; you sleep in the day. From birth to death, you go on changing your patterns of sleep, but you never really awaken. (…) You are dreaming, day in, day out. You are dreaming sometimes with open eyes and sometimes with closed eyes, but you are dreaming – your are a dream. You are not yet a reality.

Of course in a dream, whatsoever you do is meaningless. Whatsoever you think is pointless; whatsoever you project remains part of your dreams and never allows you to see that which is. Hence all the Buddhas have insisted on only one thing: Awaken! Continuously, for centuries, their whole teaching can be contained in a single phrase: Be awake. And they have been devising methods, strategies; they have been creating contexts and spaces and energy fields in which you can be shocked into awareness.

Unless you are shocked, shaken to your very foundation, you will not awaken. The sleep has been so long that it has reached to the very core of your being; you are soaked in it. Each cell of your body and each fiber of your mind has become full of sleep. It is not a small phenomenon. Hence great effort is needed to be alert, to be attentive, to be watchful, to become a witness.

Silence is the space in which one awakes; and the noisy mind is the space in which one remains asleep. If your mind continues chattering, you are asleep.

I never use the word renunciation at all. (…) I don't call it renunciation; I call it understanding, awareness. (…) Rejoice in life, in love, in the beauties of the world, (…) and then indirectly, a certain renunciation starts happening. (…) You are carrying stones in your hand thinking that they are diamonds. If you yourself see that they are stones, not diamonds, is there any need to renounce them? They will fall from your hands of their own accord. In fact, if you still want to carry them, you will have to make a great effort; you will have to bring great will, to still carry them. But you cannot carry them for long; once you have seen that they are useless, meaningless, you are bound to throw them away. And once your hands are empty, you can search for the real treasures.

Suffering gives you depth. Really, if there is no suffering, you will be saltless. (…) A quality comes to you which only suffering can give. A man who has remained always in happiness, in comfort, who has not suffered, will not have any tone – he will be just a lump of being; there cannot be any depth. Really, there cannot be any heart. The heart is created through suffering; through pain, you evolve. (…) If a man has only suffered and has not known any happiness, then too he will not be rich, because richness comes through opposites. The more you move in opposites, the higher, the deeper you evolve. (…) He who has not known any moments of happiness will not be really alive; (…) he will settle down to his pessimistic existence. (…) by and by, he will become unconscious.

A man can live in two ways: he can live from his periphery, or he can live from his center. The periphery belongs to the ego, and the center belongs to the being. If you live from the ego, you are always related to the other. The periphery is related with the other. Whatsoever you do is not action; it is always a reaction – you do it in response to something done to you. From the periphery, there is no action; everything is reaction – nothing comes from your center. In a way, you are just a slave of the circumstance. You are not doing anything; rather, you are being forced. From the center, the situation changes dramatically. From the center, you begin to act; for the first time, you begin to exist not as a relata but in your own right. (…) You are touched not because your center is touched, but only because you have no center. You are just periphery, identified with periphery. The periphery is bound to be touched by everything – everything that happens. (…) The moment you have a center, then you have a distance from yourself – you have a distance from your periphery. (…) You can remain aloof, detached – there is a distance between you and yourself. Between you as your periphery, and you as the center, there is a distance. And that distance cannot be broken by anyone else, because no one can penetrate to the center. The outside world can touch only on the periphery.

When you act, the act is always total. When you react, it can never be total. It is always partial, fragmentary, because when I act from my periphery, it cannot be total, because I am not involved in it, really. Only my periphery is involved, so it cannot be total. (…) a partial act is bound to be contradictory, in conflict with itself. (…) On the periphery, everything is going to be self-contradictory. Only when you act from the center is your act total. When the act is total, it is moment to moment. When the act is total, you don't carry memory.

You will have to carry the past if it is unfinished – the mind has a tendency to finish everything. If it is unfinished, then it has to be carried. If something has remained unfinished during the day, then you will dream about it in the night, because the mind tends to finish everything. The moment it is finished, the mind is unburdened from it. Unless it its finished, the mind is bound to come to it again and again. Whatsoever you are doing – your love, your sex, your friendship – everything is unfinished. And you cannot make it total if you remain on the periphery.

Thinking is judgment – the moment you think, you have begun to judge. Thinking is evaluation. You cannot think without evaluation. (…) You will have to use some category, because thinking is categorizing. (…) Mind means your past, your memories. The past has come upon the present.

Every act becomes total if you are nonverbal.

In witnessing there is no ego – but this comes only if you can transcend language. Language is the barrier. (…) Language must evaporate. (…) Witnessing means moving out of language, verbalization, mind. Witnessing means a state of no-mind, no-thinking. (…) If you become dead to your past, totally dead, then only can you witness. (…) Unless you die first, nothing can be attained. Unless you are reborn, nothing can be attained. And this being reborn is not an event; it is a continuous process. One has to be reborn every moment.

The same awareness that you are using for outside things has to be used for internal traffic. When you close your eyes, there is a traffic of thoughts, emotions, dreams, imaginations. All kinds of things start flashing by. What you have been doing in the outside world, do exactly the same with the inside world, and you will become a witness. And once tasted, the joy of being a witness is so great, so otherworldly, that you would like to go more and more in. Whenever you find time, you would like to go more and more in. (…) And slowly, slowly, as awareness grows, your whole personality starts changing. From unawareness to awareness is the greatest quantum leap.

The mind is without thought in two states – either in deep sleep, or in meditation. If you are aware and thoughts disappear, it is meditation. If thoughts disappear and you become unaware, it is deep sleep. Deep sleep and meditation have something similar and something different. One thing is similar – in both, thinking disappears. One thing is dissimilar – in deep sleep, awareness also disappears; but in meditation, it remains. So, meditation is equal to deep sleep plus awareness. You are relaxed, as in deep sleep, and yet aware, fully awake – and that brings you to the door of the mysteries. (…) So, meditation means remaining as relaxed as you are in deep sleep, and yet alert.

This is the first thing to be understood, that mind is a process like a wave or like a river, but it has no substance in it. If it has substance, then it cannot be dissolved. If it has no substance, it can disappear without leaving a single trace behind. (…) When a wave disappears into the ocean, what is left behind? Nothing, not even a trace.

Nobody exists beyond the mind. (…) If somebody is controlling the mind, then it will be only a part, a fragment of the mind controlling another fragment of the mind. That is what the ego is. Mind cannot be controlled in that way. It is not, and there is nobody to control it. The inner emptiness can see but cannot control. It can look, but it cannot control – but the very look is the control; the very phenomenon of observation, of witnessing, becomes the mastery, because the mind disappears.

When the mind is gone, then a second perception becomes possible: you can see that thoughts are not yours. Of course they come, and sometimes they rest a little while in you, and then they go. You may be a resting place, but they don't originate in you. Have you ever noticed that not even a single thought has arisen out of you? Not a single thought has come through your being; they always come from the outside. They don't belong to you – rootless, homeless, they hover. Sometimes they rest in you, that's all, like a cloud resting on top of a hill. Then they will move on their own; you need not do anything. If you simply watch, control is attained.

Everything is just on the surface. If you move inward, control is attained. If you move inward from the surface, you go to the center – suddenly, the surface may still be disturbed, but you are not disturbed. The whole science of meditation is nothing but centering, moving toward the center, getting rooted there, abiding there. And from there, the whole perspective changes. Now the waves may still be there, but they don't reach you. And now you can see they don't belong to you; it is just a conflict on the surface with something foreign. And from the center, when you look, by and by, the conflict ceases. By and by, you relax. By and by, you accept that of course there is a strong wind and waves will arise, but you are not worried, and when you are not worried, even waves can be enjoyed. Nothing is wrong in them. (…) If you start fighting with the waves, you will be defeated. Fight won't help; you will have to accept the waves. (…) Waves are there; you simply allow yourself to move with them, not against them. You become part of them. Then tremendous happiness arises. That is the whole art of surfing – moving with the waves, not against them. (…) And surfing can become a great meditation.

Centering in consciousness is the mastery of the mind. (…) Real religion is at the center, and in the perspective that happens through the center.

Only weaklings worry about thoughts. Only weaklings worry about the mind. Stronger people simply absorb the Whole, and they are richer for it. Stronger people never reject anything. (…) The stronger person has a totally different depth that ordinary religious people cannot have; they are poor and shallow. (…) Because they have rejected parts of themselves, they have become crippled. They are in a certain way paralyzed.

Nothing is wrong in the mind; nothing is wrong in the thoughts. If anything is wrong, it is remaining on the surface – because then you don't know the Whole and unnecessarily suffer because of the part and the partial perception. A whole perception is needed, and that is possible only from the center – because from the center you can look all around in all dimensions, all directions, at the whole periphery of your being. And it is vast. In fact, it is the same as the periphery of existence. Once you are centered, by and by, you become wider and wider and bigger and bigger, and you end with being the Whole, not less than that.

When I ask you, "Who are you?", if really you look inside, your only answer can be "I don't know". Whatsoever you will say will be the memory, not you. (…) The answer cannot be given in words, because whatsoever is given in words will be part of memory, part of mind, not of consciousness.

Mind projects itself and mind is the past; so your future is not going to be anything other than the past.

Every thought is self-perpetuating; every action is self-perpetuating. (…) You live through the habit – that means that the habit lives through you. The habit itself persists; it has an energy of its own. (…) By and by, the habit will become the master, and you will be just a servant, a shadow. (…) Hindus call it the theory of karma. (…) It is within you. Sometimes, suddenly sadness comes for no apparent reason at all. And sometimes one feels happy; sometimes one feels euphoric, ecstatic. A man deprived of all social relationships, isolated in total comfort, supplied with every need, moves through all the moods that you move through in relationship. That means that something comes from within, and you hang it on somebody else. That is just a rationalization.

The mastery of one's self comes when one realizes, "I am absolutely responsible for whatsoever happens to me. Whatsoever happens, unconditionally – I am absolutely responsible".

Of course you have a form, but the form is not you; the form is just the house you happen to be in. (…) Watch and discriminate. (…) Go on cutting all the identities that you are not. (…) In that emptiness, when everything that was not you has been thrown out, suddenly your being surfaces. For the first time, you encounter yourself, and that encounter becomes the mastery.

Attachment is the food for the mind to continue. Nonattached witnessing is the way to stop it without any effort to stop it.

Going back means going consciously to things that you have done in unconsciousness. Go back – just the light of consciousness heals; it is a healing force. Whatsoever you can make conscious will be healed, and then it will hurt no more. A man who goes backward releases the past. (…) You need space – the past is so much inside, a junkyard of dead things, there is no space for the present. That junkyard goes on dreaming about the future, so half the place is filled with that which is no more and half the place is filled with that which is not yet. (…) Be finished with the past – unless you are finished with the past, you are living a ghost life. Your life is not true; it is not existential.

Silence is not part of the mind. (…) The very being of mind is anti-silence. (…) If a person is really silent, then we must say that he has no mind.

Mind is basically the beginning of madness. And if you are too much in it, it will drive you mad.

Mind is basically indecisive, and awareness is basically decisive. So any act out of awareness is total, full, without repentance.

Remember one thing: make every moment complete. Live every moment as if there is no other moment to come; then only will you complete it.

The only sin is unawareness, and the only virtue is awareness. That which cannot be done without unawareness is sin. That which can only be done through awareness is virtue.

The less people know, the more stubbornly they know it.

One can go on committing a certain error only if one remains unconscious of it. Unconsciousness is a must to go on committing the same errors.

You need a 180 degree turn – that's what meditation is all about.

I am not interested in telling you to drop your faults, to make yourself good, to improve your character – no, not at all. I am not interested in your character at all; I am interested only in your consciousness. Become more alert, more conscious. Just go deeper and deeper into yourself, till you find the center of your being. You are living on the periphery, and on the periphery there is always turmoil. The deeper you go, the deeper the silence that prevails.

Don't be worried about the errors and the mistakes and the faults. Be concerned about one single thing, one single phenomenon; put your total energy into one goal – and that is how to be more conscious, how to be more awakened.

The good man is always serious, because he is afraid of all the bad qualities he has repressed. And he is serious because deep down, he desires to be honored for his goodness, to be rewarded. His longing is to be respectable. Your so-called saints are mostly just "good men". (…) When you are totally awakened, whatever you do is good. The good man has to make immense efforts to do good and to avoid the bad; the bad is a constant temptation for him. (…) His mind is full of condemnation and judgment – and because he is himself trying to be good, he is judging others also by the same criteria. He cannot accept you as you are; he can accept you only if you fulfill his demands of being good.

Religions have decided to remain only moralities. They are ethical codes; they are useful for society, but not useful for you, not useful for the individual.

Remember, you have to come to a point where you need not even think about what is good and what is bad. Your very awareness, your very consciousness, simply takes you toward that which is good; there is no repression. (…) A man of awareness is not obsessed with anything; he has no obsession. He is just relaxed, calm and quiet, silent and serene. Out of his silence, whatever blossoms is good. It is always good; he lives in a choiceless awareness.

Religions have been teaching you to be good, so that one day you can find God. That is not possible – no good man has ever found godliness. I am teaching just the reverse: find godliness, and good will come on its own accord. And when good comes on its own accord, it has a beauty, a grace, a simplicity, a humbleness. It does not ask for any reward here or hereafter. It is its own reward.

Awareness is not like seasonal flowers that grow in six weeks' time and are then gone. Awareness is like the cedars of Lebanon, which take hundreds of years to grow but they remain for thousands of years and rise to one hundred and fifty feet, two hundred feet high in the sky.

The transformation has to be inner. This is real renunciation: the old world is gone because the old being is gone.

Dreaming is a disease. It is needed because man is sick. But if dreams can be completely dropped, you will attain a new kind of health, a new vision. And part of your unconscious mind will become conscious, so you will have a stronger individuality. Whatever you do, you will never repent, because you will have done it with such consciousness that repentance has no relevance.

The first type of dream is just rubbish. (…) It is simply useless. It happens because in the whole day, working the whole day, you gather much rubbish. (…) And there is no way to give a bath to the mind, so the mind has an automatic mechanism to throw out all rubbish. (….) Almost 90 percent of dreams are simply rubbish being thrown out. (…) The second type of dream is a sort of wish fulfillment. (…) Whatsoever you have denied to your being because of the priests and the poisoners [i.e. the commands of society], the mind tries to fulfill it in dreams, in some way or other. (…) It is very meaningful to understand it and meditate on it. Because the unconscious is trying to communicate to you: "Don't be a fool! You will suffer for it. And don't starve your being. Don't be suicidal, and don't go on committing a slow suicide by killing your needs." (…) Desires are of the conscious mind – the unconscious knows no desires; the unconscious is not worried about desires. (…) the unconscious is interested only in how to be a fulfilled, organic unity. (…) Listen to your needs, whatsoever the unconscious is saying. Always remember: the unconscious is right, because it has the wisdom of the ages. (…) The conscious has been trained in the schools and the universities, and by the family and the society in which you were born in this life – coincidentally born. But the unconscious carries all the experiences of all your lives. (…) The unconscious is eternal wisdom. Listen to it. (…) The third type of dream is a communication from the superconscious. The third type of dream is rare, because we have lost all contact with the superconscious. But still it comes, (…) it is anchored still in you. (…) Then there is a fourth type of dream, which comes from past lives. Not rare – many times it comes. But everything is a mess inside you; you cannot make any distinctions. (…) if you can remember, if you can become aware of your past lives, the whole pattern will change; your gestalt will change. (…) If you can remember what you did and how it all came to nothing – if you can remember many lives, many times you have been doing the same again and again; you are like a stuck gramophone record, a vicious circle, again you start the same and you end the same – if you can remember a few of your lives, you will suddenly be surprised that you have never done a single new thing. Again and again, you accumulated wealth; again and again, you tried to be powerful politically; again and again, you became knowledgeable. Again and again, you fell in love, and again and again, the same misery that love brings… when you see this repetition, how can you remain the same? Then this life is suddenly transfigured. You cannot remain in the same rut anymore. (…) And there is a fifth type of dream, which is going forward into the future. Rare, very rare – it happens only sometimes, when you are very vulnerable, open, flexible. The past gives a shadow and the future gives a shadow; it reflects in you.

In the East, people have been asking for millennia, "How to get out of this wheel of life and death?" It seems to be the same wheel; it seems to be the same story again and again – a repetition. If you don't know it, then you think you are doing new things, and you are so excited. (…) Nothing is new in life; it is a wheel. It moves on the same route. (…) Once you remember, the whole excitement drops. In that remembrance happens sannyas. Sannyas is an effort to get out of the rut; it is an effort to jump out of the wheel. (…) Sannyas is a perfect dropping out of the wheel – not out of the society, but out of your own inner wheel of life and death.

Love is not enough; awareness is needed. If love is there without awareness, it becomes an imprisonment. If love is there with awareness, it becomes freedom – it helps you to be yourself.

Growing old, any animal is capable of. Growing up is the prerogative of human beings. Only a few claim the right. Growing up means moving every moment deeper into the principle of life; it means going farther away from death – not toward death. The deeper you go into life, the more you understand the immortality within you. You are going away from death; a moment comes when you can see that death is nothing but changing clothes, or changing houses, changing forms – nothing dies, nothing can die. Death is the greatest illusion there is.

For growing up, just watch a tree. As the tree grows up, its roots are growing down, deeper. There is a balance – the higher the tree goes, the deeper the roots will go. (…) In life, growing up means growing deep within yourself – that's where your roots are.

To me, the first principle of life is meditation. Everything else comes second.

Whenever you understand that you have missed life, the first principle to be brought back is innocence. (…) Clean your mind of all that is not known by you, of all that is borrowed, of all that has come from tradition, convention. All that has been given to you by others – parents, teachers, universities – just get rid of

it. (…) Meditation is simply a surgical method that cuts you away from all that is not yours and saves only that which is your authentic being.

The second principle of life is the pilgrimage. Life must be a seeking, (…) a search to find out "Who am I?" It is very strange that people who don't know who they are, are trying to become somebody. (…) They are unacquainted with their being – but they have a goal of becoming. Becoming is the disease of the soul. Being is you. And to discover your being is the beginning of life.

Every culture has to give some compensation to you, so that you don't feel completely lost in misery, in sadness. But these compensations are false. (…) Always remember that society compensates you when it feels that the repressed may explode into a dangerous situation if it is not compensated. The society finds some way of allowing you to let out the repressed – but this is not true celebration, and it cannot be true. True celebration should come from your life, in your life. (…) Life should be a continuous celebration, a festival of lights the whole year round. Only then can you grow up, can you blossom. Transform small things into celebration.

Maturity is accepting the responsibility of being oneself, whatsoever the cost. Risking all to be oneself, that's what maturity is all about.

Every society, up to now, has been a corruptive influence on every child. All cultures have depended on exploiting the innocence of the child, (…) on conditioning him for their own purposes, for their own ends – political, social, ideological. Their whole effort has been how to recruit the child as a slave for some purpose. Those purposes are decided by the vested interests.

Maturity means gaining your lost innocence again. (…) Maturity is an inner growth. (…) Maturity is a rebirth, a spiritual birth. (…) Every child has to lose his innocence and regain it.

The moment you become aware that to be part of any society, any religion, any culture, is to remain miserable, is to remain a prisoner – that very day you start dropping your chains. Maturity is coming; you are gaining your innocence again.

Experiencing plus awareness is maturity. (…) if you bring the quality of awareness to an experience, the same experience becomes maturity. (…) A mature person never commits the same mistake again. But a person who is just old goes on committing the same mistakes again and again. He lives in a circle; he never learns anything. (…) If you live an experience of anger totally, never again will you be angry. (…) If you have known that anger is poisonous, it is finished. That way is closed; that door no longer exists for you. The situation will be repeated tomorrow, but you will not be possessed by the situation. You have learned something – the understanding will be there. (…) Your understanding is growing through every experience. (…) If you live with awareness, you mature; otherwise you simply grow old.

The most fundamental thing to be remembered is that life is dialectical. It exists through duality, it is a rhythm between opposites. You cannot be happy forever; otherwise happiness will lose all meaning. You cannot be in harmony forever; otherwise you will become unaware of harmony. Harmony has to be followed by discord again and again, and happiness has to be followed by unhappiness. Every pleasure has its own pain, and every pain has its own pleasure. Unless one understands this duality of existence, one remains in unnecessary misery. Accept the total, with all its agonies and all its ecstasies.

Maturity has nothing to do with your life experiences. It has something to do with your inward journey, your experiences of the inner. The more a man goes deeper into himself, the more mature he is. When he has reached the very center of his being, he is perfectly mature. But at that moment, the person disappears; only presence remains. The self disappears; only silence remains. Knowledge disappears; only innocence remains. To me, innocence is another name for realization: you have come to the fulfillment of your potential; it has become actual. The seed has come on a long journey and has blossomed.

Maturity of spirit is touching your inner sky. Once you settle down in your inner sky, you have found a home, and a great maturity arises in your actions, in your behavior. Then, whatever you do has grace in it.

If a child has not lived his childhood well, then that unlived childhood will enter into his youth – because where will it go? It has to be lived. (…) If he lives the childhood completely, he will become a young man, beautiful, fresh, uncontaminated by the childhood. He will shed the childhood as a snake sheds its old skin. He will come out of it fresh.

A man who lives in this moment now and here is not cluttered with the past and not cluttered with the future; he remains unburdened. He has no burden to carry; he moves without the weight. (…) [When death is coming] he will enjoy and he will celebrate and he will say to people, “My ship is coming, and I am only for a little longer on this bank. Soon I will be going to my home. This life has been beautiful, a strange experience. I loved, learned, lived much, I am enriched. I had come here with nothing and I am going with much experience, much maturity.” He will be thankful to all that has happened – good and bad both, right and wrong both, because from everything he has learned: (…) sages that he came across, he learned from them; and sinners, yes, from them also. They all helped. People who robbed him helped; people who helped him helped. People who were friends helped; people who were enemies helped – everyone helped. Summer and winter, satiety and hunger – everything helped. One can be thankful to all. (…) Death is the culmination of fulfillment. Life does not end in death; in fact, life flowers in death. (…) But to know the beauty of death, one has to be ready for it; one has to learn the art.

On the horizontal line, only beggars can exist, because they are all rushing for more, and the more cannot be fulfilled. (…) For a moment there may be a flicker of happiness; and the next moment, again the same despair, and the same race for more.

Once the vertical line is discovered, one starts moving on the vertical line. (…) The vertical line means being less and less and less, to the point of utter emptiness, to the point of being nobody. (…) You are no more of the world; the world becomes ephemeral, loses importance. (…) On the vertical line, slowly you feel desires disappearing, sexuality disappearing, ambitions disappearing, will to power disappearing… your slavery in all its aspects disappearing – religious, political, national. You become more of an individual. And with your individuality growing clear and luminous, the whole humanity is becoming one in your eyes – you cannot discriminate. There are great experiences on the vertical line; on the horizontal line, there is only death.

To think of oneself as just a body-mind structure is the most dangerous idea that has happened to people. That destroys their whole grace, their whole beauty, and they are constantly trembling and afraid of death, and trying to keep old age as far away as possible.

We are bitter because we are not what we should be. Everybody is feeling sour because everybody is feeling this is not what life should be; if this is all, then this is nothing. There must be something more to it; and unless that something more is found, one cannot drop one's bitterness. Out of this bitterness comes anger, jealousy, violence, hatred – all kinds of negativities. One is continuously complaining, but the real complaint is somewhere else deep down. It is a complaint against existence. (…) Only an awakened person can be non-bitter in old age. (…) Bitterness is a state of ignorance. You have to go beyond it; you have to learn the awareness that becomes a bridge to take you beyond. And that very going is a revolution. The moment you really have gone beyond all complaints, all nos, a tremendous yes arises – just yes, yes, yes – there is a great fragrance. The same energy that was bitter becomes fragrance.

Integration is already there at the deepest core of your being. At your very center, you are integrated; otherwise, you could not exist at all.

There is an action mode; the action mode is the outgoing mode. And there is an inaction mode too: you don't do anything; you simply allow it to happen. We have forgotten that language. That forgotten language has to be learned again. (…) You are lopsided right now. You have only one mode to your life, and that is action, doing something. (…) This has become too fixed. This has to relax a little: you have to go for a few moments, for a few hours, sometimes for a few days, totally to the other mode of life. (…) I'm not saying to leave the world of action – because that will make you lopsided again. (…) That is what Buddha means when he says, "Become a driftwood. Float in the stream like timber, and wherever the stream goes let it take you; you don't make any effort." The whole Buddhist approach belongs to the receptive mode. That's why you see Buddha sitting under a tree. All his images are of sitting, sitting and doing nothing.

To do good work is one thing, and to be good is totally another. I'm not saying, don't do good works. I am saying: let good works come out of your being good. First attain to the receptive mode. (…) And when your inner being flowers and you have come to know the integration inside, (…) when you have recognized that center, (…) you are no longer a body and no longer a mind. Then compassion arises, love arises, prayer arises. You become a showering, a blessing to the world.

If you do something you don't enjoy, you are disconnected from the center. Joy arises from the center, and from nowhere else. So let it be the criterion, and be fanatic about it.

Something in you dies every moment, and something in you is born anew. Life and death are not separate. (…) Life and death are just like two wings of a bird, simultaneously happening. (…) They are part of one cosmic Whole. (…) Just a little awareness, not much, and you can see you are changing every moment. And change means something is dying, and something is being reborn. (…) That is the truth of our being – (…) nothing ever begins, it has always been there; nothing ever ends, it will always remain there.

If you don't live life, if you are already finished with the job of living, loving, dancing, singing, then naturally you need not be afraid of death – you have died already. We have called these dead people saints; we have worshipped them. (…) The saint cannot die, because he has already died. He has renounced all the pleasures, all the joys; all that life offers he has rejected. He has returned the ticket to existence, saying, I am no more part of the show. He has closed his eyes.

To me the religious person is one who is totally alive, intensely alive, aflame with love, aware of tremendous beauty all around, and has the courage to rejoice each moment of life and death together. Only a man who is so capable of rejoicing in life and death – his song continues. It does not matter whether life is happening or death is happening – his song is not disturbed; his dance does not waver. Only such an adventurous soul, only such a pilgrim of existence is religious. (…) That means you have attained to the real transcendence; you have lived everything, now it's your maturity. You have not renounced anything, but you have simply passed through every experience. You have grown so experienced that now you need not repeat those experiences again and again. This is transcendence. (…) You should rejoice, and I would like the whole world to understand the rejoicing that is our birthright in accepting with deep gratitude the old age and the final consummation of old age into death. If you are not graceful about it, if you cannot laugh at it – if you cannot disappear into the eternal, leaving a laughter behind – you have not lived rightly.

You become mature only when meditation has started; otherwise you remain childish. Your toys may go on changing, (…) but there is no qualitative difference. (…) Reaching outside, you may reach other stars, but you will remain childish.

Meditation is mind turning towards its own source.

Search for the inner sky. And if you have found it, then you will never die. The body will die, the mind will die, but you will never die. And to know it is to know life. What you call life is not real life, because it is going to die. Only a meditator knows what life is, because he has reached the very source of eternity.

You have to kill your parents; you have to kill your teachers; you have to kill your leaders. They are all clamoring inside you, and they don't allow you to become a grown-up person – they go on keeping you childish. They make you dependent; they don't allow you independence. (…) that's how you have been trained for years, to remain a child. Everything was ordered, and you were expected to obey. You have become very dependent – you always go on looking for father figures; you always go on looking for authorities to tell you what should be done, what should not be done. Maturity means the understanding to decide for oneself, the understanding to be decisive on your own. To stand on your own feet – that's what maturity is. But it rarely happens. (…) The society is not happy with mature people. Mature people are dangerous people, because a mature person lives according to his own being. (…) Society is afraid of these people; society wants everybody to remain childish. Everybody should be kept at an age somewhere between seven and fourteen – and that's where people are.

Nature, biology, makes a person independent from the parents at the age of fourteen. (…) Before fourteen, you are repressed – because after fourteen, repression becomes difficult. (…) Children receive education so that before they become independent, their minds become conditioned. (…) So the greatest work for a man who really wants to become free, who really wants to become conscious, who really wants to become dehypnotized, is that he needs to drop many things from the inside. (…) You have to kill your mother and father, the ideas that you are carrying with you. (…) Start living your life, from this moment, as if you don't know, as if nobody has taught you anything – fresh, clean, from ABC – and you will see maturity coming very soon.

There are no watertight compartments between anger and love; they are all together, mixed with each other. It is the same energy.

Only people who are courageous enough to be called fools are able to live and love and know and be. Maturity comes through more and more, deeper and deeper experiences of life; not by avoiding life – by avoiding life, you remain childish.

A child is innocent. He functions from a state of not knowing. He never functions out of knowledge, because he has none. You always function out of knowledge. Knowledge means the past; knowledge means the old and the told; knowledge means that which you have gathered. And every situation is new; no knowledge is applicable to it.

As you become more aware, there is no more energy available for thoughts – they die out; (…) the mind becomes absolutely silent.

As you go into a higher reality, the lower world of happenings has to be dropped. There is no explanation of the higher in the lower, because the very terms of explanation don't exist there; they are meaningless. But the intellect can feel the gap; it can know the gap. It can come to feel that "something has happened that is beyond me". If even this much can be done, the intellect has done much. (…) Intuition is something beyond the intellect, something not of the intellect, something coming from some place where intellect is totally unaware. So the intellect can feel it, but it cannot explain it. (…) Intuition travels without any vehicle. (…) It must be understood that a higher reality can penetrate a lower reality, but the lower cannot penetrate the higher. (…) Intellect should be used as an opening for intuition. It has just to give way for intuition to take over your life.

Intuition is the highest rung on the ladder of consciousness. (…) The lowest and the first is instinct; the second, the middle one, is intellect; and the third, the highest one, is intuition.

Instinct is the world of the animals. (…) In many animals, the father has no instinctive fatherliness; on the contrary, many will kill their own kids and eat them. (…) The father has no instinct to be fatherly; in fact, the father is a human institution. (…) But the mother tries to fight, to protect. (…) Anybody watching will feel that the father is really cruel, has no compassion, no love, and that the mother is really motherly. But you are just projecting ideas. The mother is not protecting for any conscious reason; it is in her hormones to protect. (…) The mother is doing it like a robot in the hands of nature. She is helpless – she has to do it. (…) It is a question of biochemistry. (…) Ninety percent of man's life is still part of the animal world. We live by instinct.

You fall in love with a woman, or a woman falls in love with you, and you think it is something great. It is not great; it is simple instinctive infatuation: it is hormones being attracted by the opposite hormones. You are just a plaything in the hands of nature. No animal bothers about the delicacies and subtleties of love, but man feels that to be just instinctive is insulting, humiliating. Your love is just biochemistry? Your love is poetry; your love is art; your love is philosophy – but biochemistry? It seems as if you are ashamed of your biology, of your chemistry, of your nature. But this is not the way of understanding. You have to understand exactly what is what. Distinctions have to be clear; otherwise you will remain always confused. Your ego will go on making you project things that have nothing to do with anything other than the lowest stratum.

The second rung, intellect, gives you something that is higher than biology, chemistry, the animal nature. Intellect is also inborn, just as intuition is, just as instinct is. There is no way to increase your intellectual capacity; all that can be done is to make your whole potential actual, which will look as if your intellect has grown. The intellect tries to dominate, and because it has logic on its side – reason, argument, a thousand and one proofs – it can manage, as far as your conscious mind is concerned, to convince you that the instinct is something evil. That's why all the religions have been condemning instinct. Instinct makes you do things, forces you to do things even against your will. Intellect helps you to find ways if you want to do a certain thing, or to find ways if you don't want to do a certain thing. Intellect's function is to find a way.

Once your intelligence and instinct have no conflict, you become human for the first time; you are no longer part of the animal kingdom. (…) Otherwise, most of your intelligence is involved in repressing. (…) You have to repress your animal nature constantly, because it is coming up again and again. (…) You are sitting on a volcano, trying to keep the volcano from exploding. (…) to go against your nature creates hell here on earth. (…) Repress anything, and it becomes powerful. Express it, and it evaporates. (…) Let it disappear. (…) This is the whole purpose: it should disappear!

When your unconscious and conscious meet because there is nothing repressed in the unconscious – and that is the moment of their meeting and their merger – at that very moment, (…) because you are no longer involved with the lower, your whole energy is available for the higher. (…) If a man is sane, he will use his intellect to help his unconscious be fulfilled. The sooner it is fulfilled, the better, so that you are free from it. Fulfillment means freedom from it. (…) Fulfilled, contented, biology settles, chemistry settles, and gives you all the energy that was involved in those planes. The energy shoots upward by itself, and it stops only at the very center of your superconscious mind. And there, intuition starts functioning. (…) Intuition is like instinct because you cannot do anything about it. It is part of your consciousness, just as instinct is part of your body. Intuition can give you answers for ultimate questions – not verbally but existentially. Intuition has something similar to intellect, but it is not intellectual; it is intelligence. The functioning of intellect and intelligence are totally different. Intellect functions through steps, step-by-step. It has a procedure, a methodology. If you are doing a question in mathematics, then there are steps to be followed. Intuition functions in a quantum leap. It has no methodological procedure; it simply sees things. It has eyes to see. It sees things that you have never even thought of as things – for example love. You have never thought of it as a thing. But a man of intuition can see whether there is love in you or not, whether there is trust in you or not, whether there is doubt in you or not. He can see them as if these are things. (…) Instinct and intuition are both independent of you. (…) Instinct always leads you to the other; its fulfillment is always dependent on something other than you. Intuition leads you only to yourself.

I have watched it, meeting thousands of people, that most intellectual people are not intelligent, because they don't have to be intelligent. Their intellect, their knowledge, is enough. But a man who has no knowledge, no intellect and no education, has to find some intelligence within himself; he cannot look outside. And because he has to depend on intelligence, intelligence starts growing.

Whatever you do, something in the very foundation of life will remain unknowable – a mystery.

Wisdom is never borrowed, and that which is borrowed is never wisdom. Unless you have your own wisdom, your own vision, your own clarity, your own eyes to see, you will not be able to understand the mystery of existence.

It is through knowledge that man becomes divided from the Whole; knowledge creates the distance. (…) Knowledge creates subject and object, the knower and the known, the observer and the observed. Knowledge is basically schizophrenic; it creates a split, and then there is no way to bridge it. That's why the more man has become knowledgeable, the less he is religious. The more educated a man, the less is the possibility for him to approach the Whole. Jesus is right when he says, “Only children will be able to enter into my kingdom”.

Mystery is possible only when you don’t know. And remember, man has not known a thing! All that we have gathered is just rubbish.

First drop the content – you become half empty. Then drop consciousness – you become fully empty. And this full emptiness is the most beautiful thing that can happen.

You dream only because so much work has been left undone in the day that the mind has to do it. It is overtime work; you have not been able to finish in the day.

How can you finish anything? You are doing a thousand and one things simultaneously. Nothing is ever finished; everything remains incomplete – and remains incomplete forever. You will die, but nothing will be complete.

You are running in all the directions. You have become many fragments; you are not integrated.

The mind is not one, you have many minds – you are multi-psychic; there is a crowd of minds in you. There is no unity, no harmony. You are not an orchestra – nothing is in tune. Everything is going on its own; nobody listens to anyone else – you simply create noise, not music.

Intuition, imagination, intellect – all have to be transcended. You have to come to a point that is beyond mind: a deep serenity, coolness, and calmness that is your nature, that is your Buddha nature. That’s what you are.

The famous dictum in the Indian history of philosophy is Satyameva jayate – “Truth should win, no matter who is defeated.” It is not arising out of an inferiority complex, but it is coming out of a really superior intelligence. The tradition went to China, to Japan, and it spread to other fields also. That is why if you see two Japanese boxers, or aikido fighters, or jujitsu or judo fighters, you will be surprised – first they bow to each other with tremendous respect. There is no question of enmity. This is one of the teachings of judo and all martial arts in Japan, that when you are fighting with somebody, it is not a question of personal enmity. If it is personal, you are already primed to be defeated, because it is based in ego – you are falling to the lower level. In the art of judo, whosoever proves the art of judo superior is the winner. It is not the person; it is the art that wins. (…) Not even for a single moment should you remember yourself and your victory, because that will be the moment of your defeat. (…) The basic foundation is that when you are fighting, you should not be there but utterly absent; then no sword can cut you.

Nothing ever reaches you as it is; you go on missing it. There are many interpreters in between. You see something – first your eyes and your senses falsify it. Then your ideology, your religion, your society, your church – they falsify it. Then your emotions – they falsify it. And so on, and so forth. By the time it reaches to you, it has almost nothing of the original, or so little that it makes no difference. You see something only if your filters allow it, and the filters don't allow much. (…) This reconstruction is your invention. It is not a discovery of truth; it is your imagination.

Man lives through lies.

Belief systems have to be dropped; then understanding arises. (…) you never create any belief; you remain in a state of not-knowing.

You cannot become rational by accumulating borrowed arguments and proofs. The real reason arises only when you are intelligent. (…) Pseudo-reasoning is the field of male expertise.

Emotionality, sentimentalism is pseudo-feeling, much ado about nothing, much fuss. The female mind is expert at this. It is kind of empty; it is just on the surface. (…) The real feeling is involvement, commitment. One can never go against one's heart.

Religious repression has disturbed all your centers. (…) Your so-called saints are only avoiding the world. They are repressed beings.

Intuition is to be in tune with oneself, totally in tune with oneself. And out of that tuning, solutions arise from nowhere.

All the dualities of the world are basically in the duality of the mind – and below the duality is oneness of being.

Fighting with anybody is dangerous, because you become like your enemy. (…) The conflict is in man. Unless it is resolved there, it cannot be resolved anywhere else.

First you go deep in meditation. Unless you are resolved within yourself, you will create more problems than you already have. If you move into relationship, all your problems will be multiplied.

Intellect is of the head – it is borrowed; you have to cultivate it. It is taught by others; it is imposed on you; it is something foreign. Intelligence is inborn; it is your own. (…) It is your very being, your very nature. (…) The intellectual person lives only through argument. Certainly, arguments can lead you up to a certain point, but beyond that, hunches are needed. (…) Intelligence is intuitive. (…) Intelligence is the inborn capacity to see, to perceive.

Every child is born intelligent, then made stupid by the society. We educate him in stupidity; and sooner or later he graduates in stupidity. (…) We bring some flavor, some fragrance from the beyond, when we come into the world. But immediately, the society jumps upon you, starts manipulating, teaching, changing, cutting, adding; and soon you have lost all shape, all form. The society wants you to be obedient, conformist, orthodox. This is how your intelligence is destroyed.

The greatest misery in life is to feel oneself stupid, unworthy, unintelligent – and nobody is born unintelligent; nobody can be born unintelligent, because we come from existence. Existence is pure intelligence.

Intelligence dies in imitating others. If you want to remain intelligent, you will have to drop imitating. Intelligence commits suicide in copying, in becoming a carbon copy. (…) The moment you compare yourself with somebody else, you are losing your natural potential. (…) If you compare, you will never respect yourself; you will be crushed by your comparisons. (…) You will lose your clarity; you will lose your vision. (…) You will have borrowed eyes; you will live a borrowed life.

If you really want to be intelligent, you have to be a rebel. Only the rebellious person is intelligent. What do I mean by rebellion? I mean dropping all that has been enforced on you against your will. Search again for who you are; start from ABC again. Think that your time, up to now, has been a wastage, because you have been following.

Watch, scrutinize, observe; have another look at your life. Nobody else is going to help you. You have depended on others so long, that's why you have become stupid. Now take care; it's your responsibility.

Be unburdened; put all aside. Regain, reclaim your innocence, your childhood. Jesus is right when he says, "Unless you are born again, you shall not enter into the kingdom of God".

Drop all the garbage that has been put on you. Be fresh; start from the very beginning; and you will be surprised how much intelligence is immediately released.

Intelligence is the capacity to respond moment to moment to life as it happens, not according to a program. Only unintelligent people have a program. They are afraid; they know that they don't have enough intelligence to encounter life as it is.

Intelligence is the capacity to be reborn again and again. To die to the past is intelligence; and to live in the present is intelligence.

In fact, the intelligence of the head is not intelligence at all; it is knowledgeability. The head is simply an accumulator. The intelligence of the heart is the intelligence, the only intelligence there is.

The life that is lived from the head is a mechanical life. You become a robot. (…) You may become more efficient; you can earn much; you may have a better standard of living – but you will not live much; you won't have any life. Life is of the heart; life can only grow through the heart. (…) The heart is your very center; the head is just your periphery.

Remember, this shift has to happen: from thinking you have to go to feeling. Feeling is closer, closer to something in you that is called intuition. Thinking is the farthest point from intuition. (…) To move from thinking to intuition is difficult. They don't meet; they are polarities. Feeling is just in the middle. From feeling, thinking and intuition are at the same distance. (…) You need not go anywhere; you only need to go inside yourself.

All that is great in science has come not through intellect, but through intuition. (…) It was an insight, not an intellectual conclusion. (…) Discovery always arises out of meditation, not out of mind. (…) Mind is just the surface of your being; insights come from the center of your being. Meditation takes you to the center.

You only are whenever you stop thinking. The moment you stop thinking, the inner happens.

Zen Masters have used the sword as a technique for meditation, and they say in Japan that if two Zen Masters, two meditative persons, are fighting with those swords, there can be no conclusion.

Our schools, our colleges, our universities, the whole culture, the whole pattern of civilization, teach our heads. We have lost contact with the inner guide. Everyone is born with that inner guide, but it is not allowed to work, to function. It is almost paralyzed, but it can be revived.

When something comes from the inner, it comes from your navel upward. You can feel the flow, the warmth, coming from the navel upward. Whenever your mind thinks, it is just on the surface, in the head, and then it goes down. If your mind decided something, then you have to force it down. If your inner guide decides, then something bubbles up in you. It comes from the deep core of your being toward the mind. The mind receives it, but it is not of the mind. It comes from beyond – and that is why the mind is scared about it.

First, the intellect has to be tried completely; only then can the solution bubble up. The head has to be completely exhausted; otherwise it goes on functioning, even in a dream.

You cannot reach to the truth through a Master; you can reach only to the inner Master through a Master – and then this inner Master will lead you to the truth.

Wisdom comes from the heart; it is not of the intellect. Wisdom comes from the innermost depth of your being; it is not of the head. Cut your head off, be headless, and follow the being wherever it leads. Even if it leads into danger, go into danger, because that will be the path for you and your growth. Follow it, trust it, and move with it.

Be clear in the mind; don't be success-oriented. Success is the greatest failure in the world. So don't try to succeed; otherwise you will be a failure. Think of being blissful. Every moment, think of being more and more blissful. Then the whole world may say you are a failure, but you will not be a failure – you have attained.

I would like to make you more insecure, more uncertain – because that's how life is. When there is more insecurity, more danger, the only way to respond to it is by awareness. (…) In fact, only idiots feel secure. A really alive man will always feel insecure. What security can there be? Life is not a mechanical process; it cannot be certain. It is an unpredictable mystery.

Freedom creates fear. People talk about freedom, but they are afraid. And a man is not yet a man if he is afraid of freedom. (…) That's why so many people have chosen to be Christians, to be Hindus, to be Mohammedans, to be Jainas – they don't want freedom; they want fixed formulas.

I don't give you knowledge; I give you understanding.

When death knocks at your door, all your certainties will be simply riddles and foolish. Don't cling to any certainty. Life is uncertain; its very nature is uncertain. And an intelligent man always remains uncertain. This very readiness to remain in uncertainty is courage; this very readiness to remain in uncertainty is trust. (…) One has to live in awareness and in understanding.

Transcendence means the disappearance of the need for the other. (…) And this is possible only if you have understood. And understanding comes only through experience. So I don't say, drop out of relationships – rather, become more meditative in your relationships.

Listen to the heart consciously, alertly, attentively. And follow it, wherever it takes you. Yes, sometimes it will take you into dangers – but remember, those dangers are needed to make you ripe. Sometimes it will take you astray – but remember again, those goings astray are part of growth. Many times you will fail – rise up again, because this is how one gathers strength, by falling and rising again. This is how one becomes integrated. But don't follow rules imposed from the outside; no imposed rule can ever be right – because rules are invented by people who want to rule you.

To come to the right door, one has to knock first on many wrong doors. That's how it is. So remember, no effort is ever wasted; all efforts contribute to your growth. So don't be hesitant; don't be worried too much about going wrong.

Commit as many mistakes as possible, remembering only one thing: don't commit the same mistake again. And you will be growing. It is part of your freedom to go astray; it is part of your dignity to go even against God. And it is sometimes beautiful to go even against God. This is how you will start having a spine; otherwise there are millions of people, spineless.

Once the Master is gone, once his light is gone and the disciples are in deep darkness, they start groping for certain rules to follow, making codes of conduct, because now the light in which they could have seen is no longer there. Now they will have to depend on rules.

The moment you imitate, you insult your humanity, you insult your God. Never be an imitator; always be an original. (…) Respect yourself; respect your own inner voice and follow it.

Forget all about what you have been told, "This is right and this is wrong". Life is not so fixed. The thing that is right today may be wrong tomorrow; the thing that is wrong this moment may be right the next moment. Life cannot be pigeonholed; you cannot label it so easily. (…) Life is a mystery. (…) You will have to be very alert each moment, because it has to be decided each moment afresh. You cannot depend on ready-made answers.

My own understanding is this: whenever commandments are given, they create difficulties for people, because by the time they are given, they are already out of date. Life moves so fast, (…) it is never the same for two consecutive moments.

Intelligence is aliveness; it is spontaneity. It is openness; it is vulnerability. It is impartiality; it is the courage to function without conclusions. And why do I say it is courage? It is courage because when you function out of a conclusion, the conclusion protects you; the conclusion gives you security, safety. You know it well; you know how to come to it; you are very efficient with it. To function without a conclusion is to function in innocence. There is no security – you may go wrong; you may go astray.

One who is ready to go on the exploration called truth has to be ready also to commit many errors, mistakes, has to be able to risk. (…) Knowing what is error, one comes closer and closer to what is truth. It is an individual exploration; you cannot depend on others' conclusions.

You were born as a no-mind. (…) The mind is just a social product. It is nothing natural; it is cultivated. It has been put together on top of you. Deep down, you are still free; you can get out of it. One can never get out of nature, but one can get out of the artificial any moment one decides to. (…) Existence precedes thinking. So existence is not a state of mind; it is a state of the beyond. To be, not to think, is the way to know the fundamental. (…) The religious approach is a nonthinking approach. It is more intimate; it brings you closer to reality. It drops all that hinders; it unblocks you; you start flowing into life. (…) You meet, mingle, and merge into reality. And there is a different kind of knowing. It cannot be called "knowledge". It is more like love, less like knowledge. It is so intimate that the word knowledge is not sufficient to express it. The word love is more adequate, more expressive.

Thinking can think only about the known – it can chew the already chewed. Thinking can never be original. (…) At the most, thinking can create new combinations, but it cannot know the unknown. The unknown knows beyond it. So thinking goes in a circle, goes on knowing the known again and again and again.

Truth is an experience, not a belief. Truth never comes by studying about it; truth has to be encountered.

The mountain is in front of you, but your eyes are full of maps – maps of the mountain, maps about the same mountain, made by different explorers. Somebody has climbed the mountain from the north side, somebody from the east. They have made different maps: Koran, Bible, Gita – different maps of the same truth. But you are too full of these maps, too burdened by their weight; you cannot move even an inch.

The prejudiced eye is blind; the heart full of conclusions is dead.

Science is factual; mystery is existential. (…) Science is the murder of mystery. If you want to experience the mysterious, you will have to enter through another door, from a totally different dimension: (…) the dimension of meditation.

Meditation takes you slowly, slowly into a kind of dissolution where the observer and the observed become one. Now, that is not possible in science. The observer has to be the observer, and the observed has to be the observed, and a clear-cut distinction has to be maintained continuously.

The experience does not depend on the object. The experience depends on the experiencer, on the quality of the experiencing.

Doubt is out of fear. Doubt is out of a kind of insecurity in your own intelligence. You are not so confident that you can trust. Trust needs great intelligence, courage, integrity. It needs great heart to go into it. If you don't have enough intelligence, you protect yourself through doubt. (…) The mediocre mind has not that trust in itself. Knowledge is mediocre.

To be in the state of not knowing is intelligence; it is awareness – and it is noncumulative. Each moment, that which happens disappears; it leaves no trace behind, no existential trace. One comes out of it again pure, again innocent, again like a child.

Only change is permanent; only change never changes.

Never believe. If you cannot trust, it is better to doubt, because through doubt, some day or other the possibility of trust will arise. (…) In doubt, you will always remain in anguish and divided and indecisive. In doubt, you will remain in a nightmare. So one day or other, you will start seeking how to go beyond it. So I say, it is good to be an atheist rather than a theist, a pseudo-theist.

You have been taught to believe – from the very childhood, everybody's mind has been conditioned to believe: believe in God, believe in the soul, believe in this and believe in that. Now that belief has entered into your bones and your blood, but it remains a belief – you have not known. And unless you know, you cannot be liberated. Only knowing liberates.

All beliefs are borrowed – others have given them to you; they are not your flowerings. (…) Those beliefs can never go very deep; they remain skin-deep at the most. Scratch a little, and the disbelief comes out.

The whole world is full of pseudo-religious people. (…) And can't you see that the world is absolutely irreligious?

Drop beliefs. (…) Each belief is repressing doubt. Don't be worried about it; let the doubt come. (…) Long is the journey; dark is the night. (…) Go deeper into your being, to the very source of your being, and discover trust within you.

Enquiry will need trust because you will be going into the unknown. It will demand tremendous trust and courage, because you are moving away from the conventional and the traditional; you are moving away from the crowd. You are going into the open sea, and you don't know whether the other shore exists at all.

The depth of enquiry comes through trust – and it is a risk.

Just see: how can you trust anybody or anything if you don't trust yourself? It is impossible. (…) It is absolutely necessary that the heart should be opened before intellect can be transformed into intelligence. (…) Intelligence is intellect in tune with your heart.

The reason why life seems meaningless to the intellectuals of the world is that the blind intellect is trying to see the light. It is impossible.

In the hands of the heart, the intellect becomes intelligent. It is a transformation, a total transformation of energy. Then the person does not become an intellectual; he simply becomes wise. Wisdom comes through the meeting of the heart and the intellect.

See with clarity that everything that you know is of the past; it is already gone. It is part of a graveyard.

Whatever you know, accumulate – information, knowledge, experience – the moment you have explored them, you are finished with them. Now carrying those empty words, that dead load, is crushing your life, burdening your life, preventing you from entering into a living, rejoicing being – which is awaiting you each moment.

The man of understanding dies every moment to the past and is reborn again to the future. His present is always a transformation, a rebirth, a resurrection. It is not a question of courage at all; that is the first thing to be understood. It is a question of clarity, of being clear about what is.

Wherever there is really a question of courage, nobody can give it to you. (…) It is something that you are born with – you just have not allowed it to grow; you have not allowed it to assert itself.

Innocence is everybody's nature.

The past corrupts because it gives you memories, experiences, expectations. All those combined make you clever, but not clear. (…) They may help you succeed in the world, but in your innermost being, you will be a failure. (…) all the success of the world means nothing (…), because ultimately, all is lost – only your inner self remains with you. At the end, only that remains which you had brought in the very beginning. You can take from this world only that which you have brought in. (…) The world is like a waiting room in a railway station; it is not your house. (…) You are just here for a few minutes, or for a few hours at the most; then you will be gone.

You don't know who you are, and to live without knowing who you are is impossible. If I don't know who I am, then what am I doing here? Then whatsoever I am doing becomes meaningless. The first and foremost thing is to know who I am. Perhaps then I can do something that fulfills my nature, makes me content, brings me home.

You don't know who you are, so some false identity is needed as a substitute. Your possessions give you that false identity.

The mind is the accumulated known. (…) If you listen to your being, it would like to go to the unfamiliar, the unknown. The being is always an adventurer. The mind is very orthodox, very conservative. It wants to move into the track, the trodden path, again and again – the path of least resistance. (…) So always listen for the unknown. And gather courage to move into the unknown. To grow your destiny needs great courage; it needs fearlessness. People who are full of fear cannot move beyond the known. (…) And once a person is tethered to the known, he is dead.

Life can only be lived dangerously – there is no other way to live it. It is only through danger that life attains to maturity, growth.

The new does not arise out of you; it comes from the beyond. It is not part of you. (…) Newness comes from existence. (…) Your whole past is at stake; your whole past pattern is going to be disturbed. The new is discontinuous with you, hence the fear. If you allow the new to enter, you will never be the same again; the new will transform you. (…) This is how it has always been; this is how it will always be.

Existence goes on showering on you, but you are enclosed in your past. You are almost in a kind of grave. You have become insensitive. Because of your cowardliness, you have lost your sensitivity. To be sensitive means the new will be felt – and the thrill of the new, and the passion for the new and the adventure will arise, and you will start moving into the unknown, not knowing where you are going. (…) Remember, anything new coming into your life is a message from God.

Memory is a dead thing. (…) Memory is persistence of that which is no more. It is living in a ghost world, but it contains us; it is our prison. In fact, it is us. Memory creates the knot, the complex called "I", the ego.

Unless you have understood that you are not the ego, you will not be able to receive the new. Once you have seen that the ego is your past memory and nothing else, that you are not your memory, that memory is just like a biocomputer, that it is a machine, a mechanism, utilitarian, but you are beyond it… you are consciousness, not memory. Memory is a content in consciousness; you are consciousness itself. (…) Memory is the whole life energy of the ego. (…) To be new, one needs to become disidentified with the ego. (…) The ego arises out of the arbitrary, the artificial, the somehow put together, the false, the pseudo. And it is just such letting go, just that death of the ego, that makes a man alive. To die in the ego is to be reborn into being.

A man really becomes a man when he accepts total responsibility – he is responsible for whatever he is. This is the first courage, the greatest courage.

You have remained married to misery for many lives. Now the time has come to divorce it.

Fear is darkness. (…) Fear is a feeling of no contact with existence, a loneliness, a vast loneliness all around. (…) It is absence of love. You cannot do anything about it, and the more you do, the more you will become fearful, because then the more you will find it impossible. The problem will become more and more complicated. If you fight with darkness, you will be defeated. (…) Do something with love; forget about fear. If you love well, fear disappears. If you love deeply, fear is not found. (…) Love unconditionally; don't ask for anything in return. (…) Ordinarily, people love only when their conditions are fulfilled. (…) When you don't love out of the fullness of your heart, you are bargaining. (…) Love is not a relationship – love is a state of being; it has nothing to do with anybody else. One is not in love; one is love.

Deep sexual orgasm gives the body at-homeness. A very, very deep health happens in the body because the body feels whole.

There are two types of living: one fear-oriented, one love-oriented. Fear-oriented living can never lead you into deep relationship.

You may be surprised when I say to you that love makes you desireless, but desire comes with discontent. You desire because you don't have. You desire because you think that if you have something, it will give you contentment. (…) If one wants to move into the world of love, one has to drop the mind; one has to live without the interference of the mind. (…) The mind has utility, but the utility is for the outside world. For the inner, it is simply irrelevant.

People who are afraid are people who are capable of tremendous love. Fear is a negative aspect of love. If love is not allowed to flow, it becomes fear. If love is allowed to flow, fear disappears. Lovers are the only people who are fearless; even death creates no problem. Only lovers can die in tremendous silence and fearlessness.

To love means to die, to die into the other. It is death, and a far deeper death than ordinary death. In the ordinary death, only the body dies; in the death of love, the ego dies. To love needs great guts. It needs one to be capable of going into it in spite of all the fears that will clamor around one. The greater the risk, the greater the possibility of growth – so nothing helps a man more in growth than love. People who are afraid of being in love remain childish, immature, unripe. It is only the fire of love that gives you ripeness.

Love is a natural state of consciousness. (…) Love is your very being. (…) Love is dangerous because it makes you an individual. And the state and the church, the politician and the priest, they don't want individuals, not at all. They want people who only look like human beings, but whose souls have been crushed so utterly, damaged so deeply, that it seems almost irreparable. (…) They have been reducing humanity to a crowd of slaves. They are destroying every possibility of rebellion in man. (…) Man has been distorted; man cannot be reduced to slavery if he is not distorted first. (…) By poisoning your love energy, they have created a split in you; they have made an enemy within you; they have divided you in two. They have created a civil war; you are always in conflict. And in conflict, your energy is dissipated; hence your life does not have zestfulness, cheerfulness. It is not overflowing with energy; it is dull, insipid; it is unintelligent. (…) Those who are in power don't want you to be intelligent, because if you are intelligent, you will start seeing the whole strategy, their games. They want you to be efficient as far as work is concerned, but otherwise stupid and mediocre. Hence humanity lives at the lowest, at the minimum of its potential.

Society does not allow any child to grow to his natural destiny. Society's every effort is to make human beings into utilities. (…) In a certain sense, it kills the soul of the child and gives him a false identity, so that he never misses his soul, his being. The false identity is a substitute. But that substitute is useful only in the same crowd which has given it to you. The moment you are alone, the false starts falling apart and the repressed real starts expressing itself. Hence the fear of being alone. Nobody wants to be lonely. Everybody wants to belong to a crowd – not only one crowd, but many crowds. (…) One wants to be supported twenty-four hours a day, because the false, without support, cannot stand. The moment one is alone, one starts feeling a strange craziness. (…) The crowd is essential for the false self to exist. The moment you are alone, you start freaking out.

After years of suppression… it will take some time for the real to express itself. The gap between the two has been called by the mystics "the dark night of the soul" – a very appropriate expression: you are no more the false; and you are not yet the real. You are in a limbo; you don't know who you are.

Meditation is only a name for being alone, silent, waiting for the real to assert itself. It is not an act; it is a silent relaxation – because whatever you "do" will come out of your false personality… all your doing, for so many years, has come out of it. It is an old habit. (…) All meditative techniques are a help to destroy the false. They don't give you the real – the real cannot be given.

So many years of living in a false personality imposed by people whom you loved, whom you respected… and they were not intentionally doing anything bad to you. Their intentions were good; just their awareness was nil – (…) they were unconscious. And even a good intention in the hand of an unconscious person turns out to be poisonous.

That which can disappear is worth disappearing. It is meaningless to cling to – it is not yours; it is not you. (…) You can lose only that which has to be lost. And it is good to lose it soon – because the longer it stays, the stronger it becomes.

In this society, nobody accepts himself; everybody is condemning himself. This is the lifestyle of the society: condemn yourself. And if you are not condemning yourself, if you are accepting yourself, you have fallen away from the society. And the society does not tolerate anybody who falls out of the fold. (…) That's why I say that in this world, to be an individual is the greatest courage. The most fearless grounding is needed to be an individual: "It does not matter that the whole world is against me. What matters is that my experience is valid." (…) Individuality and uniqueness, that means somebody has become independent of the crowd; he does not care a bit about the crowd. Your gods, your temples, your priests, your scriptures, all have become meaningless for him. Now he has his own being and his own way, his own style – to live, to die, to celebrate, to sing, to dance. He has come home. And nobody can come home with a crowd; everybody can come home only alone.

Inner sense has its own validity. But because of the scientific training, people have lost trust in their inner sense. They depend on others. (…) You depend on people's opinions so much that you have lost all track of inner sense. (…) Meditation is nothing but the discovery of the inner sense.

There is no need to think in terms of the crowd. Just think in terms of your own being. (…) You cannot be free if you struggle. (…) The crowd is not the problem – you are the problem. The crowd is not pulling you – you are being pulled, not by somebody else, but by your own unconscious conditioning. (…) The crowd cannot do anything unless you cooperate. So the question is of your cooperation. You can drop cooperation just now, just like that. (…) In the very fighting, you are emphasizing the cooperation. That's what has happened to millions of people. Somebody wants to escape from sex, then they become more and more engrossed in it. (…) The more they fight with sex, the more they are enforcing it, the more they are concentrating on it. It becomes so significant, out of all proportion. (…) The crowd cannot do anything unless you cooperate, so it's a question of your alertness. Don't cooperate! This is my observation: that whatsoever happens to you, you are responsible. Nobody else is doing it to you. You wanted it to be done, so it has been done. (…) There must have been a certain search for it. (…) So get out of your own way!

To live dangerously means to live. If you don't live dangerously, you don't live. (…) If you start getting secure, you become a stagnant pool. Then your energy is no longer moving. (…) There are only two types of people in the world. People who want to live comfortably – they are seeking death; they want a comfortable grave. And people who want to live – they choose to live dangerously, because life thrives only when there is risk. (…) Those who are courageous, they go headlong; they search all opportunities for danger. Their life philosophy is not that of insurance companies; their life philosophy is that of a mountain climber, a glider, a surfer. And not only in the outside seas they surf; they surf in their innermost seas. And not only on the outside they climb Alps and Himalayas; they seek inner peaks. (…) Only the brave, the courageous, the people who have guts, can be religious.

The mind has some difficulty in accepting the idea that there is something that is not explainable. Mind has a very mad urge for everything to be explained – if not explained, then at least explained away. Anything that remains a puzzle, a paradox, goes on troubling your mind. (…) The whole history of philosophy, religion, science, mathematics, has the same root, the same mind, the same itch. You may scratch yourself one way, somebody else may do it differently, but the itch has to be understood. The itch is the belief that existence is not a mystery. Mind can feel at home only if somehow existence is demystified. (…) Ideas are substitutes for where life is mysterious and you find gaps that cannot be filled by reality. You fill those gaps with ideas, and at least you start feeling satisfied that life is understood. (…) People have been trying to understand life, so that they could put life underneath their feet and declare, "We are the masters. Now there is nothing which is not understood by us." But it is not possible. Whatever you do, life is a mystery; and life is going to remain a mystery.

There is a beyond everywhere. We are surrounded by the beyond. That beyond is what God is; that beyond has to be penetrated. (…) Buddha says, Durangama – be available to the beyond. Never remain confined to the boundaries; always trespass the boundaries. Make the boundaries if you need them, but always remember, you have to step out. Never make imprisonments. We make many sorts of imprisonments: relationship, belief, religion – they are all imprisonments. One feels cozy because there are no wild winds blowing; one feels protected – although the protection is false, because death will come and will drag you into the beyond. Before death comes and drags you into the beyond, go on your own.

The ego is an egg, and you will have to come out of it. The ego has to be dropped. Get out of all protections and shells and securities. Then you will attain to the wider world, the vast, the Infinite. Only then you live, and you live abundantly.

All our formalities are nothing but helping each other's ego. They are lies. You say something to somebody, and he returns the compliment. Neither you nor he is true. We go on playing the game: etiquette, formalities, the civilized faces and masks.

Reduced to its essentials, there is only fear of death. All other fears are only offshoots. If death is the basic and the fundamental fear, then only one thing can make you fearless, and that is an experience within you of a deathless consciousness – a deep meditation, which reveals to you that your body will die, your mind will die, but you are beyond the body-mind structure. (…) Meditation brings you face to face with the reality.

At the last moment, when he feels that he is dying, that it is finished, a man recollects his whole past life – all his experiences, unfulfilled desires, expectations, disappointments, frustrations, sufferings, joys – everything. Buddha has a word for it, he calls it tanha. Literally it means desire, but metaphorically it means the whole life of desire. All these things happened – frustrations, fulfillments, disappointments, successes, failures – but all this happened within a certain arena you can call desire. The dying man has to see the whole of it before he moves on farther, just to recollect it, because the body is going: this mind is not going to be with him; this brain is not going to be with him. But the desire released from this mind will cling to his soul, and this desire will decide his future life. Whatever remained unfulfilled, he will move toward that target.

Your life begins far back before your birth, before your mother's impregnation, farther back, in your past life's end. That end is the beginning of this life. One chapter closes; another chapter opens. Now, how this new life will be is ninety-nine percent determined by the last moment of your death. What you collected, what you have brought with you like a seed – that seed will become a tree, bring fruits, bring flowers, or whatever happens to it. You cannot read it in the seed, but the seed has the whole blueprint.

Most people die clinging. They don't want to die, and one can understand why they don't want to die. Only at the moment of death do they recognize the fact that they have not lived. Life has simply passed as a dream, and death has come. Now, there is no more time to live – death is knocking on the door. And when there was time to live, you were doing a thousand and one foolish things, wasting your time rather than living it.

If death is without any clinging, if there is no desire to remain alive even for a single moment more, you will die consciously. You will die alert, and you will recollect the whole past. You will be able to see that whatever you have been doing was simply stupid. Desires have been fulfilled – what have you gained? Desires have remained unfulfilled and you have suffered, but what have you gained when they were fulfilled? It is a strange game in which you are always losing; whether you win or lose makes no difference. Your pleasures were nothing, just signatures made on water, and your pain was engraved on granite. And you suffered all that pain for these signatures on water. (…) Failures were failures, and successes, pleasures, were nothing but incentives to suffer pain. Successes were also failures. All your euphoria was just the function of your dream faculty. You are going with empty hands. This whole life has just been a vicious circle: you went on moving in the same circle, around and around and around. And you have not arrived anywhere.

The way you die, in the same way you are born. Your death is one side of the coin; your birth is another side of the same coin. (…) A man dying with awareness is born with awareness.

Always be ready to move from the known to the unknown, in anything, any experience. It is better, even if the unknown proves worse than the known – that is not the point. Just your change from the known to the unknown, your readiness to move from the known to the unknown, is what matters. It is immensely valuable. And in all kinds of experiences, go on doing that. That will prepare you for death. (…) You have to go inch by inch, preparing, living moment to moment. (…) Slowly, slowly, your courage will start functioning. And sharpness of intelligence is not something separate from courage; it is almost one organic whole. With fear, there is cowardliness and there is bound to be retardedness of the mind, mediocrity. They are all together; they support each other. With courage comes sharpness, intelligence, openness, an unprejudiced mind, the capacity to learn – they all come together. (…) Just start with a simple formula: Never miss the unknown. Always choose the unknown and go headlong. Even if you suffer, it is worth it – it always pays. You always come out of it more grown up, more mature, more intelligent.

You love me, you trust me; so whatever I say, you may trust it. But I insist, again and again, that anything that is not based on your experience, accept it only hypothetically. Don't make it your belief.

Meditation means that you are feeling good in your loneliness. Meditation means that you are related only to yourself. Your circle is complete with yourself; you don't go out of it.

When you are happy without silence, your happiness will be like a fever, an excitement… much ado about nothing. That feverish state will create much tension in you, and nothing will come out of it, just running, chasing. And one day, one comes to realize that the whole effort has been baseless, because you have been trying to find the other, and you have not yet found yourself.

The East has failed because it tried meditation without love; the West has failed because it tried love without meditation. Both these ways have failed. My whole effort is to give you a synthesis, the whole – which means meditation plus love. One should be able to be happy alone, and one should also be able to be happy with people. One should be happy inside, and one should also be happy in relationships. One should make a beautiful house inside, and outside too.

First, start doing meditation, because it is always good to start from the nearest center of your being, and that is meditation. But never get stuck in it. Meditation should move, flower, unfold and become love.

Everybody is afraid – has to be. Life is such that one has to be. And people who become fearless, become fearless not by becoming brave – because a brave man has only repressed his fear; he's not really fearless. A man becomes fearless by accepting his fears. It's not a question of bravery. It is simply seeing into the facts of life and realizing that these fears are natural. One accepts them. (…) When I say that you will get rid of your fear, I don't mean that there will be no fears in life. You will come to know that ninety percent of your fears are just imagination. Ten percent are real, so one has to accept them. I don't make people brave; I make them more responsive, sensitive, alert, and their alertness is enough. They become aware that they can use their fears as stepping stones.

From your very childhood, you have been taught to wear masks, beautiful masks. There is no need to have a beautiful face; just a beautiful mask will do – and the mask is cheap. To transform your face is arduous. To paint your face is very simple. (…) People have loved your mask; they have respected your character; they have glorified your garments. Now the fear arises: if I suddenly become naked, are they still going to love me, respect me, appreciate me, or will they all escape away from me? They may turn their backs; I may be left alone. Hence people go on pretending. Out of fear is the pretension; out of fear arises pseudoness. One needs to be fearless to be authentic.

One of the fundamental laws of life is this: whatsoever you hide goes on growing, and whatsoever you expose, if it is wrong, it disappears, evaporates in the sun, and if it is right, it is nourished. Just the opposite happens when you hide something. (…) The right can grow only with truth; it feeds on truth.

If you go on exposing yourself, in the beginning, it is going to be really very scary, but soon you will start gaining strength, because once truth is exposed, it becomes stronger, and untruth dies. And with the truth becoming stronger, you become rooted, you become centered. You start becoming an individual; the personality disappears, and individuality appears. Personality is bogus; individuality is substantial. Personality is just a façade; individuality is your truth. Personality is imposed from the outside; it is a persona, a mask. Individuality is your reality, as God has made you. Personality is social sophistication, social polishing. Individuality is raw, wild, strong, with tremendous power.

Fear is natural because from the very childhood you have been taught falsities, and you have become so much identified with the false that to drop it almost looks like committing suicide. And the fear arises because a great identity crisis arises. (…) Fear is natural. Don't condemn it, and don't feel that it is something wrong. It is just part of this whole social upbringing. We have to accept it and go beyond it; without condemning it, we have to go beyond it. Expose, slowly, slowly – there is no need to take jumps that you cannot manage; go by steps, gradually, and soon you will learn the taste of truth. (…) Your old identity will be lost; you will have a totally new conception. (…) You will not be able to say 'I' again with something behind it; you will use the word because it is useful, but you will know all the time that the word carries no meaning, no substance, no existential substance at all; that behind this 'I' is hidden an ocean, infinite, vast, divine.

If you can risk the false, the truth can be yours. And it is worth it, because you risk only the false, and you gain the truth. You risk nothing, and you gain all.

You cannot be truthful if you are not courageous. You cannot be loving if you are not courageous. You cannot be trusting if you are not courageous. You cannot enquire into reality if you are not courageous. Hence courage comes first, and everything else follows.

Socrates says: "A man who practices the mysteries of love will be in contact not with a reflection, but with truth itself." (…) This love that can become a contact with truth itself arises only out of your consciousness – not out of your body, but out of your innermost being.

Your mind is constantly projecting itself. (…) The mind is created by society; it is society's agent within you. It is not in your service, remember! It is in conspiracy against you – it has been conditioned by society; society has implanted many things in it. (…) Meditation means putting the mind aside, so that it no longer interferes with reality, and you can see things as they are.

A happy person belongs to himself. Why should he belong to any organization? That is the way of an unhappy person: to belong to some organization, to belong to some crowd. He has no roots within himself, and that gives him a very, very deep anxiety. He feels that he should belong; he creates a substitute belonging: a group, a political party, anything. Now he feels he belongs; a crowd is there in which he is rooted. If you belong to the crowd, no further growth is possible. One should be rooted in oneself; one should move deep into existence.

What you think is love is not love. (…) Love is the flight of your consciousness to higher realms, beyond matter and beyond body. (…) The fundamental question is how to transcend the body, how to know something within you that is beyond matter, and open your eyes toward more consciousness. Love is a by-product of a rising consciousness. (…) Your biology is your roots; your consciousness is your flowering.

Only mystics know love. Other than mystics, there is no category of human beings that has ever experienced love. Love is absolutely the monopoly of the mystic. If you want to know love, you will have to enter into the world of the mystic.

The moment love becomes attachment, it becomes a relationship. The moment love becomes demanding, it becomes a prison. (…) The man who invented the double bed was one of the greatest enemies of humanity. Even in bed, no freedom! (…) Love has to be of the quality that gives freedom, not new chains for you; a love that gives you wings and supports you to fly as high as possible. (…) Once your understanding of love blossoms, there is no question of attachment at all.

Love is a ladder. It starts with one person; it ends with the totality. Love is the beginning; God is the end.

If you don't go into love, then you are stuck with yourself. Then your life is not a pilgrimage; then your life is not a river going to the ocean – your life is a stagnant pool, dirty, and soon there will be nothing but dirt and mud. To keep clean, one needs to keep flowing. A river remains clean because it goes on flowing. Flow is the process of remaining continuously virgin. A lover remains a virgin. The people who don't love become stagnant; they start stinking sooner or later, because they have nowhere to go. Their life is dead. That's where modern man finds himself, and because of this, all kinds of neuroses, all kinds of madnesses have become rampant. Psychological illness has taken epidemic proportions. (…) You may not commit suicide by taking poison or jumping from a cliff or by shooting yourself, but you commit a suicide which is a very slow process, and that's what happens. Very few people commit suicide suddenly – gradually, slowly, slowly, they die. But the tendency to be suicidal has become almost universal.

Love will give you the first proof that life is not meaningless. The people who say that life is meaningless are the people who have not known love. All that they are saying is that their life has missed love.

Love is the natural prayer, not imposed by anybody. You are born with it. Love is the true God – not the God of theologians, but the God of Buddha, Jesus, Mohammed, the God of the Sufis. (…) Disappear as a dewdrop and become the ocean – but you will have to pass through the door of love.

You are not dying, but only an illusion is dying. (…) And only when the illusion is gone will you be able to see who you are. And that revelation brings you to the ultimate peak of joy, bliss, celebration.

In the world, as I see it, there are only two types of mind: the Greek and the Hindu. The Greek mind has a passion to know; and the Hindu mind has a passion to be. (…) Sat, being, is the very search – who am I? Not to know in a logical way, but to drown in one's own existence, so one can taste it, so one can be it – because there is no other way to know, really. (…) How can you know love? The only way is to become a lover. Be a lover, and you will know.

The mind can be used and can be put aside. (…) One should become so capable that even the closest instrument of mind can be put off.

The Upanishads say that you love yourself, really. (…) You love others for your own sake; you love yourself through others. (…) If you say that you love others, that is just the via media to love yourself, a long, roundabout way to love yourself.

Truth and the seeker cannot exist together.

We are all living in this world where parents, teachers, priests – everybody has corrupted you, displaced you, has taken away from yourself. My effort is to give your center back to you, through meditation.

Love belongs to the world of emperors, not of beggars. And a man is an emperor when he is so full of love that he can give it without any conditions. (…) First be full of love; then sharing happens. (…) Then life becomes a sheer dance of love.

Love relates, but it is not a relationship. (…) Love is relating; it is always a river, flowing, unending. (…) To relate is insecure, and a relationship is security.

Love is possible only when one has attained to being, not before. Before that, it is always something else. (…) To an ordinary state of mind, what I call love is not possible. It happens only when you have a very integrated being. Love is a function of the integrated being.

No relationship can ever come to a point where there is no problem. (…) Unless meditation is achieved, love remains a misery. Once you have learned how to live alone, once you have learned how to enjoy your simple existence, for no reason at all, then there is a possibility of solving the second, more complicated problem of people living together. Only two meditators can live in love. (…) Then it will be simply a state of love, not a relationship.

You, deep inside your being, are a riddle. The other simply is a mirror.

If you are too much a seeker for reality, then love is not for you. It is a dream, it is a fantasy, it is a fiction – it is romance, it is poetry. If you are too much a seeker after reality, obsessed with reality, then love is not for you. Then meditate.

There is no way to be certain about the other. First be certain about yourself. And a person who is certain about himself is certain about the whole world. A certainty achieved at your innermost core becomes a certainty about everything that you do and everything that happens to you. Settled, centered, grounded in yourself, you never worry about such things. You accept.

Love has to be your inner growth if it is to be authentic and real.

The more you possess, the more the ego is strengthened; without possessions, the ego cannot exist.

What you call poetry and passion are nothing but lies – with beautiful façades. Your poets are only people in a state of turmoil, emotion, passion, heat, lust, sexuality, sensuality. (…) What you call poetry is nothing but the expression of your fever, of your heated state of consciousness. It is a state of insanity. Passion is insane, blind, unconscious. (…) Love is possible only when meditation has happened. If you don't know how to be centered in your being, if you don't know how to rest and relax in your being, if you don't know how to be utterly alone and blissful, you will never know what love is.

Love appears as a relationship, but begins in solitude. Love expresses as relating, but the source of love is not in relating; the source of love is in meditating. When you are absolutely happy in your aloneness – when you don't need the other at all, when the other is not a need – then you are capable of love. If the other is your need, then you can only exploit, manipulate, dominate, but you cannot love. Because you depend on the other, possessiveness arises, out of fear. (…) You create a bondage around the person you think you love.

Love is a sharing of overflowing joy. You are too full of joy – you cannot contain it; you have to share it. Then there is poetry, and then there is something tremendously beautiful that is not of this world, that is something that comes from the beyond. This love cannot be learned, but obstacles can be removed.

Love is never ordinary; love is always extraordinary, always spiritual. That is the difference between liking and love: liking is material; love is spiritual.

Love has to arise out of lust. If you avoid lust, you will be avoiding the whole possibility of love itself. Love is not lust, true; but love is not without lust – that, too, is true. Love is higher than lust, yes; but if you destroy lust completely, you destroy the very possibility of the flower arising out of the mud. Love is the lotus; lust is the mud the lotus arises out of. Remember it; otherwise you will never attain to love. (…) Without love, nobody can transcend lust; you can only repress it. Repressed, it becomes more poisonous. It spreads into your whole system; it becomes toxic; it destroys you. Lust transformed into love gives you a glow, a radiance. (…) If people repress sex, nothing else can happen because that whole energy repressed becomes a load and pulls you down. You move toward lower stages of being. If love arises out of lust, you start rising toward higher being. (…) If you want to become a Buddha, then don't be afraid of sex. Move into it; know it well; become more and more alert about it. Be careful; it is tremendously valuable energy. It is raw material, like a raw diamond. You have to cut it, polish it; then it becomes of tremendous value. (…) Man is a sexual animal – that's how we are; that's the way life means us to be; that's how we have found ourselves here. Go into it. Without going into it, you will never be able to transform it. I'm not speaking for mere indulgence. I'm saying, move into it with deep, meditative energy to understand what it is. (…) Sex is the beginning, but not the end. Sex is just an opportunity to grow beyond it – but one has to pass through it.

Be true to love, and don't bother about partners. Whether one partner or many partners is not the question. The question is whether you are true to love. (…) You ask me whether to follow the Eastern way or the Western way. Neither; you follow the divine way. (…) Remain true to love.

The real orgasm happens inside you when your inner man and woman meet. That is the meaning of the Hindu symbolism of Ardhanarishwar. You must have seen statues of Shiva as half man, half woman – each man is half man, half woman; each woman is half woman, half man. It has to be so, because half of your being comes from your father and half of your being comes from your mother – you are both. But to reach to that inner union, you will have to find a woman outside who responds to the inner woman, who vibrates your inner being, and your inner woman, who is lying fast asleep, awakes. Through the outer woman, you have to meet the inner woman; and the same for the man. So if the relationship continues for a long period, it will be better, because that inner woman has to be awakened. (…) If you go on changing your woman and your man, you will become neurotic; you will be at a loss to finding your inner woman. (…) The outer woman is just a way to the inner woman, and the outer man is the way to the inner man. And the ultimate yoga, the ultimate mystic union happens inside you. When that happens, then you are free of all women and all men. Then you are free of man- and womanhood. Then suddenly, you go beyond; then you are neither. This is what transcendence is; this is what brahmacharya is. Then you attain again your pure virginity; your original nature is again claimed.

It is one of the great miseries that every lover has to face. There is no way for lovers to drop their strangeness, unfamiliarity, separation. In fact, the whole functioning of love is that lovers should be polar opposites. The further away they are, the more attractive. Their separation is their attraction. (…) For lovers, there is no possibility of meeting on the physical level. They will get stuck with each other; they will destroy each other. (…) It is good that love fails, because the failure of love is bound to take you on a new pilgrimage. (…) Unless you discover the world of being, you will not be able to fulfill your longing of becoming one. And the strange fact is, the day you become one with your lover, you will become one with the whole existence too. (…) It is not love that is creating the trouble; it is the ego. But the longing will not be satisfied. Birth after birth, life after life, the longing will remain there unless you discover the right door to go beyond the body and to enter the temple. (…) Keep your longing burning, aflame; don't lose heart. Your longing is the seed of your spirituality. Your longing is the beginning of the ultimate union with existence. Your lover is just an excuse.

Man is not only free; man is freedom. Man is born as freedom – that is his essential core; that's his very soul. (…) I say to you, you are absolutely free, unconditionally free. (…) Ultimately, you will be standing before existence totally responsible for yourself. (…) Out of this fear, people have chosen all kinds of determinist attitudes.

In a way, each moment, you are creating yourself. (…) The sooner you accept it, the better. (…) And the moment you create yourself, great joy arises, and when you have completed yourself, the way you wanted to, there is immense contentment, just as when a painter finishes his painting, the last touch, and a great contentment arises in his heart. A job well done brings great peace. One feels that one has participated with the Whole. The only prayer is to be creative, because it is only through creativity that you participate in the Whole; there is no other way to participate. (…) Creating a poem is nothing, creating music is nothing compared to creating yourself, creating your consciousness, creating your very being.

Freedom gives you the opportunity either to fall below the animals or to rise above the angels. Freedom is a ladder. One end of the ladder reaches hell; the other end touches heaven. It is the same ladder – the choice is yours; the direction has to be chosen by you. (…) And the wrong is always easier to do. The wrong is a downhill task, and the right is an uphill task. (…) And the higher you reach, the more there is a danger of falling. (…) It is dangerous even to aspire to those heights.

I am not giving you any discipline, because every discipline is a subtle kind of slavery. I am not giving you any commandments, because any commandments given by anybody else coming from the outside are going to imprison you, enslave you. I am only teaching you how to be free, and then leaving you to yourself. (…) Grow in consciousness; grow in freedom. Take each step out of your own choice. Create yourself and take the whole responsibility for it.

The politician and the priest are not interested in you; they are interested in channeling your energy. (…) Sex repression, tabooing sex, is the very foundation of slavery. Man cannot be free unless sex is free.; man cannot be really free unless his sex energy is allowed natural growth.

Sex is not wrong. You are wrong if you are stuck there. Move higher. The higher is not against the lower; the lower makes it possible for the higher to exist. (…) Sex is the root of almost all your problems. It has to be so because of thousands of years of poisoning. A great purification is needed. Reclaim your freedom – reclaim your freedom to love; reclaim your freedom to be. And then, life is no longer a problem – it is a mystery; it is an ecstasy; it is a benediction.

When guilt arises, you start feeling that you are wrong: you lose self-worth; you lose self-respect. And another problem arises: When there is guilt, you start pretending. (…) First, guilt creates pretension; then pretension creates alienation from people. Even the child, your own child, will not feel in tune with you. There is a barrier – your pretension. One day, you will come to know that you are just pretending, and so are others. Everybody is feeling guilty, and everybody has become just like an ugly wound. When everybody is pretending, when everybody is false, when everywhere there is deception and deceit, how can you relate? You become very sore about reality; you become very bitter. (…) Now it is very easy to make these people slaves; now it is very easy to distract them. You have distracted them from their roots.

Whenever you are half-hearted in anything, it lingers longer.

Forty-two is the age for meditation, the right age. Sex disappears; that overflowing energy is no longer there. One becomes more tranquil. Passion has gone; compassion arises. Now there is no more fever; one is not interested in the other. With sex disappearing, the other is no longer the focus. One starts returning toward one's source; the return journey starts. (…) Sex is transcended not by your effort; it happens if you have lived it totally. (…) While the energy is there, move into it as deeply as you can, and make an art of it. (…) You will come out of it purer, more innocent, more virgin. And you will have a different type of being – at ease, centered, rooted. If this happens, one day suddenly, you will see that the flood has gone, and it has left you very, very rich. You will not be sorry that it has gone. You will be thankful, because now richer worlds open. When sex leaves you, the doors to meditation open: you become capable of losing yourself in yourself; the inner orgasm of being with oneself arises.

Transcendence is a natural outgrowing: you grow above, you go beyond, just as a seed breaks and a sprout starts rising above the ground. When sex disappears, the seed disappears. In sex, you were able to give birth to somebody else, a child. When sex disappears, the whole energy starts giving birth to you. This is what Hindus have called dwija, the twice-born. Then your whole energy is turning in; it becomes an inner circle. (…) When you transcend sex, you reach to a higher sex. Ordinary sex is gross; higher sex is not gross at all. Ordinary sex is outward-moving; higher sex is inward-moving. In ordinary sex, two bodies meet, and the meeting happens on the outside. In higher sex, your own inner energies meet. It is not physical; it is spiritual – it is transcendence.

Man has outgrown the family. The utility of the family is finished; it has lived too long. It is one of the most ancient institutions, so only very perceptive people can see that it is dead already. It will take time for others to recognize the fact that the family is dead. It has done its work. It is no longer relevant in the new context of things. The family has been good and bad. It has been a help, man has survived through it; and it has been very harmful, because it has corrupted the human mind. But there was no alternative in the past; there was no way to choose anything else. It was a necessary evil. That need not be so in the future. The future can have alternative styles. (…) In a commune, a child will have a richer soul. He will be more free, less attached, less obsessed.

The very idea of bringing up children is nonsense. You can help at the most; you cannot "bring them up". (…) A child is like a tree. It is not you that are bringing up the plant; it is coming up on its own. You can help, but you cannot bring it up, and you cannot build it. (…) Children are immense mysteries. The moment you start building them up, the moment you start creating patterns and characters around them, you are imprisoning them. (…) They will do the same thing to their children, and so on. Each generation goes on giving its neurosis to the new people that come to the earth. And the society persists with all its madness, misery.

There are five secrets through which man has been turned into a slave, a cripple:

> 1) Keep man as weak as possible if you want to dominate him.
> 2) Keep man as ignorant and deluded as possible, so that he can easily be deceived.
> 3) Keep man as frightened as possible.
> 4) Keep man as miserable as possible – because a miserable man is confused; a miserable man has no self-worth; a miserable man is self-condemnatory; a miserable man feels that he must have done something wrong. A miserable man has no grounding – you can push him from here to there; he can be turned into driftwood easily. And a miserable man is always ready to be commanded, to be ordered, to be disciplined, because he knows: "On my own, I am simply miserable." He is a ready victim.
> 5) Keep men as alienated from each other as possible, so that they cannot band together for some purpose of which the priest and the politician may not approve. (…) People are kept in separate boxes with great walls around them. Everybody is classified, and there are a thousand and one barriers. (…) The trick is, first go on teaching that love is great, that love is the right thing, and then don't allow any situation where love can happen. Don't allow the opportunity. Directly encourage it; indirectly cut its roots – this is the masterpiece.

It is one of the paradoxes of the mind: whatsoever you get, you will get bored with; and whatsoever you do not get, you will long for. When you are alone, you will long for some slavery, some bondage, some attachment. When you are in bondage, you will begin to long for freedom. Really, only slaves long for freedom, and free people try again to be slaves. The mind goes on like a pendulum, moving from one extreme to the other. (…) Whenever you are doing something, go deep within yourself to find out the basic cause.

To love freedom, to try to be free, means basically that you have come to a deep understanding of yourself. Now you know that you are enough unto yourself. You can share with someone, but you are not dependent. (…) When you realize your inner consciousness, your center, only then will love not become an attachment. If you do not know your inner center, love will become an attachment. If you know your inner center, love will become devotion. But you must first be there to love. (…) First be, and then you can share your being. And that sharing will be love. Before that, whatsoever you do will become an attachment. (…) Because you are not, attachment is there. Inside, your own self is so much absent that you try to cling to anything in order to feel safe. You are not rooted, so you try to make anything your roots. When you are rooted in your self, when you know who you are, what this being is which is in you, and what this consciousness is which is in you, then you will not cling to anyone.

As you will grow in your spirituality, your sexuality is going to disappear. (…) Every meditator has found that sex starts disappearing into something tremendously different – from biology into something spiritual. (…) Conversion comes as you become more silent, as your heart becomes more harmonious, as your mind becomes more and more peaceful, as you start coming closer and closer to your being, to your very center. The energy that you had known as sexual becomes your very spirituality. It is the same energy, just the direction has changed. It is not going downward; it is moving upward.

If celibacy comes by itself, then it will never bring any perversion; then it will bring a great conversion of energies.

Joy is the criterion. If you are growing in joy, you are growing and you are going toward home. With indifference, there is no possibility that joy can grow. In fact, if you have any joy, that will disappear. (…) Indifference is a pseudo-coin; it only looks like detachment. Nothing will be growing in it. You will simply shrink and die. There are so many monks in the world – catholic, hindu, jaina, buddhist – watch them. They don't give a radiant feeling; they don't have the aura of fragrance; they don't look more alive than you are. In fact, they look less alive, crippled, paralyzed. Controlled, of course, but not in a deep, inner discipline; controlled but not conscious. Following a certain conscience that society has given to them but not yet aware, not yet free, not yet individuals. They live as if they are already in their graves, just waiting to die. Their life becomes morose, monotonous, sad – it is a sort of despair. (…) Beware. Whenever something goes wrong, there are indications in your being.

Remember, love is not attachment. Love knows no attachment, and that which knows attachment is not love. That is possessiveness, domination, clinging, fear, greed – it may be a thousand and one things, but it is not love.

The soul can grow only in freedom; love gives freedom. And when you give freedom, you are free; that's what detachment is. If you enforce bondage on the other, you will be imprisoning yourself at the same time. If you bind the other, the other will bind you; if you define the other, the other will define you; if you are trying to possess the other, the other will possess you.

The moment you are born, a subtle indicator is placed within you. (…) When you are unhappy, you know; when you are happy, you know. It is an intrinsic value. You know it, you are born knowing it; so let that intrinsic indication be used and it will never falsify your life.

You are alone. Aloneness is your very nature.

Only man has the possibility of going vertical, upward, not just horizontal. (…) Most of humanity behaves like other animals: life is just growing old – not growing up. Growing up and growing old are totally different experiences.

The moment you move out of the crowd, you also move out of your personality. (…) The moment you move out of the crowd, what is your identity, who are you? (…) In your aloneness you will have to discover again, afresh, and nobody can guarantee whether you will find anybody inside or not. Those who have reached to aloneness have found nobody there. I really mean nobody – no name, no form, but a pure presence, a pure life, nameless, formless. This is exactly the true resurrection, and it certainly needs courage. Only very courageous people have been able to accept with joy their nobodiness, their nothingness. Their nothingness is their pure being; it is a death and a resurrection both.

A sannyasin means one who is sufficient unto himself, who does not need anyone, who is not in any way dependent. (…) Jesus says, blessed are the solitary… People who can live with themselves as easily as if the whole world were there with them, who can enjoy themselves just like small children. (…) A solitary becomes an elect; he is the chosen, the chosen one of existence. Why? – Because a solitary never desires anything in this world: this school is finished; he has passed through it – he has transcended it. He has become like a high peak, which remains alone in the sky. (…) The solitary is the elect. What has the solitary chosen? He has chosen only his own being. And when you choose your own being, you have chosen the being of the whole universe. When you choose yourself, you have chosen God, and when you choose God, God has chosen you – you have become the elect. (…) A solitary, a sannyasin – that's what sannyasin means, a solitary being, a wanderer, absolutely happy in his aloneness. If somebody walks by his side, it is okay, it is good. If somebody leaves, it is also okay, it is good. He never waits for anybody and never looks back. Alone, he is whole. This beingness, this wholeness, makes you a circle. And the beginning and the end meet; the alpha and the omega meet. A solitary is not like a line. You are like a line – your beginning and end will never meet. A solitary is a circle; his beginning and end meet. That's why Jesus says, Because you come from it, you shall go there again – you will become one with the source; you have become a circle.

Aloneness is the ultimate reality: one comes alone; one goes alone. And between these two alonenesses, we create all kinds of relationships and fighting, just to deceive ourselves – because in life also, we remain alone.

Finding oneself, one finds the meaning of life, the significance of life, the joy of life, the splendor of life. Finding oneself is the greatest finding in man's life, and this finding is possible only when you are alone. When your consciousness is not crowded by anything, by anybody, when your consciousness is utterly empty – in that emptiness, in that nothingness, a miracle happens. And that miracle is the foundation of all religions. The miracle is that when there is nothing else for your consciousness to be conscious of, the consciousness turns upon itself. It becomes a circle. And the moment the circle is complete, you are no longer just an ordinary human being; you have become part of the godliness that surrounds existence. You are no longer yourself; you have become part of the whole universe – your heartbeat is now the heartbeat of the universe itself.

Unless you know yourself as eternal beings, part of the Whole, you will remain afraid of death.

Forgetfulness of yourself is the only sin there is, and to remember yourself is the only virtue. Gautama Buddha emphasized one single word continually for forty-two years, morning and evening; the word is sammasati – it means right remembering.

To be alone is a great opportunity, a blessing, because in your aloneness you are bound to stumble upon yourself and for the first time remember who you are. (…) Become more centered in your deep aloneness. That's what meditation is: becoming centered in one's own aloneness. The aloneness has to be so pure that not even a thought, not even a feeling disturbs it. The moment your aloneness is complete, your experience of it will become your enlightenment.

The person who is not intelligent is one who is running around all over the world in search of something, not knowing exactly what – sometimes thinking, perhaps it is money; sometimes thinking, perhaps it is power; sometimes thinking, perhaps it is prestige; sometimes thinking, perhaps it is respectability. The intelligent man first searches his own being before he starts a journey in the outer world. That seems to be simple and logical: at least, first look inside your own house before you go searching all over the world. And those who have looked within themselves have found it, without any exception.

My work here consists of taking you out of any kind of organized effort – because truth can never be organized. You have to go alone on the pilgrimage, because the pilgrimage is going to be inside. You cannot take anybody with you. And you have to drop everything that you have learned from others, because all those prejudices will distort your vision – you will not be able to see the naked reality of your being. The naked reality of your being is the only hope of finding God.

It may take a little time, because old habits die hard. Even if you close your eyes, thoughts will go on crowding you. Those thoughts are from the outside. (…) Just watch your thoughts; just be a witness. Don't condemn them; don't justify them; don't rationalize them. Remain aloof; remain indifferent; let them pass – they will be gone. And the day your mind is absolutely silent, with no disturbance, you have taken the first step that takes you to the temple of God. The temple of God is made of your consciousness. Everybody has to go there alone.

To be an insider in this world is to get lost. The worldly is the insider; a Buddha is bound to remain an outsider. All Buddhas are outsiders. Even if they are in a crowd, they are alone. Even if they are in the marketplace, they are not there. Even if they relate, they remain separate. There is a kind of subtle distance that is always there. And that distance is freedom; that distance is great joy; that distance is your own space.

My approach is always: whatsoever existence has given to you must be a subtle necessity of your soul; otherwise it would not have been given in the first place.

Only a person who is capable of being alone is capable of love. Lonely persons cannot love. Their need is so much that they cling. Lonely persons cannot love; they can only exploit. They don't have it to give; they have nothing to give. Only a person who knows how to be alone and joyous is so full of love that he can share it. He can share it with strangers. And all are strangers, remember.

This whole life is a strange land; we come from some unknown source. Suddenly we are here, and one day suddenly we are gone, back to the original source. This is a few days' journey; make it as joyous as possible.

Your sadness is certainly more real because it is yours; it is authentic. Your happiness is shallow – it is not yours; it depends on something, somebody. And anything that makes you dependent, however happy you can feel for a few moments, soon the honeymoon is over – sooner than you had ever expected. (…) Happiness remains shallow, very thin; just scratch a little bit and you will find its opposite.

Misery has only one meaning: that things are not fitting with your desires – and things never fit with your desires; they cannot. Things simply go on following their nature. Lao Tzu calls this nature Tao; Buddha calls this nature Dhamma; Mahavira has defined religion as the nature of things. Nothing can be done; (…) don't try to impose your will on the nature of things. That is what the stupid man goes on doing, creating misery for himself, creating hell. The wise man is one who relaxes with the nature of things, who follows the nature of things. (…) The man of understanding goes with the river, flows with the flow, moves with the wind. Slowly, slowly, the understanding that 'nothing is in my hands' becomes surrender. And that surrender brings great benediction; that surrender brings bliss.

Except for awareness, nothing changes a person; nothing at all. (…) People who try to control themselves have chosen a very foolish way. (…) You are fighting with leaves, branches, cutting them here and there. That is not the way to destroy the tree of desire; the way is to cut the roots. (…) On the surface there are only branches – jealousy, anger, envy, hatred, lust. The deeper you move, the more you will understand: they are all coming out of one root; and that root is unawareness. Meditation means awareness. It cuts the very root. Then the whole tree disappears on its own accord. Then passion becomes compassion.

The person who is moving into meditation, or who is on the path of love, will be helped if he accepts the world as it is. Worldly people never accept the world as it is – they are always trying to change it. They are always trying to make something else; they are always trying to fix things into a different order; they are always trying to do something outside. The religious person accepts whatsoever is on the outside as it is. He is not disturbed, not distracted by the outside. His whole work consists of moving inside. One moves through love, another moves through meditation, but both move inside. The religious world is the world of the within. And the within is the beyond.

Happiness happens when you fit with your life, when you fit so harmoniously that whatsoever you are doing is your joy. Then suddenly you will come to know that meditation follows you. Then nothing distracts you; you will not allow the world to distract you.

Your destiny can find you in only one way, and that is your inner flowering, as existence wanted you to be. (…) You have to drop all those patterns that have been forced on you, and you have to find your own inner flame.

What you know as happiness is nothing but a relative state, a relative phenomenon. What the Buddhas call happiness is something absolute; it is inner.

Happiness will depend on where you are in consciousness. If you are asleep, then pleasure is happiness. Pleasure means sensation, trying to achieve something through the body that is not possible to achieve through the body – forcing the body to achieve something it is not capable of. People are trying, in every possible way, to achieve happiness through the body. The body can give you only momentary pleasures, and each pleasure is balanced by pain in the same amount, to the same degree. Each pleasure is followed by its opposite, because the body exists in the world of duality. Just as the day is followed by night, and death is followed by life, and life is followed by death; it is a vicious circle. Your pleasure will be followed by pain; your pain will be followed by pleasure. But you will never be at ease. When you are in a state of pleasure, you will be afraid that you are going to lose it, and that fear will poison it. And when you are lost in pain, of course, you will be suffering and you will make every possible effort to get out of it – only to fall back into it. Buddha calls this the wheel of birth and death. We go on moving with this wheel, clinging to the wheel, and the wheel moves on. Sometimes pleasure comes up and sometimes pain comes up – we are crushed between these two rocks, but the sleeping person knows nothing else. (…) To the sleeping person, pleasurable sensations are happiness. The sleeping person lives from one pleasure to another pleasure; he is just rushing from one sensation to another sensation. He lives for small thrills; his life is very superficial. It has no depth; it has no quality. He lives in a world of quantity.

Pleasure is animal; happiness is human; bliss is divine. Pleasure binds you; it is a bondage. Whatever you call pleasure is, at the most, just relief from a tense state. Happiness gives you a little more rope, a little bit of freedom, but only a little bit. Bliss is absolute freedom. You start moving upwards; it gives you wings.

The ultimate happens only when you are fully awake, when you are a Buddha, when all sleep is gone and all dreaming is gone – when your whole being is full of light, when there is no darkness within you. All darkness has disappeared and with that darkness, the ego is gone. All tensions have disappeared, all anguish, all anxiety. You are in a state of total contentment. You live in the present; no past, no future anymore. You are utterly here-now. This moment is all. Now is the only time, and here is the only space. And then suddenly the whole sky drops into you.

This is bliss. This is real happiness. Seek bliss; it is your birthright. Don't remain lost in the jungle of pleasures; rise a little higher. Reach to happiness, and then bliss.

Pleasure you have to beg from others; naturally you become dependent. (…) Pleasure will keep you a driftwood. Money, power, prestige – pleasure will make you more and more cunning, calculating, political, exploitative. Pleasure will make you more and more a slave. (…) Bliss makes you a Master.

Joy is spiritual. It has nothing to do with the outside, with the other; it is an inner phenomenon. Joy is not dependent on circumstances; it is your own. It is not a titillation produced by things; it is a state of peace, of silence – a meditative state.

Bliss means you have reached to the very innermost core of your being. It belongs to the ultimate depth of your being where even the ego is no more, where only silence prevails; you have disappeared. In joy, you exist a little bit; but in bliss, you are not. The ego has dissolved; it is a state of non-being. Buddha calls it nirvana. Nirvana means you have ceased to be; you are just an infinite emptiness like the sky. (…) Bliss is your innermost nature. Bliss is your innermost core. Bliss is not an object to be found anywhere else; it is your consciousness.

In the East, we have always defined the ultimate truth as sat-chit-anand. Sat means truth; chit means consciousness, anand means bliss. This is the true trinity. The true trinity is truth, consciousness, bliss. And they are not separate phenomena, but one energy expressed in three ways, one energy with three faces. Hence in the East, we say God is trimurti – God has three faces. (…) Truth, consciousness, bliss – these are the ultimate truths. First comes truth. As you enter, you become aware of your eternal reality – sat, truth. As you go deeper into your reality, into your truth, you become aware of consciousness, a tremendous consciousness. All is light; nothing is dark. All is awareness; nothing is unawareness. You are just a flame of consciousness, not even a shadow of unconsciousness anywhere. And when you enter still deeper, then the ultimate core is bliss – anand. Buddha says: Forgo everything that you have thought meaningful, significant, up to now. Sacrifice everything for this ultimate, because this is the only thing that will make you contented, that will make you fulfilled, that will bring spring to your being… and you will blossom into a thousand and one flowers.

We come with empty hands, and we will leave with empty hands; so what is the point of claiming so much in the meantime? (…) This is what the world tells us: possess, dominate, have more than others have. It may be money or it may be virtue; it does not matter in what kind of coins you deal – they may be worldly, they may be otherworldly. But be very clever, otherwise you will be exploited. Exploit and don't be exploited.

In the Bhagavad Gita, Krishna says: Don't think of the result at all. (…) Just be in a state of let-go. (…) Jesus says: Remember, those who are first in this world will be the last in the kingdom of God, and those who are the last will be the first. He has given you the fundamental law.

In ordinary life, in the life of the unawakened, there are moments of bliss and there are moments of misery; it is all mixed, a hodgepodge. You cannot keep those moments of happiness that come to you. They come on their own and they disappear on their own; you are not the master. And you cannot avoid the moments of misery; they too have their own persistence. They come on their own and they go on their own; you are simply left a victim. And between those two – happiness and unhappiness – you are torn apart. You are never left at ease.

This being torn apart into all kind of dualities… The duality of happiness and unhappiness is the most fundamental and the most symptomatic, but there are a thousand and one dualities: the duality of love and hate, the duality of life and death, youth and old age, summer and winter, and so on, and so forth. And you are torn apart, pulled into different, polar-opposite directions. You cannot be at ease – you are in a dis-ease. According to the Buddhas, man is a dis-ease.

Happiness turning into unhappiness simply shows that the two are not separate; they are two aspects of the same coin. And if you have one side of the coin, the other is always there hidden behind it. (…) Your happiness is not really happiness, but only a hidden unhappiness. Your love is not really love, but only a mask for your hate. Your compassion is nothing but your anger – cultivated, sophisticated, educated, cultured, civilized, but your compassion is nothing else than anger.

We have been told to achieve, to be ambitious. Our mind has been cultivated to be that of an achiever. Our education, culture, religion, they all depend on this basic idea that man has to be ambitious; only the ambitious man will be able to attain fulfillment. It has never happened; it will never happen – but so deep is the ignorance that we go on believing in this nonsense. (…) Nothing fails like success. Although you have been told that nothing succeeds like success, I say to you that nothing fails like success.

Character is not you; it is something that you have cultivated. (…) I don't believe in character at all. My trust is in consciousness. (…) You can change one side of your life, but whatsoever you throw in will start expressing itself from some other corner. It is bound to be so. (…) The real work consists in changing your consciousness, in becoming conscious – more conscious, more intensely and passionately conscious. When you are conscious, it is impossible to be angry; it is impossible to be greedy; it is impossible to be jealous; it is impossible to be ambitious. And when all anger, greed, ambition, jealousy, possessiveness, lust disappear, then the energy involved in them is released. That energy becomes your bliss. (…) The meeting of your consciousness with the beyond is the point of bliss, true happiness. (…) If you become a pool of immense energy, undistracted by any worldly thing, it happens.

This neurosis that you call society, culture, education, this neurosis has a subtle structure. The structure is this: it gives you symbolic ideas so that reality by and by is clouded, becomes clouded; you can't see the real, and you start becoming attached to the unreal.

The most intelligent child will be the most bored child – because nothing can keep his interest for long: "Now what? What next? This is finished. I have seen this; I have looked into it; I have analyzed it; now I am finished – what is next?" By the time he becomes a youth, he is already bored. (…) If you are stupid, you can go on. Then it is a merry-go-round; then you move from one sensation to another. You are interested in trivia and you go on repeating; and you are not conscious enough to see the repetition. (…) How can intelligence avoid boredom? It is impossible. Intelligence means seeing things as they are. (…) Do whatever – finally you are bored; every act brings boredom. The intelligent person sees it. The sooner you see it, the more intelligence you show. Then what is left? Then only boredom is left, and one has to meditate over it. There is no way to escape from it. Then go into it; and if you can keep going into it, it leads into enlightenment.

Man is miserable. He lives in anxiety, anguish, and frustration. There seems to be no way out except drugs. The only way to prevent the use of drugs will be to make people joyful, happy, blissful. (…) The suffering humanity is also in the hands of the politicians, because the suffering humanity needs some hope – the hope of a classless society somewhere in the future, the hope of a society where there will be no poverty, no hunger, no misery. In short, people can manage and be patient with their sufferings if they have a utopia just on the horizon. And you must note the meaning of the word utopia. It means "that which never happens". It is a hallucination. (…) Drugs, religions and politicians destroy your inner growth toward spirituality. They prevent you from reaching the promised land. They give you a toy, and you remain hanging around hallucinations, while you are capable of reaching the real.

Remember: you are the world problem. You are the problem, and unless you are solved, whatever you do is going to make things more complicated. First, put your own house in order; create a cosmos there – it is a chaos. (…) People who have not solved their own inner consciousness yet, and who are ready to jump on everybody else and solve everybody else's problems – these people have created more troubles in the world than they have solved. They are avoiding their own reality – they don't want to face it. They want to remain engaged somewhere else with somebody else. This gives them something to do; it is a good distraction. (…) Yes, there are problems, I agree – but still I insist, the problem arises in the individual soul. The problem is there because individuals are in chaos. The overall chaos is nothing but a combined phenomenon. (…) The beginning has to be with you. You are the world problem. So don't avoid the reality of your inner world – that is the first thing.

The human mind as such is a daydreaming faculty. Unless you go beyond the mind, you will continue to daydream. The mind cannot exist in the present – it can either exist in the past or in the future. There is no way for the mind to exist in the present. To be in the present is to be without mind.

Mind is just a blanket term, an umbrella term; it simply holds your whole past; it is nothing else. If by and by you take your past out of the bag, the bag will disappear.

Meditation simply means a few moments when you are not in the mind, a few moments when you slip out of the mind. You slip into reality, into that which is. These existential moments are so tremendously ecstatic that once you taste them, you will stop daydreaming. Daydreaming will continue unless you start tasting meditation.

Whatever you think about yourself starts happening. You create your world by your thought; you create your world by your desire. Whatsoever you insist on starts happening. Reality goes on cooperating with you. It waits for the moment, for the day when you will cooperate with it. Until then, it goes on cooperating with you.

This is what goes on happening to each mind – you long for something, it will happen, but by the time it happens, you will see that you are still discontent. Something else is creating the misery now. This is something to be understood – if your desire is not fulfilled, you are frustrated; if it is fulfilled, then too you are frustrated. That is the misery of desire. Fulfilled, you are not fulfilled. And this goes on and on and on – unless you understand and simply jump out of the wheel.

If your happiness has a condition to it, you will remain unhappy. (…) You will always find something missing, something absent. And that "missing" will become your daydream again. And you cannot achieve a state where everything, everything, is available. Even if it were possible, then too you would not be happy. If everything is available as you want it, suddenly you will feel bored.

The mind will never allow you to be happy. Whatever the condition, the mind will always find something to be unhappy about. Mind is a mechanism to create unhappiness; its whole function is to create unhappiness.

Take care of yourself. Find a right soil for your being, find a right climate, and go deeper and deeper into yourself. Don't explore the world; explore your nature.

People are not one piece; they are many fragments, somehow holding themselves together. They can fall apart at any moment. Any new situation, any new danger, any insecurity, and they can fall apart.

One should grow toward Buddhahood, but people grow in just the opposite direction.

Buddha says, Live in joy, in peace, even among the troubled. You cannot change the whole world. You have a small lifespan; it will be gone soon.

When you are outwardly rich, in contrast, your inner poverty can be seen more clearly. Outside there is light all around, and inside you are a dark island.

The winner sows hatred because the loser suffers. Let go of winning and losing and find joy. (…) Whether you lose or win is immaterial. Death takes away everything. The only thing that matters, and it has always been so, is how you played the game.

Truth cannot be borrowed. It cannot be studied in books. Nobody can inform you about it. You have to sharpen your intelligence yourself, so that you can look into existence and find it.

The whole world lives in psychological slavery.

Authority belongs to individual experience; it creates freedom. Authoritarianism belongs to somebody else; hence it creates slavery.

Society is not an existential reality. It is created by man because man is asleep.

Each individual has to become a meditator, a silent watcher, so that he can discover himself. And this discovery is going to change everything around him.

God, fate, destiny – these are bogus words, mumbo jumbo, nothing more than that. Drop them completely, because dropping them will make you an individual fully responsible for your acts. And unless you take the responsibility on yourself, you will never become strong, you will never become independent, you will never taste freedom. (…) The cost of freedom is to accept responsibility in its totality.

A rebel is one who does not react against the society, who understands the whole game of it and simply slips out of it. It becomes irrelevant to him. He is not against it. And that is the beauty of rebellion: it is freedom. The revolutionary is not free. He is constantly fighting with something: how can he be free? He is constantly reacting against something: how can there be freedom in reaction? Freedom means understanding. One has understood the game, and seeing that this is the way that the soul is prevented from growing, the way one is not allowed to be oneself, one simply gets out of it with no scar on the soul. One forgives and forgets and remains without any clinging to the society in the name of love or in the name of hate. Society has simply disappeared for the rebel. He may live in the world or he may go out of the world, but he belongs to it no more; he is an outsider. (…) Revolution is of the crowd; rebellion is of the individual. Rebellion is your own individuality. (…) Rebellion is one, single. In rebellion, destructiveness and creativity go hand in hand, supporting each other.

Man is not born perfect. He is born incomplete. He is born as a process. He is born on the way, as a pilgrim. That is his agony and his ecstasy too – agony because he cannot rest; he has to go ahead. He has to seek and search and explore; he has to become, because his being arises only through becoming. Becoming is his being. He can only be if he is on the move. Evolution is intrinsic to man's nature; evolution is his very soul. (…) Man is born as a potential; that is unique to man. When the potential becomes the actual, only then is man fulfilled. (…) All other animals are born complete. There is no evolution between their birth and their death. They move horizontally; the vertical never penetrates them. If man also moves horizontally, he will miss his manhood; he will not become a soul.

Truth is realized through three stages: assimilation (the camel, "yes"), independence (the lion, "no"), and creativity (the child). (…) From the camel to the lion, it is evolution. From the lion to the child, it is revolution. A Master is needed at that stage. (…) The camel lives in the past; the lion lives in the future; the child lives in the present, here-now. The camel is pre-mind; the lion is mind; the child is post-mind. The camel is pre-self; the lion is self; the child is post-self. That's what the meaning of the state of no-mind is. Sufis call it fana – the ego is gone; the other too. They are both together; you cannot have one without the other. I-thou are part of one energy; they both disappear. The child simply is… ineffable, indefinable, a mystery, a wonder. The camel has memory; the lion has knowledgeability; the child has wisdom. The camel is theist; the lion is atheist; the child is religious – the quality of love and innocence.

Independence enters only through the door of 'no'; through the door of 'yes', only dependence.

The East surrenders because there is no more possibility of becoming a lion. It feels very comfortable, easy to surrender, to become part of a mob, a mass. The West has created the ego, and whenever the Western mind surrenders, there is really a great transformation. (…) So it may appear paradoxical to you, but each individual has to be taught the ego before he will be able to drop it. Each individual has to come to a very crystallized ego; only then is the dropping of any help, otherwise not.

Marriage itself is a prostitution. If I trust my love, why should I get married? The very idea of getting married is a sign of distrust. (…) Love is authentic when it gives freedom. Let this be your criterion. Love is true only when it does not interfere in the privacy of the other person. It respects his individuality, his privacy. But the lovers that you see around the world, their whole effort is that nothing should be private; all secrets should be told to them. They are afraid of individuality; they destroy each other's individuality and they hope that by destroying each other, their lives will become a contentment, a fulfillment. They simply become more and more miserable.

Be loving, and remember that everything is always changing. Existence is a constant change.

The first thing, and the most basic thing to be understood, is that whatsoever you do, it should not be a reaction. If it is an act, then there is no problem. Action is always good; reaction always bad. (…) Reaction means you are acting unconsciously. (…) We react according to our conditionings; we react because we have been conditioned in a certain way. (…) If you are awake, alert, conscious, no one can say what turn any situation will take. A thousand and one alternatives open for consciousness. Consciousness is total freedom. (…) Awareness is the key. If you become aware, everything follows. (…) Awareness brings freedom.

Control needs to be dropped as much as license. (…) Control and license both go down the same drain. They are two aspects of the same coin, and in awareness they are not needed. (…) All controlled people are bubbling inside, waiting to explode into licentiousness. (…) So the only thing to be constantly remembered is self-remembrance. You should not forget yourself. And always move from the innermost core of your being. Let actions flow from there, from your very center of being, and whatever you do will be virtuous.

Virtue is a function of awareness. If you do something from the periphery, it may not look like a sin, but it is a sin. Society may be happy with you, but you cannot be happy with yourself. Society may praise you, but deep down you will go on condemning yourself, because you will know that you have missed life, and missed it for nothing. (…) You have missed godliness for gossip. You have missed life for these foolish people who are all around, for the sake of their good opinion. (…) Live life from your very center; that is what meditation is all about. And by and by, you will come to feel a discipline that is not forced, not cultivated, which arises spontaneously, arises naturally like a flower blooms. Then you will have the whole of life available, and you will have your whole being available. And when your whole being and the whole life meet, between the two arises that which is freedom. Between the two arises that which is nirvana.

There are many kinds of freedom – social, political, economic, but they are only superficial. True freedom has a totally different dimension to it. It is not concerned with the outside world at all; it arises within you. It is freedom from all kinds of conditioning, religious ideologies, political philosophies. All that has been imposed on you by others fetters you, chains you, imprisons you, makes you spiritually a slave. Meditation is nothing but the destruction of all these fetters and conditionings, the destruction of the whole prison, so that you can again be free under the sky and the stars, out in the open, available to existence.

The more responsible you become, the more free you become; or, the more free you become, the more you take responsibility. Then you have to be very alert about what you are doing and what you are saying. You have to be conscious about even your smallest gestures, because there is nobody else to control you.

On the outside, we are interdependent. Nobody can be absolutely independent. Life is interdependence. Not only are you interdependent with people, you are interdependent with everything – the trees, the sun, the moon, the stars. Even the smallest grass leaf is related to the greatest star. (…) Understand that the outer interdependence is inevitable; it is part of how things are. Accept it joyously. (…) Freedom has nothing to do with the outside; one can be free even in an actual prison. Freedom is something inner; it is of the consciousness.

The ego is a false identity. Because we are not separate, how can we have egos? As far as language is concerned, it is utilitarian to use the word "I", but it has no substance to it. It is pure shadow, utterly empty. A useful word, utilitarian, but not real. (...) Your idea of freedom is rooted somewhere in the idea of the ego.

Watch, and witness the whole process of your thoughts. Slowly you will become aware that you are not any thought – you are not mind at all. You are pure witness. The experience of pure witnessing is the experience of total freedom, but it is an inward phenomenon. And a person who is inwardly totally free has no hankering to be outwardly free. Such a person is capable of accepting nature as it is. (…) Only a person who is really free can surrender.

My own experience is that unless you become a creator in some way, your life will remain empty and sad. The only blissful people are the creators. It may be simply the creation of more consciousness, more experience of truth, bliss. It may be an inner world of creativity, or it may be something outer. But freedom has to become responsible, positive.

People are really in deep fear of freedom, although they talk about freedom. My own experience is that very few people really want freedom, because they are subconsciously aware that freedom will bring many problems they are not ready to deal with. They would rather remain in a cozy imprisonment. The alternative means you have to do something with your freedom. You have to be ready to be a seeker, a searcher, a creator, but very few people want to go on a pilgrimage, or go into deeper silences of the heart, or take the responsibility of love. The implications are great.

Don't trust too much in a beautiful future. History teaches us something else. (…) Your priority should remain your own growth. The priority should be your attainment of spiritual freedom. (…) Meditation will help to make you an individual; and only a commune of individuals who are all spiritually free, who have broken all the bridges that go back to the past, will have eyes that are fixed on faraway stars. (…) And unless we fill the world with these people, the world is just going to exchange one tyranny for another. It will be an exercise in utter futility. (…) You are the priority. Get to your roots, find yourself, become a rebel, and create as many rebels as possible. That's the only way you can help future mankind to create a golden future.

The rebellion I am talking about is not to be done against anybody. It is not really a rebellion, but only an understanding. You are not to fight with the outer priests, nuns, parents. And you are not to fight, either, with the inner priest, nuns, parents. Because outer or inner doesn't matter; they are separate from you. The outer is separate; the inner too is separate. The inner is only the reflection of the outer. (…) I am not teaching you to fight with your conditionings. Understand them. Become more intelligent about them. Just see how they dominate you, how they influence your behavior, how they have shaped your personality, how they go on affecting you. Just watch! Be meditative. And one day, when you have seen the working of your conditionings, suddenly a balance is attained. In your very understanding, you are free. Understanding is freedom, and that freedom I call rebellion. (…) You just have to be a witness. And the witnessing is your original face; the one who witnesses is your real consciousness. That which is witnessed is conditioning. The one who witnesses is the transcendental source of your being.

Man has two possibilities: either he can grow old like every other animal, or he can grow up. Growing up means getting rid of all dependence. Naturally, in the beginning, it will create fear.

You are surrounded by your own projections, and you are thinking that you are protected.

A man of understanding unburdens himself, and all the chains disappear.

I say to you that the present is the only reality there is. The future is your imagination, and the past is your memory. They don't exist. What exists is the present moment. To be fully alert in the present, to gather your consciousness from past and future and concentrate in the present, is to know the taste of freedom.

Except in man, there exists no slavery in the world. (…) The reality is: you are clinging to your slavery. (…) Deep down, you desire tyrants, dictators. Deep down, you want somebody to dictate the terms and style of your life. You are so afraid of making mistakes. But remember, that is the way of life. This is how one becomes wise. This is how one becomes an individual.

A human being's life is short. Be decisive about it; you have to be free in your soul, because that is the only freedom there is.

Soul you bring with you. The self is created by the society as a substitute, so that you need not feel without identity. Society, the educational system, parents, the priests – everybody around you tries in every way to create such a strong self that you never become aware of the hidden soul. (…) Your soul is part of existence. Your self is a social institution. So the first thing to remember is that the distinction is unbridgeable. If you want to seek and know who you really are, you will have to go through a radical change of destroying your own self. If you don't destroy the self, and by some accident you come to discover the soul, you will not be one. That's what is called "schizophrenia" by the psychologists. You will be split. Sometimes you will behave like the self, and sometimes like the soul. You will be in a constant tension. Your life will become simply a deep anguish and anxiety – and it is impossible to live such a life.

The self is not a simple thing – it is very complex. (…) And the self goes on accumulating more and more – its ambition is unfulfillable. You go on and on creating more and more layers of self. This is the misery of man, the basic misery. Man does not know who he is; yet he goes on believing that he is this, he is that.

(…) You go on believing in the self for your whole life. (…) Because you have forgotten your reality, and you are living with a false substitute, all your actions become hypocritical. You smile, but the smile is not coming from your heart. You weep, you cry, but the tears are very superficial. You love, but your love has no roots in your being. All your actions are as if you are a somnambulist, a person who walks in his sleep. (…) Your false self is your sleep. The soul is your awakening.

To know is to be free, free from all prisons: the prisons of the body, the prisons of the mind, the prisons that exist outside you.

Fear is nonsubstantial as your shadow, but it is. (…) You can start running because of your own shadow. Your running will be real; your escaping will be real – but the cause will be nunsubstantial. (…) If you come back and you look closely and you observe, you will laugh at the stupidity of it. But people are afraid to come to places where fear exists. People are more afraid of fear than anything else, because the very existence of fear shakes your very foundations.

You cannot conquer fear. Fear has to be understood. The moment you start thinking of conquering it, you have already accepted its existence, its power over you. And fear is just like a shadow: you can fight with it, but you cannot win. On the path one has to be very aware whether one is fighting with something that does not exist but is only one's own projection; otherwise the journey goes on becoming longer and longer.

Fear is poison to intelligence. How can you be intelligent if there is fear? The fear will go on pulling you in different ways. It will not allow you to be courageous; it will not allow you to step into the unknown; it will not allow you to become an adventurer; it will not allow you to leave the fold, the crowd. It will not allow you to become independent, free; it will keep you a slave. And we are slaves in so many ways, (…) and fear is the root cause of it.

Fear is made of ignorance of one's self. There is only one fear. It manifests in many ways, but basically fear is one; and that is that "deep inside, I may not be". And in a way, it is true that you are not. (…) This false ego which you have created by not looking in, by continuously looking out, is the root cause of fear. (…) All your fears are by-products of identification. (…) If you go deep down into any fear, you will find the fear of death.

Nothing is ever born out of fear. Love gives birth; love is creative. But fear is impotent; (…) fear is utterly impotent. Fear has never created anything – it cannot create; it is not. But it can destroy your whole life: it can surround you like a dark, dark cloud; it can exploit all your energies. It will not allow you to move into any deep experience of beauty, poetry, love, joy, celebration, meditation. No, it will keep you just on the surface, because it can exist only on the surface. It is a ripple on the surface.

Out of fear you are not going to grow. You will only shrink and die. Fear is in the service of death. (…) People who are full of fear cannot move beyond the known.

You have an inner sky; it is empty. Clouds come and go; things come and go… and the sky remains the same. We call that inner sky the witness, the watcher – and that is the whole goal of meditation.

Your fear is driving you toward trying to be special, but that will not change the situation. (…) In trying to be special, you are running further and further away from yourself. The further away you go from yourself, the further away you are from knowing the truth. (…) You will go on running further and further away from yourself in search of something that can take away your fear, your paranoia, your death. But the further away you are, the more will be the fear, the more will be the paranoia, the more overwhelming will be the death. (…) The world is vast; you will be lost in the search. (…) So first, go in; look within yourself. It is better to go inward and find your real being.

The fear is not of death; the fear is of time – and if you look deeply into it, then you find that the fear is of unlived life: you have not been able to live. (…) Unlived life gives power to death. A totally lived life takes all power from death. (…) If you live, then there is no fear. If life comes to a fulfillment, there is no fear. If you have enjoyed, attained to the peaks that life can give, if you have lived life to its totality, then there is no fear of time, then the fear disappears. You have known life; you are ready – even if death comes today, you are ready. In fact, you will welcome death, because now a new opportunity opens; a new door, a new mystery is revealed.

Our whole life is a postponement; hence the fear of death: "I have not known yet, and death is coming." Everybody is afraid of death for the simple reason that we have not tasted of life yet. The man who knows what life is, is never afraid of death: he welcomes death; he receives it as a guest.

Don't sacrifice yourself. You are here for yourself, for nobody else. Live in total freedom so intensely that every moment is transformed into eternity. If you live a moment intensely, you move into the vertical; you drop out of the horizontal.

There are two ways of being related with time. One is to swim on the surface of the ocean; another is to dive deep, to go to the depths. If you are just swimming on the ocean of time, you will be always afraid, because the surface is not the reality. The surface is not really the ocean – it is just the boundary; it is just the periphery. Go to the depth; move toward the depth. When you live a moment deeply, you are no longer part of time. Time disappears; you transcend time. You are moving in depth. (…) If you have a musical heart, if you have the sense of beauty, aesthetic sensibility and sensitiveness, you know time stops – suddenly there is no time.

An enlightened man lives totally and moment to moment. (…) When a man who has come to a deep understanding of his own being cuts wood, he simply cuts wood. There is nobody else there. In fact, the cutter is not there; only the cutting of the wood, the chopping. The chopper is not there, because the chopper is the past. When he eats, he simply eats. One great Zen Master said: When sitting, sit; when walking, walk; above all, don't wobble.

Meditation is nothing but a way to learn to live totally.

Fear cannot be eliminated altogether; it cannot be mastered – it can only be understood. Understanding is the key word here. And only understanding brings mutation; nothing else. If you try to master your fear, it will remain repressed; it will go deep into you. It will not help; it will complicate things.

Man has nothing of his own intelligence – that is the problem. Unless he starts growing his own intelligence, he will always remain afraid of being crazy. Not only that, the society can make him crazy any moment. (…) Basically, the whole humanity stands on the verge of madness.

According to Eastern mysticism, everything passes, and yet there is something that never passes; everything is born, and yet there is something that is never born and never dies. And unless you get centered in that eternal source, you will not find peace; you will not find serenity. You will not find blissfulness; you will not find contentment. You will not feel at home, at ease in the universe. You will remain an accident; you will never become essential. The whole effort of any meditative method is to bring you closer to that which never changes, that which is always.

Nobody comes into the world with a name. All kinds of names are given – labels stuck upon you – and you become the label. You forget completely that you have come without any name, without any fame, and you will die the same way.

What I am teaching is not a stupid person's way – what I am teaching you is for the intelligent; it is the way of the wise. Whatsoever existence gives you, try to find a way to use it in such a way that it becomes a creative growth situation for you.

Death is an organic, integral part of life, and it is very friendly to life. (…) Death is, in fact, a process of renewal. And death happens each moment. (…) You cannot live if you stop dying. (…) A person who protects himself against death is incapable of living. (…) The man who has understood what his life is allows for death to happen; he welcomes it. He dies each moment, and each moment he is resurrected. His cross and his resurrection are continuously happening as a process.

As we move in time, dust of experiences, of knowledge, of lived life, of past, collects. That dust becomes our ego. Accumulated, it becomes a crust around you which has to be broken and thrown away. One has to take a bath continuously – every day, in fact, every moment, so that this crust never becomes a prison.

The ego is afraid to love, because in love, life comes to a peak. But whenever there is a peak of life, there is a peak of death – they go together. (…) In love, in meditation, in trust, in prayer, wherever life becomes total, death is there. Without death, life cannot become total. (…) In love, you die and you are reborn.

Life never ends anywhere; it never begins anywhere. We are involved in eternity. (…) We are life – even if forms change, bodies change, minds change. What we call life is just an identification with a certain body, with a certain mind, with a certain attitude; and what we call death is nothing but getting out of that form, out of that body, out of that concept. (…) Death is a continuous revival: a help to life to resurrect again and again, a help to get rid of old forms, to get rid of old confining structures so that again you can flow, and again you can become fresh and young, and again you can become a virgin.

What has remained of your childhood? Nothing has remained, just a memory. You cannot make a distinction between whether it really happened, or you saw a dream, or you read it in a book, or somebody told you about it. (…) In fact, everything has changed.

Everything returns to its original source, has to return to its original source. If you understand life, then you understand death also. Life is a forgetfulness of the original source; and death is again a remembrance. Life is going away from the original source; death is coming back home. Death is not ugly; death is beautiful. But death is beautiful only for those who have lived their life unhindered, uninhibited, unsuppressed. Death is beautiful only for those who have lived their life beautifully, who have not been afraid to live, who have been courageous enough to live – who loved, who danced, who celebrated. Death becomes the ultimate celebration if your life is a celebration. Whatsoever your life was, death reveals it.

If you have lived just a bodily life and you have never known anything beyond the body, death is going to be very, very ugly, unpleasant, painful. Death is going to be an anguish. But if you have lived a little higher than the body, if you have loved music and poetry, and you have loved, and you have looked at the flowers and the stars, and something of the non-physical has entered into your consciousness, death will not be so bad, death will not be so painful. You can take it with equanimity – but still, it cannot be a celebration. If you have touched something of the transcendental in yourself, if you have entered your own nothingness at the center – the center of your being, where you are no longer a body and no longer a mind, where physical pleasures are completely left far away and mental pleasures such as music and poetry and literature and painting, everything, are left far away, you are simply just pure awareness, consciousness – then death is going to be a great celebration, a great understanding, a great revelation. If you have known anything of the transcendental in you, death will reveal to you the transcendental in the universe – then death is no longer a death, but a meeting with the source, a date with the Divine.

Life can be known, death also – but nothing can be said about them. (…) Life and death are the deepest mysteries.

Truth liberates. Have you seen anybody being liberated by theories? Experience liberates, yes… but theories about experience? No, never. (…) Words can be communicated, but not truth. Truth can only be indicated.

Mind is never convinced; it cannot be convinced. Mind is nothing but a process of doubt; it can never be convinced. It can go on arguing infinitely, because whatever you say, it can create an argument around it. (…) Knowledge is a false coin. (…) Don't become more knowledgeable; become more innocent.

The temptation of the mind to reduce every wonder, every mystery, to a question, is basically fear-oriented. We are afraid, afraid of the tremendousness of life, of this incredible existence. Out of fear, we create some small knowledge around ourselves as a protection, as an armor, as a defense.

There is no need to survive in this world. This world is a madhouse; there is no need to survive in it. There is no need to survive in the world of ambition, politics, ego; it is a disease. But there is another way to be, and that is that you can be in this world and not be of it.

Fear always means the fear of the unknown; fear always means the fear of death; fear always means the fear of being lost. But if you really want to be alive, you have to accept the possibility of being lost. You have to accept the insecurity of the unknown, the discomfort and the inconvenience of the unfamiliar, the strange. That is the price one has to pay for the blessing that follows it, and nothing can be achieved without paying for it. You have to pay for it; otherwise you will remain paralyzed by fear – your whole life will be lost.

Remember it – when something is very frightening, that is the time not to go anywhere; this is the time to be here. (…) The moment is very pregnant, and you have to be here, and you have to go into it. (…) Whatever frightens you, go into it. Life comes to those who risk, who live dangerously, almost on the verge of death. That was the attraction in the past of being a soldier, a warrior. The attraction was not of war, but of danger – just to move side-by-side with death. It gives you a crystallization, and there comes a time when no fear remains in you.

Fear is the bondage; fear is the imprisonment. (…) Whenever you come near fear, you are near the door. Fear is symbolic. It says, now be aware; don't enter here; death is here. But death is the door – to enlightenment, to all that is beautiful and true. Learn to die; that is the only way to achieve more and more abundant life.

"Will existence protect me?" – The fear is asking for guarantees, promises – fear creating more fears. You are asking for some sort of insurance. No, there is no possibility. (…) Something alive is always in danger; to be alive is a hazard: the more alive, the more adventure, more hazard, more danger. (…) This is how life should be. The roads, the walks, the principles should not be fixed beforehand. (…) Walk, and by walking, make your way. Don't follow superhighways. They are dead, and you are not going to find anything on them. (…) No human being worth the name will follow any pattern. (…) I cannot show you the way, because "the way" is for cowards. (…) Each one reaches truth in a different way. You cannot reach as a mass, and you cannot reach as a crowd. You reach alone, absolutely alone.

There are only two types of prisoners I have come across – a few who live in a visible prison; and the remaining who live in an invisible prison. They carry their prison, around themselves – in the name of conscience, in the name of morality, in the name of tradition, in the name of this and that. Thousands are the names of bondage and slavery. (…) Freedom has no name. There are not many types of freedom; freedom is one. Lies can be millions; truth is one. (…) Unless you are very alert, you will never be able to move freely. At the most, you can change prisons. From one prison, you can go to the other prison, and you can enjoy the walk between the two. Then, you are in the same trap again. (…) That is what is happening to the world.

There are three states of mind. The first is consciousness plus content, mind and content. This is the ordinary state of the mind. (…) You always have contents in the mind – a thought moving, a desire arising, anger, greed, ambition. You always have some content in the mind; the mind is never unoccupied. The traffic goes on; day in, day out. While awake, it is there; while asleep, it is there; thinking and dreaming – it is the same process. (…) In the day, you have a personality around you that hides you – layers upon layers of personality. It is very difficult to find the true person; you will have to dig deep, and it hurts, and the personality will resist. (…) The second state of the mind is consciousness without content; that's what meditation is. You are fully alert, and there is a gap, an interval. No thought is encountered; there is no thought within you. (…) And then, there is a third state. When the content has disappeared, the object has disappeared, then the subject cannot remain for long, because they exist together. They produce each other. When the subject is alone, it can only hang around a little while longer just out of its past momentum. Once the object has disappeared, soon the subject will also disappear. First the contents go; then consciousness disappears. This third state is called samadhi – no content, no consciousness; and this third state is what Buddha means by shunyata, emptiness. It is a state of superconsciousness, of transcendental consciousness. Consciousness now is only conscious of itself. Consciousness has turned upon itself; the circle is complete. You have come home.

Life exists in challenges; life exists in crises; life needs insecurity. It grows in the soil of insecurity. Whenever you are insecure, you will find yourself more alive, more alert.

Those who think they are, are not. And those who think and realize that they are not – only they are. (…) Let the temple of your being be utterly empty. That is the state of 'not to be'.

As the ego dies, it allows space for your authentic being to blossom. (…) There is nothing to be achieved. You simply drop your ego and wait. There is no question of any effort to be made; no achievement is going to be there. What happens, happens of its own accord. You cannot claim that it is your realization.

Don't put too much attention to fear, because it becomes an autohypnosis. (…) Fear is just a symptom; it is not a disease. There is no cure for it; there is no need. (…) It simply says to you to love more.

If existence goes deep into your being, you will become aware of your depths. If it penetrates to the very core, you will become aware of your center. And that's what is meant by self-knowledge. (…) Love is the key that unlocks your doors. (…) The first step is to accept your inner emptiness with joy, and to go into it. (…) Go into this emptiness, and soon you will be surprised that this emptiness is what meditation is; this emptiness is what I call divinity, godliness.

The day one trusts the whole existence, the day one knows, "It is not going to hurt me, because I am part of it – how can the Whole hurt the part?"

My observation is that 99 percent of people commit suicide. It is a very rare person who lives, who really lives. That person has to be courageous enough to be open to all kinds of experiences, to be open unconditionally.

You must love yourself; that is a basic requirement. Love yourself, and then suddenly you will find yourself reflected everywhere. (…) A deep acceptance is needed. Whatsoever and whosoever you are, a deep acceptance is needed – not only acceptance, but delight that you are.

Whenever you love a person, that person's godliness comes to the top.

In a deep moment of love, there is no fear. (…) If in your life there is no love, then you will become afraid. (…) So fear, in fact, is the absence of love. (…) If fear is felt, become more loving.

Fear is energy, just like love; a negative energy. A man who is feeling love bubbles up with a positive energy. When you come closer, it is as if a magnet is attracting you; you would like to be with this person.

To me, love is not a great problem, because I look farther ahead than you. If you miss love, you will miss meditation, and that is the real problem for me. (…) I see the whole sequence of life and how it moves. If love is missed, you can never be in meditation, because being in meditation is cosmic love. You cannot bypass love. Many people have tried, and they are dead in the monasteries. (…) Because of fear, they have tried to avoid love completely, and they have been trying to find a shortcut directly from their fear to meditativeness. That is what monks have been doing all over the centuries. They have been trying to bypass love completely. Their prayer will be false; their prayer will have no life. Their prayer will not be heard anywhere, and the cosmos is not going to answer their prayer. They are trying to deceive the whole cosmos. No, one has to pass through love. From fear, move into love. From love, you will move into prayerfulness, meditativeness, and from meditativeness arises fearlessness. (…) I call these three steps: life, love, and light. (…) This is my observation: you cannot bypass love; you will be simply committing suicide. But love can bypass you if you are simply waiting.

You will have to learn to separate yourself from the mechanism of your mind. We become so identified with the mechanism that we have completely forgotten the distance. It is just the mind, and the mind is nothing but all the conditionings that have been given to you by others. (…) At the time they were made, they were relevant. But now, they are irrelevant. You have grown up; now those programs don't fit. Those programs are just hangovers from the past. But they continue, because the mind knows no way of erasing them – unless you become very aware and erase them consciously. The mind only knows how to be programmed; it has no capacity to deprogram itself. (…) My own observation is that somewhere near the age of five, a child becomes identified with his programmed mind. And it is only up to that time that the child is alive, because he is not yet programmed. After that, he becomes a mechanism. Around the age of five, all learning stops. One goes on repeating the program in better and better ways, more skillful, more efficient, but it is basically the same program till death… unless by chance you come across a situation, an energy field, where you can be made aware – almost forced against yourself to become aware of this whole nonsense that your mind is doing to you.

The mind wants to avoid errors, and life does not want to avoid errors. (…) When fear arises, it is simply indicative that something is going against the program that you have been carrying up to now. (…) That means that whatsoever you have done from your childhood up to now, from the age of five up to now, has to be slowly erased and dropped.

If you move deeply in meditation, either fear or love will become the door. If death has been suppressed, then fear will become the door. If sex has been suppressed, then love will become the door. (…) Once sex and death are no longer taboo, a person is free. These are the two tricks to create bondage for humanity. Once neither of these are there, you are freedom; not that you are free – you are freedom.

Once you have known the mystery of life through your own being, you will know it everywhere. Once you have known it within, you will know it without too. But the first work has to be done in your inner world. You have to become a lab, a great experiment. You are the experiment; you are the instrument of the experiment, the lab, everything, because inside you there is nobody else, nothing else. You are all: the experimenter and the experimented upon and the experiment. Once you start moving into the subjectivity of your inner world, of your interiority, you slowly become acquainted with the miraculous. And to be acquainted with the miraculous is to know that which is worth knowing; otherwise you just go on accumulating knowledge – which is worthless, which is simply junk.

People are continuously talking. And the reason why they are talking is that they are afraid to be silent; they are afraid to see the truth; they are afraid to see their utter emptiness; they are afraid to expose themselves; they are afraid to look deep into the other. Continuous talking keeps them on the surface, occupied, engaged.

Never reject any emotion, because all those emotions constitute you, and they are all needed. Of course, no single emotion should become an obsession – they should be a kind of orchestra within you; they should remain in a proportionate way. No one single emotion should overwhelm you; that's all that has to be remembered. But no emotion should be rejected in toto.

This is inner alchemy: a problem disappears if you accept it; and a problem grows more and more complex if you create any conflict with it.

Suffering becomes evil only when it is simply destructive and not creative at all; suffering becomes bad only when you suffer and nothing is gained from it. But I am telling you that insight can be gained through suffering, and then it becomes creative. Darkness is beautiful if the dawn is coming out of it soon; darkness is dangerous if it is endless, simply continues and continues, and you go on moving in a rut, in a vicious circle. This can happen if you are not alert – just to escape from one suffering, you can create another; then to escape from another, yet another. (…) Accept suffering and pass through it; don't escape. (…) Suppressed, you never experience the thing in its totality; you never gain anything out of it. Wisdom comes through suffering, and wisdom comes through acceptance. Whatsoever the case, be at ease with it. Don't judge, and don't be disturbed. Accept, and pass through it with alert awareness.

People are searching for meditation, prayer, new ways of being. But the deeper search, and the more basic search, is how to get rooted in existence again. Call it meditation, call it prayer, or whatever you will, but the essential thing is how to get rooted in existence again. We have become trees that are uprooted – and nobody else is responsible except us, with our stupid idea of conquering nature. We are part of nature – how can the part conquer the Whole? Befriend nature, and nature starts revealing its secrets. Its ultimate secret is godliness.

Life is a search – a constant search, a desperate search, a hopeless search, a search for something one knows not what. There is a deep urge to seek, but one knows not what one is seeking. And there is a certain state of mind in which whatsoever you get is not going to give you any satisfaction. Frustration seems to be the destiny of humanity, because whatsoever you get becomes meaningless the very moment you have it. You start searching again. This very search – what it is and why it is there – has to be understood. It seems that there is a gap in the human being, in the human mind. In the very structure of the human consciousness, there seems to be a hole, a black hole. You go on throwing things into it, and they go on disappearing. Nothing seems to make it full; nothing seems to help toward fulfillment. It is a very feverish search. You seek it in this world; you seek it in the other world. (…) The search does not allow you to be here and now, because the search always leads you somewhere else. The search is a projection; the search is a desire, an idea that somewhere else is what is needed – that it exists, but it exists somewhere else, not here where you are. It exists then, there; never here, now. It goes on nagging you; it goes on pulling you, pushing you. It goes on throwing you into more and more madness; it drives you crazy. And it is never fulfilled. (…) One thing you do know: you need to search. This is an inner need. But you don't know what you are seeking. The search continues in a state of vagueness: things are not clear; you simply go on searching, pulled by some inner urge, pushed by some inner urgency.

The first thing for the real seeker – for the seeker who has become a little alert, aware – is to define the search, to formulate a clear-cut concept of what it is, to bring it out of the dreaming consciousness, to encounter it in deep alertness, to look into it directly, to face it. Immediately a transformation starts happening. If you start defining your search, you will start losing your interest in the search. The more defined it becomes, the less it is there. Once it is clearly known what it is, suddenly it disappears. It exists only when you are not attentive. Let it be repeated: the search exists only when you are sleepy. The search exists only when you are not aware; the search exists only in your unawareness. The unawareness creates the search.

Our senses are all extroverted. (…) You start searching there – where you see, feel, touch. The light of the senses falls outside, and the seeker is inside. Because the light is outside, the seeker starts moving in an ambitious way, trying to find something outside that will be fulfilling. It is never going to happen. It has never happened. It cannot happen in the nature of things, because unless you have sought the seeker, all your search is meaningless. Unless you have come to know who you are, all that you seek is futile because you don't know the seeker. Without knowing the seeker, how can you move in the right dimension, in the right direction? It is impossible.

If there is something to seek, you are a worldly man. If there is nothing to seek, and the question "Who is this seeker?" has become important to you, then you are a religious man. Then there is a transformation. All values change suddenly. You start moving inward.

Once you have started moving inward, in the beginning, it is very, very dark. Because for lives together, you have never been inside; your eyes have been focused on the outside world. (…) Meditation is nothing but a readjustment of your vision, a readjustment of your seeing faculty, of your eyes. In India, that is what is called your third eye.

Self-knowledge is possible only in deep aloneness. Ordinarily whatever we know about ourselves is the opinion of others. Whatsoever people say about us, we go on collecting. That becomes our self-identity. (…) You have many voices inside you, conflicting voices – your mother's, your father's, your teacher's, and so on, and so forth. And it is impossible to decide which one is the right one. This is where man is lost. This is self-ignorance. But because you depend on others, you are afraid to go into aloneness. Because the moment you start going into aloneness, you start becoming very afraid of losing yourself. You don't have yourself in the first place, but whatever self you have created out of others' opinions will have to be left behind. Hence, it is very scary to go in. The deeper you go, the less you know who you are. So in fact, when you are moving toward self-knowledge, before it happens you will have to drop all ideas about the self. There will be a gap; there will be a kind of nothingness. You will become a non-entity. You will be utterly lost because all that you know is no longer relevant, and that which is relevant you don't know yet. Christian mystics call this 'the dark night of the soul'. It has to be passed, and once you have passed it, there is the dawn.

Don't be a reformer, and don't try to teach others, and don't try to change others. If you change, that's enough of a message.

To be authentic means to remain true to your own being. (…) Always listen to your inner voice; otherwise your whole life will be wasted. (…) Always look: the first thing is your being. Don't allow others to manipulate and control you – and they are many: everybody is ready to control you; everybody is ready to change you; everybody is ready to give you a direction you have not asked for. Everybody is giving you a guide for life. The guide exists within you; you carry the blueprint. (…) Always listen to the inner voice, and don't listen to anything else. There are a thousand and one temptations around you because many people are peddling their things. It is a supermarket; the world and everybody in it is interested in selling his thing to you. Everybody is a salesman. If you listen to too many salesmen, you will become mad. Don't listen to anybody. Just close your eyes and listen to the inner voice. That is what meditation is all about, to listen to the inner voice. This is the first thing.

Always remain in the present, because all falseness enters either from the past or from the future. (…) Be true to the present, and then you will be authentic. To be here-now is to be authentic. No past, no future – this moment, all. This moment, the whole eternity.

People are not true even when they are utterly alone. (…) Don't put a false smile on your face because that false smile will create a split in you. You will become two – a part of you will be smiling, and a part of you will remain sad. Now a division has arisen, and if you go on doing it again and again, it will become a habit. You go on pretending; it has become second nature. As you practice more and more, the distance between the two parts becomes bigger and bigger. When it becomes unbridgeable, we call it "schizophrenia". When you cannot contact your own other part, you almost become two persons instead of one; then it is severe mental illness. But everyone is divided, so the difference between the schizophrenia and the normal is only of degree.

Each moment has its own way, and no moment needs to be consistent with any other moment. Life is a flux; it is a river. It goes on changing its moods. So one need not be worried about consistency. Anybody who becomes worried about consistency will become untrue, because only lies can be consistent. (…) Truth contains its own contradictions – and that's the richness of truth; that's its vastness; that's its beauty. (…) So if you are feeling sad, then be sad – with no condemnation, with no evaluation of it being good or bad. There is no question of good or bad; it is simply so. And when it goes, let it go. (…) There is no need to pretend anything. (…) And remember: each moment has an atomic reality. It is discontinuous from the past moment, and it is not connected with the future moment. Each moment is atomic. They are not following each other in a sequence; they are not linear. Each moment has its own being, and you have to be that, in that moment, nothing else. This is what is really meant by truth.

Be true to yourself – there is no other responsibility. One has to be responsible toward one's being. You are answerable to your own being, and God is not going to ask you why you were not somebody else. (…) This is the whole problem, how to be oneself. And if you can solve this, then every other problem becomes nonproblematic. Then life is a beautiful mystery to be lived – not a problem to be solved, but just to be lived and enjoyed.

Life is a pilgrimage, and unless love is attained, it remains a pilgrimage, never reaching anywhere. It goes on moving in circles, and the moment of fulfillment never comes. (…) Love is the goal; life is the journey. And a journey without a goal is bound to be neurotic, haphazard; it will not have any direction; it will remain accidental. You will remain driftwood unless the goal is clear. It may be a very distant star – that doesn't make any difference – but it should be clear; your eyes remain focused on it. (…) But if you are moving in a wrong direction, or not moving in any direction at all, or moving in all directions together, then life starts collapsing. That's what neurosis is – a collapse in energy, not knowing where to go, what to do, what to be. (…) Love is the goal. And once the goal is clear, you start growing an inner richness. The wound is transformed into a lotus; love is the greatest alchemical force in the world. Those who know how to use it can reach the highest peak called God. Those who know not how to use it remain crawling in the dark recesses of existence; they never come to the sunlit peaks of life.

Unless you are centered, unless you know who you are, you cannot really relate. The relationship that goes on without self-knowledge is just an illusion. (…) That is the difference I make between an individual and a person: a person is a false phenomenon; an individual is reality. Persons, personalities, are masks, shadows. Individuality is substance; it is reality. And only individuals can relate, can love; persons can only play games.

Whenever I use the word love, I use it as a state of being, not as a relationship. Relationship is only a very minor aspect of it. But your idea of love is basically that of relationship, as if that is all. Relationship is needed only because you can't be alone, because you are not yet capable of meditation. Hence, meditation is a must before you can really love. One should be capable of being alone, utterly alone, and yet tremendously blissful. Then you can love. Then your love is no longer a need, but a sharing, no longer a necessity. You will not become dependent on the people you love. You will share – and sharing is beautiful. (…) What ordinarily happens in this world is: you don't have love; the person you think you love has no love in his being either – and both are asking for love from each other. Two beggars begging each other! Hence the conflict, the continuous quarrel between the lovers.

Where is the love? Everybody feels at a loss, empty, tense. The basic foundation is missing, and you have started making the temple without the foundation. It is going to fall and collapse at any moment. (…) You live in unawareness, and you go on doing the same thing again and again. You go on mechanically, robotlike, repeating the old pattern. (…) Become more aware; become more meditative.

The lies of the personality are a very heavy burden on the essence of the soul. (…) Risk everything for truth; otherwise you will remain discontented. You will do many things, but nothing will really happen to you. You will move much, but you will never arrive anywhere. The whole effect will be almost absurd. It is as if you are hungry and you simply fantasize about food – beautiful, delicious. But fantasy is fantasy; it is not real. You cannot eat unreal food. For moments you can delude yourself; you can live in a dreamlike world – but a dream is not going to give you anything. It will take many things from you, and it will not give you anything in return. The time that you spend using a false personality is simply wasted; it will never come back to you again. (…) Even a single moment of authenticity is better than a whole life of inauthentic living. (…) Love has to be lived before death happens. (…) Risk everything for truth, and never risk truth for anything else. Let this be your fundamental law: Even if I have to sacrifice myself, my life, I am going to sacrifice it for truth, but I will never sacrifice truth for anything.

Being cannot happen conveniently; being happens only when you take risks, when you move in danger. And love is the greatest danger there is; it demands you totally. So don't be afraid; go into it. (…) Remember always, falsity never pays; it appears to, but it never pays. Only truth pays – and in the beginning, truth never looks like it will pay. It seems it will shatter everything. (…) A religious person is one who comes out of falsity and risks his life. He says, "Either I want to be true, or I don't want to be at all. But I am not going to be false." Whatsoever the stakes, don't go on moving in a false way.

Man creates his own confusion just because he goes on rejecting himself, condemning himself, not accepting himself. Then a chain of confusion, inner chaos and misery is created. Why don't you accept yourself as you are? What is wrong? The whole of existence accepts you as you are, but you don't. You have some ideal to achieve. Because of that ideal, you live in the future – which is nothing but a dream. Because of the ideal, you cannot live here and now. The ideal creates an image in the mind. Because you go on comparing yourself with that image, you feel that something is lacking, something is missing: you condemn yourself; you feel inferior. (…) Because of your dreaming mind, your reality is condemned; dreams have been disturbing you.

People are bound to remain anxious if there is a "should" in life. If there is an ideal that has to be fulfilled, how can you be at ease? You can always imagine a better state of affairs.

The mind always remains in a dichotomy, in a divided state between the past and the future. It is always split; it is always schizophrenic. You need to understand that this is how things are, and nothing can be done about it. (…) Don't pay a single thought to the past or the future, because nothing can be done about it; it is a sheer waste of energy. Live this moment totally. (…) Live every moment in such totality that if the next moment never comes, there is no complaint. You can die joyously, because you have lived joyously.

In life, nothing can be captured and imprisoned. One has to live in openness, allowing all kinds of experiences to happen, being fully grateful as long as they last. (…) Tomorrow will be a different day. (…) Allow life's insecurity to be your very religion. (…) An authentic person simply drops the idea of security and starts living in utter insecurity, because that is the nature of life. You cannot change it. That which you cannot change, accept – and accept it with joy. Don't unnecessarily hit your head against the wall; just pass through the door.

When a person can celebrate life in its totality, all that is wrong disappears. But if you try first to make arrangements for the wrong to disappear, it never disappears.

Anger, greed, sex, or whatsoever else you name are not solid; they are just the absence of a blissful, ecstatic life.

Mind has only two alternatives, fight or flight – and both are wrong. You are divided. The problem is not outside; the problem is inside.

Mind is activity, and being is absolute inactivity. (…) Your being is eternally un-moving, and your periphery is continuously moving.

Always remember: Don't fight with the mind; simply put it aside. This putting aside is not against the mind; it is beyond the mind. It is simply putting it aside. Just as when you go out, you use your shoes; and when you come in, you put them aside – there is no fight, nothing. You simply put them aside; they are not needed.

Man is very clever in creating false values. The real values demand your totality, demand your whole being; the false values are very cheap.

Let this be your characteristic: acceptance, utter acceptance. (…) This is one of the hardest truths to recognize, that one remains the same – that whatsoever we do, we remain the same. There is no "improvement". The whole ego is shattered, because the ego lives through improvement, the idea of improvement, the idea of reaching somewhere someday. Maybe not today, but tomorrow, or the day after tomorrow. To recognize the fact that there is no improvement in the world, that life is just a celebration, it has nothing like business in it – once you understand this, the whole ego trip stops, and suddenly you are thrown back to this moment.

Life is a river, a flow, a continuum with no beginning and no end. It is not going somewhere; it is always here. (…) The only time for life is now, and the only place is here. There is no struggle to reach; there is nothing to reach. There is no God beyond life. (…) To be religious is not to be separate from the flow. To be irreligious is to have your own mind in an effort to win, to conquer, to reach somewhere. (…) Your cleverness to be yourself, to be clinging to the ego, is the whole cause of your misery.

The desire to be extraordinary is very ordinary, because everybody has it. And to have the understanding to be ordinary is very extraordinary, because it rarely happens.

There are no questions in existence. Questions come from you. And they will go on coming, and you can go on accumulating as many answers as you like; those answers won't help. You have to attain to the answer – and to attain to the answer, you have to drop all questioning. When there is no question in the mind, the vision is clear: then, you have clarity of perception; then, the doors of perception are clean and open, and everything suddenly becomes transparent. You can go to the very depth, penetrate to the deepest core – and there suddenly you find yourself.

An intelligent person will try just to be himself, whatsoever the cost. An intelligent person will never copy, will never imitate. He will never parrot. An intelligent person will listen to his own intrinsic call. He will feel his own being and move accordingly, whatsoever the risk. (…) Intelligence is trust in your own being. Intelligence is to live in this moment, not to hanker for the future, and not to think of the past. (…) You live in belief; belief is unintelligent. Live through knowing; knowing is intelligence. And intelligence is meditation.

Life is of the heart. Life can only grow through the heart. (…) The heart is your very center; the head is just your periphery. (…) The real intelligence is of the heart. It is not intellectual; it is not emotional. (…) A loving intelligence is what is needed. A loving intelligence never becomes intellectuality or sentimentality. It gives you a new kind of integrity, a new crystallization.

Only stupid people are consistent people. The more intelligent you are, the more inconsistent you will be – because who knows about tomorrow? (…) If you are alive, you have to be inconsistent: you have grown; the world has changed; the river is flowing into new territory. (…) Yesterday's experience should not become your definition forever; otherwise you died yesterday. (…) One should remain a process; one should never become a thing. That is intelligence.

Fed up with himself – that is how any intelligent person will be! So there is nothing to be worried about. It is good, it is perfectly okay to feel fed up. People who don't feel fed up with themselves are in a wrong situation – they are in danger; they will never change. There is no need for them to change. They will go on revolving in the wheel; they are mechanical people. This is the first ray of consciousness in you – that you feel fed up. Who is the one who feels fed up? This awareness is you; this is the first ray of consciousness. So the way that you have lived up to now and all the things that you have done up to now are meaningless. (…) By and by, the dreams of the outside will disappear because there is no need for the dreams to continue. (…) Your dreams will show you whether you are really fed up or if there is still some lingering interest. If a lingering interest is there, then finish that too. If you are really fed up, by and by you will start feeling that the energy is moving inward on its own accord. You are not doing anything; you are simply sitting there and it is going in; it is falling in. And through that inwardness, your centering will arise.

Stand on the crossroads, think, meditate – but once you decide, then forget all other alternatives: move. Once you decide to move, your whole energy is needed there. Don't be split and don't let half of your mind think about alternatives. (…) There is no way to be certain. You may be wrong, but there is no way to know it unless you follow the road to the very end, all the way. (…) You move on the road – right or wrong is irrelevant. The very movement gives you growth. To me, it is not a question of where you go. To me, the most important thing is that you are not stuck, but going. Even if this road comes to a dead end and it leads nowhere and you have to come back – nothing to worry about. It is good that you went. The very movement has given you much experience. To know the false as false is the only way that one comes by and by to know what truth is. And one has to move on many wrong roads before one comes to the right one. The only thing that is important is not to be stuck somewhere.

Memory one day has to go completely. Once a man has become enlightened, he does not function out of memory; he functions spontaneously.

Become a person of knowing, not a person of knowledge. Then you live intelligently.

There is a switch in the mind. The name of the switch is watchfulness, awareness, witnessing. If you start witnessing the mind, it begins to stop. The more that witnessing grows, the more and more you do become aware of a secret key: that the mind can be stopped easily. And that moment is of great liberation. You can turn off your mind, and when it comes back, it comes back refreshed.

The mind cannot penetrate meditation; where mind ends, meditation begins. (…) Meditation is not an achievement; it has not to be achieved. Meditation is your intrinsic nature.

I begin with your insanity, not with a sitting posture. I allow your insanity. (…) When you are just sitting, you are frustrated; your mind wants to move and you are just sitting. Every muscle turns; every nerve turns. You are trying to force something upon yourself that is not natural for you; then you have divided yourself with a suppressive method. You are suppressing much that could be easily thrown, released with a different approach. (…) If you begin with something active – something positive, alive, moving – it will be better; then you will begin to feel an inner stillness growing. The more it grows, the more it will be possible for you to use a sitting posture – the more silent meditation will be possible. (…) Cleansing must be the first thing – a catharsis; otherwise, with breathing exercises, with just sitting, with practicing yoga asanas, postures, you are just suppressing something.

Creativity is the greatest rebellion in existence. If you want to create, you have to get rid of all conditionings; otherwise your creativity will be nothing but a copying; it will be just a carbon copy. You can be creative only if you are individual; you cannot create as part of the mob psychology. The mob psychology is uncreative: it lives a dragging life; it knows no dance, no song, no joy; it is mechanical. The creator cannot follow the well-trodden path. He has to search out his own way; he has to enquire in the jungles of life. He has to go alone; he has to be a dropout from the mob mind, from the collective psychology. The collective mind is the lowest mind in the world. (…) My effort is to destroy the collective mind and to make each individual free to be himself or herself. (…) In fact, humanity will really be born only the day the individual is respected in his rebellion.

A creative person is one who has insight, who can see things nobody else has ever seen before, who hears things that nobody has heard before – then there is creativity.

Once pathology disappears, everybody becomes a creator. Let it be understood as deeply as possible: only ill people are destructive. The people who are healthy are creative. Creativity is a fragrance of real health. When a person is really healthy and whole, creativity comes naturally to him; the urge to create arises.

Humanity has come now to a crossroads. We have lived the one-dimensional man; we have exhausted it. We need now a more enriched human being, three-dimensional. I call them three C's: consciousness is being; compassion is feeling; creativity is action.

Activity shows that you are obsessed. You cannot remain yourself; you cannot remain silent; you cannot remain inactive. Through activity, you go on throwing out your madness, insanity. (…) Activity is never spontaneous; it comes from the past. You may have been accumulating it for many years, and then it explodes into the present – it is not relevant. But the mind is cunning; the mind will always find rationalizations for the activity. (…) If this activity is there, you cannot relax, because it is an obsessive need. You want to do something, whatever it is. (…) The devil never says, "Relax!". He says, "Why are you wasting your time? Do something, move! Life is passing by, do something!" (…) This obsession to be active has to be watched. And you have to watch it in your own life. (…) A relaxed person is simply non-obsessive, and the energy starts accumulating within him. (…) Action is total. Activity is always half-hearted, because how can you befool yourself absolutely? Even you know it is useless. Even you are aware that you are doing it for certain feverish reasons within, which are not even clear to you, very vague. You can change activities, but unless activities are changed into actions, that won't help.

Can you remain silent for a long time? Psychologists say that if you remain silent for three weeks, you will start talking to yourself. Then you will be divided into two: you will talk and you will listen also. And if you try to remain silent for three months, you will be completely ready for the madhouse, because then you will not bother whether somebody is there or not. You will talk, and not only talk, you will answer also – now you are complete; now you don't depend on anybody. This is what lunatic is. A lunatic is a person whose whole world is confined in himself. He is the talker and he is the listener; he is the actor and he is the spectator – he is all; his whole world is confined in himself. He has divided himself in many parts; and everything has become fragmentary. That's why people are afraid of silence – they know that they might crack up. And if you are afraid of silence, that means you have an obsessive, feverish, diseased mind inside, which is continuously asking to be active. Activity is your escape from yourself. In action, you are; in activity, you have escaped from yourself – it is a drug. In activity, you forget yourself; and when you forget yourself, there are no worries, no anguish, no anxiety. That's why you need to be continuously active, doing something or other – but you are never in a state when non-doing flowers in you and blooms.

If a man really understands, things drop – and then, you cannot take the credit that "I have dropped it". – It dropped itself; you have not dropped it. The ego is not strengthened through it. And then, more and more actions become possible. And whenever you have an opportunity to act totally, don't miss it, don't waver – act. Act more, and let activities drop of their own accord. A transformation will come to you by and by: it takes time; it needs seasoning… but there is no hurry.

Relaxation comes to you when there is no urge to activity; the energy is at home, not moving anywhere. If a certain situation arises, you will act, that's all – but you are not finding some excuse to act. You are at ease with yourself. Relaxation is to be at home. (…) Relaxation is a state; you cannot force it. You simply drop all the negativities, the hindrances, and it comes; it bubbles up by itself. (…) Relaxation is a state of affairs where your energy is not moving anywhere – not to the future, not to the past; it is simply there with you. (…) This moment is all. There is no other moment; time stops – then there is relaxation. If time is there, there is no relaxation. (…) Relaxation is neither of the body nor of the mind; relaxation is of the total. That's why the Buddhas go on saying, "Become desireless", because they know that if there is desire, you cannot relax. They go on saying, "Enjoy this very moment".

Activity has to go, but not action. (…) Only absence of activity is needed. And how will it come? It will come by understanding. Understanding is the only discipline. Understand your activities and suddenly, in the middle of the activity, if you become aware, it will stop. If you become aware why you are doing it, it will stop.

Energy can have two dimensions. One dimension of energy is motivated, going somewhere, a goal somewhere – this moment is only a means, and the goal is somewhere else to be achieved. This is one dimension of your energy: this is the dimension of activity, goal-oriented – then, everything is a means: somehow it has to be done and you have to reach the goal; then you will relax. But for this type of energy, the goal is never reached, because this type of energy goes on changing every present moment into a means for something else, into the future. The goal always remains on the horizon. You go on running, but the distance remains the same. There is another dimension of energy: that dimension is unmotivated celebration. The goal is here, now; the goal is not somewhere else. In fact, you are the goal. In fact, there is no other fulfillment than of this moment: consider the lilies. When you are the goal and when the goal is not in the future – when there is nothing to be achieved, rather, you have just to celebrate it, you have already achieved it, it is there – this is relaxation, unmotivated energy. (…) Be a celebrator; celebrate! Then suddenly you relax – then there is no tension; then there is no anguish. The whole energy that becomes anguish becomes gratitude. Your whole heart goes on beating with a deep thankfulness – that is prayer. (…) Just understand the movement of the energy, the unmotivated movement of the energy. It flows, but not toward a goal; it flows as a celebration. It moves, not toward a goal; it moves because of its own overflowing energy.

I tell you, there is nowhere to go. Here is all. The whole existence culminates in this moment; it converges into this moment. The whole existence is pouring already into this moment. All that is, is pouring into this moment – it is here, now. (…) Act unmotivated, just an overflow of your energy. Share but don't trade; don't make bargains. Give because you have; don't give to take back – because then you will be in misery. All traders go to hell. Heaven is not for traders; heaven is for celebrators. (…) And if you become more and more involved in action, and less and less occupied in activity, your life will change and it will become a deep relaxation. Then you "do", but you remain relaxed. A Buddha is never tired. Why? Because he is not a doer. Whatsoever he has, he gives; he overflows.

When you really relax, you are not making any activity inside you. Shut firm the mouth and silent remain – and then don't think. (…) Thoughts are coming and going. Let them come and go; that's not a problem. You don't get involved; you remain aloof, detached. You simply watch them coming and going; they are not your concern. Shut the mouth and remain silent. By and by, thoughts will cease automatically – they need your cooperation to be there. If you cooperate, they will be there; if you fight, then too they will be there, because both are cooperations – one for, the other against. Both are sorts of activity. You simply watch. (…) Be a passive watcher – Empty your mind and think of nought. This passivity will automatically empty your mind. Ripples of activity, ripples of mind energy, by and by, will subside, and the whole surface of your consciousness will be without any waves, without any ripples. It becomes like a silent mirror. Like a hollow bamboo rest at ease with your body. (…) And suddenly infinite energy starts pouring within you. You are filled with the unknown, with the mysterious, with the Divine. A hollow bamboo becomes a flute, and the Divine starts playing it. Once you are empty, then there is no barrier for the Divine to enter in you. (…) Rest at ease – don't desire even God. God cannot be desired. When you are desireless, he comes to you.

There is nothing to give; there is nothing to get. (…) The effort to 'become' is the barrier, because you are already carrying your being with you. You need not become anything – simply realize who you are, that's all. Improving, whatsoever you improve, you will always be in anxiety and anguish, because the very effort to improve is leading you on a wrong path. It makes future meaningful, a goal meaningful, ideals meaningful – and then your mind becomes a desiring. Desiring, you miss.

The philosopher is the farthest away from God, because the more you think, the greater the wall you create between you and the Whole. (…) The ego is nothing but all the thoughts you have accumulated in the past. (…) When you are not, God is – that is creativity. (…) A song will start coming through you – you are not the creator of it; it comes from the beyond. It always comes from the beyond. When you create it, it is just ordinary, mundane. When it comes through you, it has superb beauty; it brings something of the unknown in it.

To be possessed by God is creativity. Simone de Beauvoir has said, "Life is occupied both in perpetuating itself and in surpassing itself; if all it does is maintain itself, then living is only not dying." And the man who is not creative is only not dying, that's all. His life has no depth. His life is not yet life, but just a preface; the book of life has not yet started. He is born, true, but he is not alive. When you become creative, when you allow creativity to happen through you – when you start singing a song that is not your own, on which you cannot put your signature – then life takes wings; it upsurges. (…) In creativity is the surpassing; otherwise, at the most, we can go on perpetuating ourselves. But to perpetuate life is not enough unless you start surpassing yourself. And this surpassing happens only when something of the beyond comes in contact with you. That is the point of transcendence – you are not, and yet, for the first time you are.

The essence of wisdom is to act in harmony with nature. Animals act unconsciously in harmony with nature. Because man has consciousness, man has to act consciously in harmony with nature. Man has responsibility – only man has responsibility; that is his grandeur.

In deep sleep, you also fall in harmony with nature. That's why deep sleep is so rejuvenating, so relaxing. Just a few minutes of deep sleep, and you are fresh and young again. All the dust that you had gathered and all weariness and boredom disappears. You have contacted the source. But this is an animal way to contact the source. Animals are horizontal; man is vertical. Only in a horizontal position can you fall asleep – you cannot fall asleep standing; it will be very difficult. You are horizontal, parallel to the earth – suddenly you start losing consciousness; suddenly you are no longer responsible.

The higher you go, the deeper you go into the paradox of reality. Supreme action with supreme relaxation – on the surface, great action is happening; in the depth, nothing is happening, or only nothing is happening. Yielding to a power not your own, surrendering to a power that is beyond you, is creativity. Meditation is creativity.

The ego is your disease. When the ego disappears, the wound in you disappears; you are whole. You start flowing with the immense flow of existence. (…) You are a process, not a thing. Consciousness is not a thing; it is a process – and we have made it a thing. The moment you call it 'I', it becomes a thing – defined, bounded, dormant, stagnant, and you start dying. The ego is your death, and the death of the ego is the beginning of your real life. Real life is creativity.

Nature gives everybody energy which is creative. It becomes destructive only when it is obstructed, when no natural flow is allowed.

Either you make your energy creative, or it will turn sour and become destructive. Energy is a dangerous thing – if you have it, you have to use it creatively; otherwise, sooner or later, you will find it has become destructive. So find something, whatsoever you like, to put your energy into. Whatsoever you want, find a way in which you can become completely lost.

Each of you will become creative in your own way. You may be a cook, but there will be creativity. Or you may be a street cleaner, but there will be creativity. (…) When you are creative, desires disappear. When you are creative, ambitions disappear. When you are creative, you are already that which you always wanted to be.

Consciousness is health; self-consciousness is disease. The river of consciousness is not flowing naturally. Something foreign has entered into the river of consciousness, something that resists becoming part of the river. (…) To be self-conscious is to be unconscious. Self-consciousness is a non-surrendering attitude – it is the attitude of conflict, fight, struggle. If you are fighting with existence, you will be self-conscious and, of course, you will be defeated again and again and again. Each step is going to be a step into more and more defeat. Your frustration is certain; you are doomed from the very beginning, because you cannot maintain this self against the universe. It is impossible; you cannot exist separately. You can succeed only with the Whole, never against it. You can succeed only with God, never against Him.

Consciousness has no idea of 'I', of ego. It has no idea of one's separation from existence. It does not know any barrier. It knows no boundaries – it is one with existence; it is a deep at-onement. There is no conflict between the individual and the Whole. One is simply flowing into the Whole, and the Whole is flowing into one. It is like breathing: you breathe in, you breathe out – when you breathe in, the Whole enters you; when you breathe out, you enter the Whole. It is a constant flow, a constant sharing. The Whole goes on giving to you, and you go on giving to the Whole. The balance is never lost.

The ego is always in an effort to go upstream, always in search of conflict. (…) You will become more and more miserable, because only misery comes out of conflict. Misery is an indication that you are in conflict. (…) Your present karmas are making you miserable. (…) If you are miserable, I would like to tell you: it is you; you and only you are responsible. (…) If you remain you, in any sort of a society, you will remain miserable. In any economic system, you will remain miserable; in any world, you will remain miserable – if you remain you. And the first, basic change happens when you start dropping this conflict with existence. That is the only meaning of all the great religions when they emphasize, "Drop the ego". They are saying, "Drop the conflict". (…) Drop the conflict, because ego is a by-product of your conflicting attitude. (…) Disharmony results in misery; harmony results in bliss. Harmony naturally results in deep silence, joy, delight. Conflict results in anxiety, anguish, stress, tension. The ego is nothing but all the tensions that you have created around yourself.

Why does everybody go on creating the ego, the self? The real self is unknown, that's why. And it is difficult to live without a self, so we create a pseudo-self, a substitute self. The real self is unknown. In fact, the real self never becomes absolutely known; it remains mysterious; it remains ineffable, indefinable. The real self is so vast that you cannot define it, and the real self is so mysterious that you cannot penetrate it to the very core. The real self is the Self of the Whole. It is not possible for human intellect to penetrate, to ponder, to contemplate it. (…) To know the real self is arduous; one has to travel long to arrive home. One has to knock on so many doors before one comes to the right door. The easy trick is, you can create a false self. (…) This self is a pseudo-self, a created, manufactured self, homemade. And your own real self remains deep down hidden in mist and mystery. (…) This false self that we go on carrying in our lives like a flag is always in danger of being damaged. It is very fragile; it is very weak. Hence the fear, continuous fear that "I may be lost. My self may be destroyed." A continuous fear goes on trembling in your being – you can never be certain about this false self of yours; you know it is false. (…) We go on searching in the outside world to find some support for our ego, somebody to give a little support, to become a prop. Otherwise there is always the danger that our ego will collapse. So we have to support it from this side and from that, and continuous worry arises. (…) You are clinging to a false center, and that false center depends on others. So you are always looking to what people are saying about you, and you are always following other people; you are always trying to satisfy them. You are always trying to be respectable; you are always trying to decorate your ego. This is suicidal. You become respectable, and your misery remains. Fear will become greater and greater. Once you understand it, the whole energy is put into another direction.

When you drop the ego, you drop a whole world that you have created around it.

All life is of the Whole. (…) We are all great waves of the ocean. We may have forgotten it, but the ocean has not forgotten us. (…) Strength is possible only when the wave knows that it is a wave of a great, infinite ocean. If the wave forgets this, then the wave is very weak.

Listening means forgetting yourself completely – only then can you listen. If you are too self-conscious about yourself, you simply pretend that you are listening. (…) God can reach you only when you are receptive, when you become yin.

The mystic creates in the inner world. The mystic is the highest flower of creativity. But you may not see anything that the mystic is doing. (…) You cannot be a spectator with a Buddha; you have to be a participant, because it is a mystery to be participated in. Then you will see what he is creating. He is creating consciousness, and consciousness is the purest form, the highest form possible, of expression.

Intellectual activity can make you experts in certain things, useful, efficient. But intellect is groping in the dark. It has no eyes, because it is not yet meditative. Intellect is borrowed; it has no insight of its own. (…) And because life is not the same, ever – it is constantly changing, moment to moment it is new – the expert always lags behind; his response is always inadequate. He can only react; he cannot respond, because he is not spontaneous. He has already arrived to conclusions. He is carrying ready-made answers – and the questions that life raises are always new. Moreover, life is not a logical phenomenon; life is paradox; life is mystery – and the intellectual lives through logic; hence he never fits with life, and life never fits with him. (…) Intellect is an unconscious phenomenon. Intelligence is awakening, and unless you are fully awake, whatsoever you decide is bound to be wrong, because it is a conclusion arrived at by an unconscious mind. To bring intelligence into activity, you don't need more information; you need more meditation. You need to become less mind and more heart.

The creator will not carry many beliefs – in fact, none. He will carry only his own experiences. And the beauty of experience is that the experience is always open, because further exploration is always possible. Belief is always closed; it comes to a full point. Belief is always finished. Experience is never finished; it remains unfinished. While you are living, your experience is growing; it is changing; it is moving. It is continuously moving from the known into the unkown, and from the unknown into the unknowable.

Mind is all your beliefs collected together. Put your mind aside and look through no-mind; look through nothingness, shunyata. When you look through no-mind, your perception is efficient, because then you see that which is. And truth liberates. Everything else creates bondage; only truth liberates. (…) Sooner or later, a day comes when you look and your look is pure – you don't have any mind. In that moment, you become avalokita, one who looks with pure eyes.

Creativity has nothing to do with any activity in particular. Anything can be creative; it is you who bring that quality to the activity. Activity itself is neither creative nor uncreative. (…) Love what you do. Be meditative while you are doing it. (…) Don't be worried about what you are doing; one has to do many things, but do everything with devotion. Then your work becomes worship; then whatsoever you do is a prayer, and whatsoever you do is an offering at the altar. (…) The greatness is not in the thing done. The greatness is in the consciousness that you bring while you do it.

Each moment of your life has to be transformed by your meditative love. (…) Nothing is profane; everything is sacred and holy. Unless everything becomes holy to you, your life cannot be religious.

All your creative sources have been plugged, blocked, destroyed, and your whole energy has been forced into some activity that the society thinks is going to pay. Our whole attitude about life is money-oriented, power-oriented. (…) To succeed in this so-called world is to fail deeply in the inside world.

Only a machine can be predicted, not man. Man is unpredictable. Man is always an opening… a potentiality for a thousand and one things. Many doors open and many alternatives are always present at each step – and you have to choose, you have to feel. If you love your life, you will be able to find. But if you don't love your life and you love something else, then there is a problem.

Each person comes into this world with a specific destiny – he has something to fulfill; some message has to be delivered; some work has to be completed. You are not here accidentally – you are here meaningfully: there is a purpose behind you; the Whole intends to do something through you.

Our whole life's structure is such that we are taught that unless there is a recognition, we are nobody, we are worthless. The work is not important, but the recognition is – and this is putting things upside down. The work should be important, a joy in itself. You should not work to be recognized, but because you enjoy being creative; you love the work for its own sake. Your fulfillment should be in the work itself. (…) The so-called recognized people, honored people, are full of rubbish and nothing else. But they are full of the rubbish that the society wants them to be filled with – and the society compensates them by giving them awards.

Any man who has any sense of his own individuality lives by his own love, by his own work, without caring at all what others think of it. The more valuable your work is, the less is the possibility of getting any respectability for it. And if your work is the work of a genius, then you are not going to see any respect in your lifetime – you will be condemned in your lifetime.

To be an individual living in total freedom, on your own feet, drinking from your own sources, is what makes a man really centered, rooted. That is the beginning of his ultimate flowering.

The creator cannot settle anywhere. The creator is a vagabond; he carries his tent on his shoulders. He cannot settle; settling means death to him. He is always ready to take a risk. Risk is his love affair.

The word 'discipline' comes from the same root as the word 'disciple' – the root meaning of the word is 'a process of learning'. One who is ready to learn is a disciple, and the process of being ready to learn is discipline. The knowledgeable person is never ready to learn, because he already thinks he knows; he is very centered in his so-called knowledge. His knowledge is nothing but nourishment for his ego. He cannot be a disciple; he cannot be in true discipline. Socrates says: "I know only one thing, that I know nothing" – that is the beginning of discipline. When you don't know anything, of course, a great longing arises to enquire, explore, investigate. And the moment you start learning, another factor follows inevitably: whatsoever you have learned has to be dropped continuously; otherwise it will become knowledge, and knowledge will prevent further learning. The real man of discipline never accumulates; each moment he dies to whatsoever he has come to know and again becomes ignorant. That ignorance is really luminous.

Discipline has been misinterpreted. Thousands of 'shoulds' and 'should nots' have been imposed on man. (…) The creative person has to dissolve all 'shoulds' and 'should nots'. He needs freedom and space, vast space; he needs the whole sky and all the stars. Only then can his innermost spontaneity start growing. (…) Your discipline has to come from your very heart; it has to be your very own. When somebody else gives you the discipline, it can never fit; it will be like wearing somebody else's clothes. Either they will be to loose or too tight, and you will always feel a little bit silly in them.

Our first unconsciousness is that we think that we are separate.

The real creativity is not out of remembrance, but out of consciousness. You will have to become more conscious. (…) You cannot have creative imagination if you are too much burdened by the memory. (…) I am not saying to forget the factual past; I am simply saying, don't be disturbed by it anymore. It should not become a psychological investment. (…) Creative imagination has nothing to do with psychological memory – only then is it creative. Otherwise, what you call creation is not really creation – it is just a composition. There is a great difference between a creation and a composition. You go on arranging your old known things in different ways, but they are old; nothing is new there. You simply manage to change the structure. It is a composition; you have not created anything. That's what ninety-nine percent of authors, poets, painters go on doing. They are mediocre; they are not creative. (…) Ninety-nine percent of modern art is pathological. (…) Picasso needs therapy; he should paint, but those paintings should not be on exhibition – or if they are, only in madhouses. As therapy, they are cathartic: they may help a few mad people to have a release, to throw their madness out of their system – it may be good for them, but not for others. (…) Real art means something that helps you to be meditative. (…) The creative person is one who brings something from the unknown into the world of the known, who brings something from God into the world, who becomes a hollow bamboo and allows God to flow through him. (…) You disappear, then creativity is. (…) The real creators know perfectly well that they are not the creators – they were just instrumental; they were mediums. Something happened through them, true, but they are not the doers of it. (…) Only fragments can be brought, but when you bring some fragments from the unknowable, you transform the whole quality of human consciousness.

The real art arises out of real religiousness, because religiousness is finding a communion with reality. Once you are in communion with reality, then real art arises.

Meditators have been working on energy patterns down the ages. Once you know the energy pattern, you know the whole personality. You know in and out, all – because it is the energy pattern that creates everything. You know past; you know present; you know future. Once the energy pattern has been understood, there is the key, the nucleus, of all that has happened to you and all that is going to happen.

A poet, an artist, a painter, is on the way to becoming a mystic. All artistic activity is on the way toward becoming religious.

The deeper your creation, the greater will be your emptiness afterward. The greater the storm, the greater will be the silence that comes in its wake. Enjoy it. The storm is good, enjoy it; and the silence that follows, it is also good.

Life is not there readymade, available. You get the life that you create; you get out of life that which you put into it. First, you have to pour meaning into it. You have to give color and music and poetry; you have to be creative. Only then will you be alive.

Life itself has no meaning. Life is an opportunity to create meaning. Meaning has not to be discovered; it has to be created. You will find meaning only if you create it. It is not lying there somewhere behind the bushes, so you can go and you search a little bit and find it. It is not there like a rock that you will find. It is a poetry to be composed; it is a song to be sung; it is a dance to be danced. (…) And each individual has to give birth to God, to meaning, to truth; each man has to become pregnant with it and pass through the pains of birth. Each one has to carry it in one's womb, feed it by one's own blood, and only then does one discover.

The enquiry has to be pure. It should be without any conclusion. It should not have any a priori in it. (…) If you have already concluded that you are looking for a certain meaning, then from the very beginning your enquiry is polluted, your enquiry is impure. You have already decided. (…) Go without knowledge if you want to find truth. The knowledgeable person never finds it; his knowledge is a barrier.

So many thoughts in the mind, mixed up; nothing seems to be clear; you have heard so many things from so many sources – your mind is a mess. Clean it! Make it a blank. The empty mind is the best mind. The empty mind is closer to God than anything. The empty mind is not the devil's workshop. The devil cannot do without thoughts. With emptiness the devil cannot do anything at all. He has no way into emptiness.

Be alert. Each moment has to be taken as if this were the last moment. And there is every possibility this may be the last moment! So use it totally. Squeeze the juices out of it totally. In that very totality, you will be alert. Whatsoever you do, do it with deep alertness; then even the small things become sacred. Then cooking or cleaning become sacred; they become worship. It is not a question of what you are doing; the question is how you are doing it. Work or sit or walk, but one thing has to be a continuous thread: make more and more moments of your life luminous with awareness. Let the candle of awareness burn in each moment, in each act. The cumulative effect is what enlightenment is. The cumulative effect, all the moments together, all small candles together, become a great source of light.

Watch out! Become more and more essential, and less and less accidental. Always remember: Only that which is eternal is true; only that which is going to be forever and ever is true. That which is momentary is untrue. The momentary has to be watched and not to be identified with.

Gypsies are continually moving – they are wandering people. So when the older people go into a town, they draw circles around their children and tell them, "Sit here. You cannot leave. It is a magic circle." (…) From his very childhood, this old gypsy man has been conditioned for it; it's a reality for him, because reality is that which affects you. There is no other criterion for reality.

My sannyasins have to live a life of bliss – that is their meditation. They have to drop all seriousness; they have to become more playful. They have to look at life not as a problem, but as a mystery. If you look at it as a problem, you become serious, because then a great temptation arises to solve it – and it is unsolvable. It will lead you into more and more seriousness and into frustration and into sadness.

On the circumference, we are different people – but at the center, we are one; at the center, we all meet. The farther away we go from the center, the farther away we go from each other; and the closer we come to the center, the closer we come to each other. Hence love is a natural by-product of meditativeness, because you start feeling a new kind of closeness with people, with trees, with rocks, with stars – with everything that is. And when you are at the center, then suddenly you know that there is only one, that we are all part of one organic unity – and that's the meaning of God.

Let this become your key: next time when anger comes, just watch it. Don't say, "I am angry"; say rather, "anger is there; I am watching it". And see the difference. The difference is vast. Suddenly you are out of the grip of anger if you can say "I am just a watcher; I am not anger". When sadness comes, just sit by the side and look at it and say "I am the watcher; I am not sadness", and see the difference. Immediately you have cut the very root of sadness. It is no more nourished; it will die of starvation, because we feed these emotions by being identified with them.

One has to become more and more alive, full of zest, gusto, intensity. One should not withhold. When you are full of life, love starts happening on its own accord, because what will you do with life, what will you do with that overflowing energy? You will have to share it – that's what love is: sharing your life energy. And the moment you share your life energy, all sadness disappears; then life is just a heartfelt laughter.

Remember, one who enjoys more is bound to suffer more, because he becomes very sensitive. But suffering is not bad. If you understand it rightly, suffering is a cleansing. If you understand it rightly, sadness has a depth to it which no happiness can ever have. A person who is simply happy is always superficial. A person who has not known sorrow and has not known sadness, has not known the depths. He has not touched the bottom of his being; he has remained just on the periphery. One has to move within these two banks. Within these two banks flows the river.

If you can accept sadness, it is no more sadness. You have brought a new quality to it. You will grow through it. Now it will not be a stone, a rock on the path blocking the way; it will become a step. And remember always: a person who has not known deep sadness is a poor person. He will never have an inner richness. A person who has lived always happy, smiling, shallow, has not entered into the innermost temple of his being. He has missed the innermost shrine.

Don't reject sadness and don't cling to happiness, and soon you will understand that happiness and sadness are two aspects of the same coin. Then you will see that happiness also has a sadness in it, and sadness also has a happiness in it. Then your inner being is enriched. Then you can enjoy everything: the morning and the evening also, the sunlight and the dark night also, the day and the night, the summer and the winter, life and death – you can enjoy all.

Live the way existence wanted you to live. Your very life should be so intense and so total that you burn your life's torch from both ends. In that very intensity, you will know that you have touched something of eternity. And if you have known it in your life, then in your death you will find a deeper confirmation of the fact. People who live in personality always die unconscious. That's why we don't remember our past lives. You were unconscious, and death happened in your unconsciousness. But if you live consciously, as an individual, then you will die consciously, the way Socrates is dying – so conscious to the last breath. And this memory will be with you in your next life too.

Life and death are two phases of the same energy. Death is not the end of life. Death itself is part of life, and life goes on. You have died many times, and still you are alive. Your life is eternal. Death is a small episode here and there, when you change your house, but the essential of your being remains the same. How many times you change houses does not matter, but it is inconceivable to the mind.

A right kind of education will teach people to live here-now, to create a paradise of this earth, not to wait for death to come, and not to be miserable till death stops your misery. Let death find you dancing and joyous and loving. It is a strange experience that if a man can live this life as if he is already in paradise, death cannot take away anything from that man's experience.

The path of the mystic is totally different from the path of the philosopher. The mystic does not try to find answers for the questions. He simply understands one thing: that until he goes beyond mind, questions will continue; no answer can help. But the moment you are beyond the mind, all questions disappear, and in that disappearance, you have found the answer: without words, without language, you have become a knower. You have become knowing itself, not knowledge. This state is the state of the watcher.

The very climate of death suddenly takes away all your masks. (…) Death exposes without fail.

Unless you become alert and aware in life, unless you change the quality of your living, you will not die consciously. And only a conscious death can bring you to a conscious birth; and then a far more conscious life opens its doors. Changing worldly desires into other-worldly desires is the last strategy of the mind to keep you captive, to keep you a prisoner, to keep you in bondage.

It is good that life never fulfills your dreams – it always goes on disposing, in a way. It gives you a thousand and one opportunities to be frustrated, so that you can understand that expectations are not good, and dreams are futile, and desires are never fulfilled. Then you drop desiring; you drop dreaming; you drop proposing. Suddenly you are back home, and the treasure is there.

If you can even for a single moment put aside desiring, then the projector stops, and the dreaming stops, and you are able to face reality.

Ordinarily, all desires exist in the second state of consciousness, the dreaming state. Desire is a dream, and to work for a dream is doomed from the very beginning, because a dream can never become real. Even if sometimes you feel it has become almost real, it never becomes real – a dream by nature is empty. It has no substance in it.

We have investments in our dreams. They don't exist without our help; we make them exist. Sweet dreams, golden dreams – we have a romance with them, a very long romance of many lives. We go on courting dreams, and of course when we court them, they are there, and they bring nothing but frustration. Because they are against reality, they can never bring fulfillment. There is no way to make two plus two equal five; there is no way. Whatsoever you do, two plus two will always be four, and you go on hoping that someday it is going to be five. Then you are simply in a mathematical error. Dreams can never be real; your thoughts can never be real; your hopes can never be realized; your desires can never be fulfilled. The only outcome can be more and more frustration.

When this awareness grows, dreaming stops, by and by. When this awareness grows, the wheel moves slower and slower, because there is no point. You never move, so what is the point of travelling the whole earth? You remain the same; then desires slow down. One day it happens: the wheel is as silent, as unmoving as the hub. That is the point when enlightenment happens.

Only when all your desires disappear does that energy become compassion, karuna. You cannot cultivate compassion. When you are desireless, compassion happens; your whole energy moves into compassion. And this movement is very different. Desire has a motivation in it, a goal. Compassion is non-motivated – there is no goal to it; it is simply overflowing energy.

To me, love is a by-product of a meditative mind. It is not related to sex; it is related to dhyana, meditation. The more silent you become, the more at ease with yourself you will be, the more fulfilled you will feel, and the more a new expression of your being will be there. You will begin to love. Not anyone in particular. It may happen with someone in particular, but that is another thing. You begin to love. This loving becomes your way of existing. It can never turn into repulsion, because it is not an attraction.

Love is a state of being; it has nothing to do with anybody else. One is not in love, one is love. And of course, when one is love, one is in love – but that is an outcome, a by-product; that is not the source. The source is that one is love.

Love is prayer. There is no other prayer; all other prayers are just pseudo, substitutes for love. The other prayers (…) have lost their intrinsic quality of love.

Everything starts with love, remember; love is the ultimate law. Then, prayer, mercy, grace follow of their own accord.

Love is the rock, the only rock on which we can build the temple of life, the temple of God. Everything else is just sand; except love nothing can become the foundation of life. And to make a house on anything else is to waste your time, energy; ultimately you will have only frustration in your hands and nothing else.

Man cannot be fulfilled without love, without meditation, without God. Love is the beginning of the journey.

The moment love arises in the heart, all fear disappears; light has come in and no darkness is found.

Love is the way to God.

Love is the only contentment in life; everything else deceives. Everything else is a mirage; it allures you, but it never satisfies you. On the contrary, it leaves a feeling of great frustration – money, power, prestige… everything except love. Love gives you the first taste of contentment. One feels perfectly satisfied as one is, and in that state of contentment, God comes in.

To me, religion is a love affair. It has nothing to do with intellect; it has nothing to do with reason. It is falling in love. With whomsoever you have fallen in love, that is your way. Go through it – that is your door. (…) Love is the door; it is irrelevant with whom you have fallen in love. Love redeems, neither Jesus, nor Krishna. Love redeems. Fall in love. Love is the only redeeming force. Love is the savior.

Real love is not a function of the ego. The ego is always asking for power, so even when you love – because your love is not real, because it is just a part of the ego – it is bound to be violent.

Ordinarily, when you fall in love with someone, the real feeling is how to get love from him. It is not that love is going from you to him. Rather, it is an expectation that love will come to you from him. That is why love becomes so possessive. You possess someone so that you can get something out of him.

I teach human love, because it is in the fulfillment of human love that divine love flowers – not against it, but in absolute continuity with it.

These are the two paths. Love means working out your path through relationship. And meditation: working it out in your loneliness. Love and meditation – these are the two paths. Feel which will suit you. Then bring your total energies to it, and move on that path.

Love, and more love becomes available; use more, and you have more. This is the law of life. (…) If you want to become an infinite source of love, then go on sharing love as much as you can. Don't be a miser; only misers lose energy. And we are all misers; that's why we always feel dissipated.

Certainly, if you are not aware of who you are, you cannot be love. You will be fear.

The whole point is to understand that the future is not. The future is created by the ambitious mind. (…) You cannot fulfill ambition now. You can fulfill life now, but not ambition. Ambition is against life. (…) Mind means ambition, the ego trip of being this and that.

Both meet in you – time and eternity. Now it is for you to decide. If you move in ambition, you will move in time, and death exists in time. If you move in desire, you will move in time, and death exists in time. If you hanker for the ego, you will move in time. Death, ego, desire, ambition – they all are part of the horizontal line. If you start digging in the moment and move vertically, you become a non-ego; you become desireless; you become non-ambitious. But suddenly you are aflame with life; you are an intense energy of life. God has taken possession of you. Move vertically, and all miserliness disappears.

Let it be remembered always: you cannot become non-violent if there is still ambition. Any kind of ambition will never allow you compassion. How can you be compassionate if there is ambition? You have still to fight, still to make your way.

Your eyes are clouded; your mirror of consciousness is dusty. Clean it! Create more clarity. If competitiveness disappears, then you are in the world and yet you are not in the world. If ambition disappears, then there is no world left. But how ambition and competition can disappear? We go on creating new ways. Somebody is trying to have more money than you; and somebody else is trying to be more virtuous than you. What is the difference? Somebody is trying to be more knowledgeable than you; somebody else is trying to have more character than you. It is the same desire, the same dreaming, the same sleepiness. And people go on and on in their dreaming: their dreams change, but they never wake up.

If you are ambitious, then your mind is bound to remain restless. If you want peace, then the first requirement is to drop all ambition. Unless you drop ambition, you cannot be at ease, at peace; you cannot be relaxed.

To live without meditation is to be foolish, because whatsoever you do then is going to be wrong. You cannot do right without meditation, because right only grows in the soil of meditation.

Become still. (…) Understanding the futility of desire, seeing the absolute absurdity of ambition, become still – through understanding, not through practice.

What is enlightenment? – The insight that desire is futile, that ambition is illness. Then suddenly, you are thrown back to the present moment. To be in the present is to be enlightened; to be now and to be here is to be enlightened.

Success keeps you rushing towards the future, and that becomes your intoxicant. Hoping, hoping for the tomorrow, wasting that which you have, for that which you don't have and will never have.

Samadhi means death with consciousness, dying fully alert.

A disciple is one who trusts himself. Out of his trust, he comes to learn from somebody who has gone a little further than himself. He is not a follower; he is not an imitator; he is not seeking security – he is seeking understanding. Even if that understanding brings more insecurity, he is ready for it.

A Master will be needed to hammer. You will need somebody whom you can love more than you love your father, whom you can love more than you love your mother. (…) The Master can go to those deepest layers of your being where conditioning has happened, and he can destroy. Unless the Master becomes more significant than your parents, it is not possible; it is not psychologically possible.

The first birth is through the mother and the father; the second, the true birth, is through the Master.

A real Master teaches you unlearning; it is never learning.

Anger simply shows that something in you is hurt; some wound is there.

Life should be a continuous celebration, a festival of lights the whole year round. Only then you can grow up; only then you can blossom. Transform small things into celebration.

If your celebration comes to peak, this shore turns to be that shore. When you are really at the peak of your celebration, when your dance is at the ultimate climax, immediately this shore is no more this shore – you are on the other shore. You are no more in the world; you are in God.

Religion cannot be anything other than a celebration of life.

Celebration is possible only when existence is a continuous newness, and existence is always young. When nothing grows old, when nothing really dies – because everything is constantly reborn – it becomes a dance.

Remember, even after enlightenment the uniqueness of the individual remains intact. That uniqueness is so deep that it never leaves you. When a man becomes enlightened, his uniqueness blooms rather than disappears. It comes to bloom. A Buddha becomes enlightened in his own way. The enlightenment is the same; the experience of the light is the same; the experience of truth is the same – but the experiencer has an individuality, a unique individuality.

When there is enlightenment, God takes possession of the enlightened person, because the enlightened person is not a person at all; he is just emptiness. And only in that emptiness can God take possession. So whenever there is this emptiness, whenever the ego disappears, God immediately appears. These are two aspects of the same phenomenon: the ego disappearing and God appearing. The death of the ego is the birth of God.

Enlightenment is not attained by striving for it – no. Striving itself is the greatest impediment. You don't attain it by making effort; you attain it by relaxing all efforts. It happens. It is not an attainment really; it is not an achievement… and the achiever's mind never reaches it. It is a relaxation: when you are not striving for anything, not thinking to achieve anything, not even thinking about enlightenment, then it happens. It takes you always unawares: when you are really looking for it hard, it goes on eluding you. That is not the way to get to it. It is very elusive, mercury-like.

Watch desire… just watching, observing, seeing the ways of the desire and the subtle, cunning strategies of it, and how it always comes. It even starts thinking "How to drop desire?" – it starts desiring the state of no-desire too.

Love is the only light in life; all else is darkness.

Enlightenment means to live life without any hankering for meaning. Then whatsoever is, is good; and whatsoever is not, that too is good.

In India we have three names for enlightenment; they come from three traditions. The hindu tradition calls it moksha; it means freedom, absolute freedom: you will be there, absolutely free. The second name is kaivalya; that comes from the jaina tradition. It means absolute aloneness: you will be there, but absolutely alone, purely alone. And the third name is nirvana; it comes from the buddhist tradition. It is the most difficult of all the three, and the most meaningful of all the three. It means cessation of the self. (…) Nirvana means utter cessation: all disappears; there is simple emptiness. In that emptiness, there is tremendous consciousness, fulfillment, but no center to be fulfilled. To know it, it has to be experienced.

Remember this – that by and by, one has to drop all the distinctions of good and bad, moral, immoral, what should be done and what should not be done. The very idea of 'ought' has to be dropped slowly, slowly, so only 'is' remains and there is no 'ought'. When there is pure 'isness', one is free. That pure 'isness' we call enlightenment. It is not an achievement; you are already that. These clouds that surround you just have to disappear.

After enlightenment, nobody is born again. After enlightenment, to keep oneself in the body becomes more and more difficult. The reason is very simple. Enlightenment is exactly what the word means, as if a lightning has fallen upon you. Your being and your body are no longer bridged. You are in the body, but your connections with the body are destroyed. That lightning destroyed all connections with the body.

My religion is nothing but the art of living, the art of loving. And if you can manage two things – total life, total love – the third thing, enlightenment, will come of its own accord. You have earned it. You need not seek it; you deserve it. It is a reward from existence to those people who have respected life, loved, lived, danced, enjoyed.

Love makes you empty – empty of jealousy, empty of power trips, empty of anger, empty of competitiveness, empty of your ego and all its garbage. But love also makes you full of things which are unknown to you right now; it makes you full of fragrance, full of light, full of joy.

The moment the person withdraws from the mind, the mind has no energy to go on into old routines. It is your identity with the mind that gives power to it. You have taken your identity back; you are no longer nursing the mind; it starts dying. The farther you go away from it, the more and more your mind dies. And to attain a state of no-mind is what I call health. That is the goal of meditation. Then your spirit is healed; you have become whole.

My understanding is that religion is the ultimate luxury. You have to feed your body first: if your body is hungry, it is impossible to become a Buddha. You have to train your mind first, bring it to its highest peak of intelligence. If that is not possible, you cannot become a Buddha. These are the steps. The body has to be completely satisfied. The mind has to be sharpened, alert, aware, able to enjoy Mozart, Dostoevsky, Tolstoy, Picasso, Rabindranath. Only then is there a possibility of a new flight, because all these things give you a little joy, but very momentary.

The mind hankers for that which it has not got, and the mind gets bored with whatsoever it has got.

Mind means the past, the accumulated past, the accumulated dust of the past. Mind is a rut, a routine. It is never new. It goes on repeating itself; it is like a gramophone record, stuck.

Ego needs continuous fight, because it feeds on fight. The more you fight, the stronger your ego becomes. (…) Unless you surrender, you will remain in misery. Surrender is the door to bliss, to beauty, to truth, to love, to life, to God.

When you feel blissful, you are right, moving in exactly the way you should move. Because bliss increases only when you are approaching closer to God, and in no other way. If you are going away from God, anguish increases. You feel more and more frustrated, more and more bored, more and more miserable. Misery is an indication that you are going astray, a natural indication that you have lost track of truth.

Spirituality is not other-worldliness. Spirituality is a way of living in this world meditatively, totally, blissfully. It is not against the world; in fact it enhances this world, enriches this world; it makes this world more beautiful, more blissful.

It is my understanding that man can live only in meditation – otherwise there is no life. Meditation is life. Not to be in meditation is not to live. Then you only pretend that you are living; then your life is just a mask. It has no authenticity in it; it has no depth – it is just the surface, the façade.

If you live consciously, if you try to bring consciousness to every act that you go through, you will be living in a silent, blissful state, in serenity, in joy, in love. Your life will have the flavor of a festival. That is the meaning of heaven: your life will have many flowers in it; much fragrance will be released through you. You will have an aura of delight. Your life will be a song of life-affirmation; it will be a sacred yes to all that existence is. You will be in communion with existence – in communion with stars, with the trees, with the rivers, with the mountains, with people, with animals. This whole life and this whole existence will have a totally different meaning for you. From every nook and corner, rivers of bliss will be flowing towards you. Heaven is just a name for that state of mind. Hell means you are living so unconsciously, so absurdly, in such contradiction, that you go on creating more and more misery for yourself.

If you are centered, nothing can be destroyed. No fire can destroy your centering. Not even death is capable of distracting you. And this centering is possible only if you start living each moment meditatively, fully alert, awake. Don't move like an automaton. Don't react like a mechanism. Become conscious. Collect yourself more and more, so that a crystallized consciousness continuously illuminates your inner being; a flame goes on burning there, and it lights wherever you move. The path, the way, whatsoever you do, it lights it.

It is through decisiveness that the soul is born. If you exist accidentally, like driftwood, you live without a soul; your life is not much of a life. It is pseudo; it is lukewarm; it has no intensity; it has no flame; it has no light. You cannot experience the truth. Living accidentally, knowing the truth is impossible. One has to be so decisive, so committed, so consciously involved with life, so intensely adventurous, that all is at stake every moment. One has to be creative – not only unfolding, but creative.

Unconsciousness is a wandering outside; consciousness is a deepening of the inside.

Unconsciousness is slavery; consciousness is mastery.

Consciousness means living with a witness; unconsciousness means living without a witness.

Desire exists with unconsciousness; it cannot exist with consciousness. When you move in desire, consciousness disappears. (…) When you are desireless, you will be aware; when you are aware, you will be desireless. These are two aspects of the same coin – on one aspect, desirelessness; on another aspect, alertness, consciousness.

Bodhidharma is saying, act only out of totality. And this kind of act is possible only if your whole being is totally conscious and your action comes from your whole being, not from a small part of your being – then it cannot be total; then it cannot be sure. Act totally and act intensely, and act absolutely in consciousness and in spontaneity. Then, whatever you do is good.

That's what the state of enlightenment is – so alert that only the witness is real, and everything else is nothing but ripples on the surface of the water. Everything is passing; everything is a flux. Only one thing remains and remains and remains, and that is your consciousness, your awareness. Transforming unconsciousness into consciousness – that is the real transformation of base metal into gold. Gold represents consciousness, enlightenment.

Being simply a witness, you are at the highest peak of consciousness, and when you are at the highest peak of consciousness, from there you can look at the deepest depth of your being – the very abysmal depth. You have moved from a horizontal into a vertical being.

Witness that you are not the seven subtle bodies behind the body, layer upon layer. Witness that you are only a witness, and nothing else – a pure consciousness.

Religion is basically the science of creating consciousness in you.

Conscience means all the knowledge that you have. And consciousness means being empty, being utterly empty, and moving into life with that emptiness, seeing through that emptiness and acting out of that emptiness – then action has tremendous grace.

If your life was of meditativeness, awareness, witnessing, then you will be able to witness death too. If your whole life you remained cool, centered in different situations, death will give you the ultimate challenge, the ultimate test. And if you can remain centered, calm and cool and watching, then you will not die an unconscious death; your death will bring you to the ultimate peak of consciousness.

A really spiritual person will live life as an art, will create a deep harmony between the body and the consciousness. And this is the greatest art there is. His life will be a joy to see. And he will be fragrant, for the sheer reason that there is no split in his being. The very unity makes him organic; the wound of division is healed.

Unless a man learns how to create, he never becomes a part of existence, which is constantly creative. By being creative, one becomes divine; creativity is the only prayer.

Creativity is secondary; meditation is basic and fundamental. Everything should come out of your meditation. Then it will give you a beatitude, your being a new song, and it will help others to experience something of it. It will depend on their meditativeness.

The world ceases to be for one whose circle of energy is complete. If you have made the right effort, if you have put your total energy into your search for truth, for being, then your circle of energy will be complete. Right now, it is not whole; it is fragmented, divided. (…) Your life is like a car that moves in jerks because it has been filled with dirty gas that makes it hiccup. This is how you live, hesitating and halting, like a car with hiccups. Your energy moves in fits and starts, bit by bit; it is never an integrated whole.

You become identified with whatever comes in front of you, although the truth is that you are separate from all these states. It is as if the rainy season comes, and you start feeling that you are the rain; or summer comes, and you start feeling that you are the heat of the summer; or winter comes, and you start feeling that you are the cold of the winter. But the actuality is that three seasons are around you; you are totally separate from them.

You become lost in your dream, and when you wake up, you again know it was a dream. There is an element of consciousness within you that is a traveller – the waking dream and deep-sleep states are just stops along the way, but you are not them. As soon as you understand the fact that you are separate, apart, then the birth of the fourth state will begin in you. This separateness, this apartness, is the fourth state. Mahavira has coined a beautiful word for this state. He calls it the "art of discrimination".

By and by, you will have to learn to separate yourself. You will have to learn to separate yourself in every situation. (…) You are only the observer. (…) Slowly, slowly, go on standing apart from everything that overpowers you. It is difficult to separate yourself. The gap is very small, and the boundaries are not clear at all, because, for millions of lives, you have learned to identify. You have never learned dis-identification. You learned to always identify with every situation. You have totally forgotten the art of dis-identification. And the identification that you have developed is called unconsciousness. (…) Unconsciousness means becoming identified with whatever comes into your mind.

Maya means that the world that you live in is false. It does not mean that the sun and the stars, the mountains and the trees outside are false; it only means that your identification with them is false. And you live in this identification; that is your world.

Buddha has said that an awakened person ceases to suffer. You cannot make him suffer. You can cut off his limbs; you can throw him in the fire; you can kill him – but you cannot make him suffer, because he remains separate, each moment, from everything that is happening.

The moment you become aware that you are dreaming, the dream shatters, because for a dream to continue, the absence of awareness is a must; no dream can continue without the absence of awareness. (…) An enlightened one does not dream, because even while he sleeps, he is able to keep the awareness that it is a dream.

The moment you come to know that the dream is an illusion, it disappears. There is nothing left to be seen; there is no object. And only when the object is completely gone can the vision turn back to the seer. As long as there is something to see, you will look outside, because the scene attracts you. When the scene is no longer there, when the screen is empty, when even the screen is no longer there, you are left alone.

Meditation is energy turning towards yourself. And the moment energy turns towards yourself, you can be aware even in sushupti, in deep sleep, because in deep sleep you exist, but the world does not exist, the dreams don't exist. You are caught looking towards the world and your dreams, so you remain unconscious in the deep-sleep state. Now this entanglement is uprooted. Now you have no connection with what is seen; now you can be without it. Now the lamp simply burns; it has no concern with whether or not someone passes under its light. Now your consciousness will turn inward. Then you will be awake, even in deep sleep. What you have to do after your dream is broken is not to open your eyes yet, because once you open your eyes, the world of objects is there once again. The seen will come back. So as your dream breaks, don't open your eyes; just go on looking at emptiness. The dream has vanished; nothing is there in its place – just go on observing that emptiness. In doing this, you will find that your consciousness has turned inward. Then you are awake even in deep sleep.

When one has known the waking, dream and deep-sleep states without identification, the fourth state is known. (…) As soon as you step out of the first three states, you are existence itself. You have become narrow because you entered into them. It is as if from being under the open sky you enter a tunnel, and the tunnel becomes narrower and narrower. By the time you reach the point of having five senses, you have become very narrow. Now you will have to go in reverse. As you move farther and farther back, your spaciousness will increase. The day you find yourself outside the first three states, you have become as vast as the sky; you have become existence itself.

Your life goes around in circles, like a bullock at an oil mill. You get up in the morning and start on the track, and at night you go to sleep, completing the circle. Again you get up in the morning… and the same routine. The repetition is so habitual that you no longer have any need to be conscious in your activities. Everything happens as if in a trance.

Going to temples does not make you religious. (…) Awareness is the temple. (…) No one else can break this state of slumber but you. So the first thing for you to understand is that even your waking state is in a stupor, whereas even the deep sleep of a meditator is an awake state. You are an upside-down meditator.

If you rush something, you are bound to become unconscious. Give it a little time.

The people who are manipulating you are also not their own masters. You are the slave of slaves. And the irony is that all are experts in manipulating each other, and no one is conscious.

There is no direction in your life; there cannot be. You behave like a man in a crowd who is being pushed around, and you call it walking. You are not really walking. You are not really walking; you are being pushed around so much that you can't stand still. Someone pushes you to the right, you go right; someone pushes you to the left, and you go left. Your whole life is like this, decided by the crowd. If you look carefully into this, you will see: somebody says something, and you do what he says; then somebody says something else, and you do that. And in this way, you are filled with so many contradictions. (…) You listen to everybody; you listen to whoever can dominate you. Then your inner world becomes fragmented, and your personality becomes schizophrenic. Until you listen to the inner voice, you cannot be an integrated whole.

An unconscious man knows nothing of the inner voice. (...) The voice that seems to satisfy your desires, the voice of your innermost desires, is what you call "the voice of your innermost soul".

A seeker has to remember only one thing: in each moment, to use every occasion and situation to become more aware. Then, whether it is hunger or anger or lust or greed, every state can be used to grow in awareness. If you go on accumulating awareness in this way, bit by bit, eventually, you will have enough fuel stored in you. In the fire that is created from this fuel, you will find that you are neither the waking state, nor the dream state, nor the deep-sleep state – you are beyond and separate from all three. The waking state is presence of perception. (…) The dream state is shifting imagination. (…) The deep-sleep state is the absence of perception and self-awareness.

In the West, psychologists advise people to forget themselves if they want to stay healthy. In the East, the spiritual Masters tell you that you can be healthy only if you are awake. These are two very contrary statements, but both are meaningful. The Western psychologist accepts your present state. He only makes sure that you can live in your present, normal state, that you can somehow get through your life. (…) More awareness is dangerous. (…) But the Eastern Masters don't accept your present state. They say, "You are ill. You are insane. You don't need peace as the first goal. At first, even if your anxieties grow and you become more disturbed, it does not matter, because it is through this that you will be transformed, that a revolution will happen in your life."

Understand the difference between happiness and bliss. Happiness is when even the small ray of consciousness that is already in you is also put to sleep. Then you are not aware of your own suffering. Ananda, bliss, is when the small ray of your consciousness becomes like a great sun, and the darkness disappears completely. Happiness is negative; it is insensitivity to suffering: you have a headache, you take an aspirin. That is a state of happiness, not of bliss. The aspirin only makes you insensitive to the pain; it gives you some unconsciousness of it. (…) Happiness is nothing but the forgetting of sorrow, whereas bliss is the remembrance of your being. (…) So be aware: stay away from anything that makes you more insensitive or unconscious.

Why are people involved in such useless activities like tying or untying knots? It is to avoid encountering themselves.

In the beginning, you will have to pass through much pain and suffering, because you will have to destroy all the lies you have created in your life, through many lifetimes.

This middle part of the journey is what is called tapascharya, ascetic discipline. Begin your ascetic discipline in the waking state, then carry your discipline into the dream state, and then into the deep-sleep state. (…) there is a constant thread of dreams inside you. This undercurrent has to be broken, because only if you succeed in breaking it in the daytime will you be able to break it in the night.

Mantras are devices to break this undercurrent. For example, a Master gives a mantra to a person. He tells the person to go on doing his work, to stay in the marketplace, tending to his business of buying and selling, but to allow an inner chanting of "rama, rama, rama" to continue. What does this mean? It means that if he continues to keep chanting "rama" while doing his routine work, then the energy that was flowing in the current of dreams will flow into the current of chanting "rama". It is the same energy that was the dream. (…) The unused energy in him that was going into dreaming will go into the remembrance of rama, of the Divine. (…) The day that you find that there are no dreams anymore even when you sleep at night, and instead there is a current flow of "rama, rama…", you will understand that your daydreaming has also disappeared.

Mantras are a method to dissolve dreams. (…) A mantra is a technique, a process, a tool, a hammer that shatters dreams.

What are dreams? They are shifting imaginations. And what is a mantra? It is something definite. It too is a form of shifting imagination, but dreams are momentary, changing, whereas the mantra is continuous and uniform. Gradually, the energy of all the dreaming is absorbed in the mantra. The night you find that there are no more dreams and only the mantra is continuing throughout your sleep, know that you have conquered your dreaming. Your dream is now broken, and reality has begun. After that, you can enter the deep-sleep state.

You may not be aware that it is difficult to find a greater failure than the person who has realized his dreams, because at the peak of success, such a person will find that all he has struggled for, competed for, all that he has worked so hard for, had nothing to give him once he got there. But just to hide his stupidity, he will go on smiling, waving and giving victory signs to the people who are still behind him in the rat race. (…) They go on pretending that they have attained the ultimate happiness.

Your dreams need tremendous energy to be fulfilled, and you discover in the end that you have nothing in your hands. Only ashes are left in your hands – always. All the successes of this world turn to ashes. And by the time you have only ashes in your hands, your life has passed by, and there is no way to return. And then, all that is left for you is to hide this reality from others, and show that your life has not been lived in vain, that you are fulfilled, that your life has been fruitful. The dream state is shifting imagination. Don't give energy to dreams. Whenever you start dreaming, give yourself a shake and wake up! Break the dreaming as fast as you can.

Sleep means nothing but unconsciousness.

All tensions fade in the deep-sleep state, but there is no awareness there. In samadhi, the state of turiya, all tensions fade, and awareness is also there. Awareness plus deep sleep equals samadhi.

If science has its way, the world will be filled with a boredom such as it has never experienced before. If Westerners today are more bored, the root cause lies in science, because people's capacity to feel wonder is disappearing. People are not amazed by anything; they have simply forgotten how to be amazed. If you give them a problem which seems unsolvable, they will say, "Oh! It can be solved!" – because, essentially, in the eyes of science, nothing can remain unsolved forever. Science says, "We will unveil it." – But the religious journey is just the opposite: the more veils you remove, the more you will find that the mystery goes on deepening. The closer you come, the more you realize the difficulty of ever knowing it. And the day we penetrate to the very core of existence, everything becomes so mysterious. For a Buddha, stones and pebbles lying on the ground are as mysterious as the stars twinkling high in the sky. It is not only the vast that is mysterious to him, but the tiniest phenomenon has become mysterious to him. A seed sprouting in the soil is as mysterious as the creation of the whole universe.

The biggest misfortune in this world is when your sense of wonder is destroyed. When your sense of wonder is destroyed, the possibility of your liberation becomes extremely difficult. When your sense of wonder is destroyed, your childlike heart dies, becomes lifeless. You have become old.

Wonder is a purification of the mind. A sense of wonder means that the mind has become free of all answers. A sense of wonder means that you have left all the rubbish of your answers, your questioning and your curiosity, and have again become new and fresh. You have realized your ignorance.

Science thinks in terms of conquering – dissecting, taking apart. Religion thinks in terms of surrendering, dissolving in yourself.

In the outer world, to earn the joy of happiness, you have to pay with suffering. In the world, happiness is connected with an equal amount of suffering. And this is the dilemma: people want to have the happiness and avoid the suffering, but that is not possible. For thousands of years, we have tried to eliminate the suffering and save the happiness. But this effort is futile. Suffering is certainly eliminated, but then, at the same time, happiness will be reduced in the same proportion. We reject suffering and desire happiness – and this is the root cause of the big mess humanity is in.

People have to be ready to suffer for the joys of success and ambition they pursue their whole lives, to suffer in the same proportion as the amount of happiness they pursue – and those hardships and sufferings will break them completely. Long before they have experienced any success, they will have become almost a failure. Nobody ever succeeds in this world, because you have to go through so much insanity, so much madness as the price for this success, that by the time success comes, it is not worth having.

The mind is mantra. (…) Repetition becomes energy.

A person who fights with evil is defeated by it. A mind that fights with evil makes a mantra out of evil, because repetition is mantra, is mind.

All movement in the world is circular. (…) By observing yourself, you will easily see that the mind is moving in a circle. Mind is a mantra, and if you fail to understand this, you will just go on revolving in that circle.

Whoever fights their mind will be defeated. The way to victory is to accept the mind.

Your mind is an undying creeper. It does not die, it can live forever; and it will follow you for countless lives. And the interesting thing is that it has no roots, no seeds. Its existence is rootless. It should die this very moment, but it doesn't. It lives on exploitation. And your mind has enveloped you from all sides. You are completely buried under this undying creeper. All your life energy is sucked up by the mind; nothing remains. You live almost dried up, impoverished. Your mind lets you live only as much as necessary for its own life. The creeper also does not completely kill its host tree, because if it did, then it too would die. It leaves the tree with only enough life juice that it needs to keep it alive. The owner of a slave also does not kill his slave totally; he gives the slave only as much food as is essential to keep him alive.

You will wander as long as you are identified with happiness and unhappiness. Until that point, you will do everything possible to avoid unhappiness and to invite happiness, always desiring more and more journeys into happiness, more and more exploration into happiness. These dreams and desires are what will lead you into new births.

When this life starts looking that absurd to you, when life appears so meaningless to you that it makes no difference whether you are dead or alive, and under no circumstances do you want to make this journey again, when you start seeing this life as a fate worse than death – and so it is – then there will be a revolution in your life. Right now, even if you are interested in religion, it is only part of your search for happiness. This is the reason why you never become truly religious. Your religious search will become authentic only when under no circumstances do you want to go anymore on this journey of birth and death. You have seen it all and found it all to be meaningless. You have experienced happiness and found that in the end, this too becomes unhappiness. You have experienced unhappiness and found it to be full of suffering. Misery is misery, true – but in this world, even happiness is misery. Here, even that which has a sweet taste is poison. Poison is poison, true; but what is labelled as nectar is also just a trick to hide the poison. When you are ready to recognize the meaninglessness of it all, that it is all outside of you, futile, only then will real religiousness be born in your life. (…) Your interest in religion is authentic only when your search is for peace – not for happiness. Happiness has become futile; unhappiness has become futile – and now you want to be free of both.

I have never been spiritual in the sense that you understand the word. I have never gone to the temples or the churches, or read scriptures, or followed certain practices to find truth, or worshipped God or prayed to God. That has not been my way at all. (…) To me, spirituality has a totally different connotation. It needs an honest individuality. It does not allow any kind of dependence. It creates a freedom for itself, whatever the cost. It is never in the crowd, but alone, because the crowd has never found any truth. The truth has been found in people's aloneness. (…) Spiritual, to me, simply means finding oneself. I never allowed anybody to do this work on my behalf, because nobody can do this work on your behalf; you have to do it yourself.

Death can only be encountered in the death of the loved one. When love plus death surrounds you, there is a transformation, an immense mutation, as if a new being is born. You are never the same again. But people do not love, and because they do not love, they can't experience death the way I experienced it. Without love, death does not give you the keys to existence. With love, it hands over to you the keys to all that is.

Enlightenment is only the beginning; there is infinity to go for. Enlightenment is only a door, and then there is an unending existence, an unending evolution, expansion. The people who are unconscious, for them enlightenment is the goal; they are not aware of the fact that enlightenment is only a door. Once you have reached it, then a new kind of pilgrimage starts. Up to this door, you were an entity; beyond this door, (…) you will be just pure consciousness, without a body, without a mind. (…) For the awakened man, the whole existence is one.

Only that which cannot be taken away by death is real. Everything else is unreal; it is made of the same stuff dreams are made of.

Only a rich man can come to me. (…) When I say a rich man, I mean one who is rich in intelligence; I mean one who has everything that the world can give to him and has found that it is futile. Yes, only the rich person can become religious. I am not saying that a poor person cannot become religious, but it is very rare, exceptional. A poor person goes on hoping. A poor person has not known what riches are; he is not yet frustrated. How can he go beyond riches if he is not frustrated with them? (…) When a rich person comes to me, he has money, he has employment, he has a house, he has health – he has everything that one can have. And suddenly he has come to a realization that nothing is fulfilling. Then the search for God starts.

Masters do not tell the truth. Even if they want to, they cannot; it is impossible. Then what is their function? What do they go on doing? They cannot tell the truth, but they can call forth the truth that is fast asleep in you. They can provoke it; they can challenge it. They can shake you up; they can wake you up. They cannot give you God, truth, nirvana, because in the first place you already have it all within you. (…) Truth cannot be given; it is already in you. It can be called forth; it can be provoked. A context can be created; a certain space can be created in which it arises in you and is no longer asleep, becomes awakened.

The Master is a physician – not of your ordinary diseases but of your existential conflicts. (…) The wise man wants you only to have insight into things, so that you have your own light.

The psychology of the Buddhas is neither analysis nor synthesis – it is transcendence; it is going beyond the mind. It is not work within the mind; it is work that takes you outside the mind. That's exactly the meaning of the English word ecstasy – to stand out. When you are capable of standing out of your own mind, when you are capable of creating a distance between your mind and your being, then you have taken the first step of the psychology of the Buddhas. And a miracle happens: when you are standing out of the mind, all the problems of the mind disappear, because mind itself disappears; it loses its grip over you.

When you first enter into the world of no-mind, it looks like madness. (…) All the religions have noted the fact; hence all the religions insist on finding a Master before you start entering into the world of no-mind, because he will be there to help you, to support you. You will be falling apart, but he will be there to encourage you, to give you hope. He will be there to interpret the new to you. That is the meaning of a Master: to interpret that which cannot be interpreted; to indicate that which cannot be said; to show that which is inexpressible. He will be there; he will devise methods and ways for you to continue on the path – otherwise, you might start escaping from it. (…) The Sikhs call their temple the gurudwara, the door of the Master. That is exactly what the Master is – the door. Jesus says again and again, "I am the gate, I am the way, I am the truth. Come follow me, pass through me. And unless you pass through me, you will not be able to reach."

For one year, I was in such a state that it was almost impossible to know what was happening. For one year continuously, it was even difficult to keep myself alive. Just to keep myself alive was a very difficult thing – because all appetite disappeared. Days would pass and I would not feel any hunger; days would pass and I would not feel any thirst. I had to force myself to eat, force myself to drink. The body was so nonexistential that I had to hurt myself to feel that I was still in the body. I had to knock my head against the wall to feel whether my head was still there or not. Only when it hurt would I be a little in the body. (…) And I had to keep myself close to myself. I would not talk to anybody, because everything had become so inconsistent that even to formulate one sentence was difficult. In the middle of the sentence, I would forget what I was saying. In the middle of the road, I would forget where I was going. Then I would have to come back. I would read a book – I would read fifty pages, and then suddenly I would realize, "What am I reading? I don't remember at all." – My situation was such… (…) No, I was not doing it. It was simply lying, sitting, walking – deep down, there was no doer. I had lost all ambition; there was no desire to be anybody, no desire to reach. I was simply thrown into myself. It was an emptiness, and emptiness drives one crazy. But emptiness is the only door to God. That means that only those who are ready to go mad ever attain; nobody else.

Always remember: whatsoever we know and whatsoever we can ever know is bound to remain relative. To remember it will give you compassion. To remember it will make you liberal. To remember it will make you more humane. To remember it will help you to understand other viewpoints. Truth is vast – simple but vast, as vast as the sky. The whole universe contains it, and the universe is unlimited, infinite. How can you conceive of the whole truth? How can you have the absolute truth in your hands? But that is how the ego functions. The ego is very tricky. The moment you start feeling something true, the ego immediately jumps in and says, "Yes, this is the absolute truth." – Then, it has closed your mind; now, no more truth will be available. And the moment you assert, "This is absolute", you have falsified it. A man of truth is always relative.

Surrender is the only technique for the inner being to become active.

Man is in anguish, great anguish. (…) That's why intoxicants have been so important down the ages. There has never been a time when something or other was not used by man to forget the inner wounds, to forget this whole nonsense that we have made out of life. (…) Unless man becomes blissful, these intoxicants cannot be prevented. If man lives in misery, he will need something or other to forget the misery. Otherwise, it will be too much! In fact, my own insight is this: if all the drugs and all the intoxicants could be simply removed from the world, man would immediately go mad. The whole world would be a madhouse.

Zen is a state of no-mind.

When one moves on an inner journey, one leaves the world, renounces all that hinders the path, renounces all that is nonessential, so that the path can be searched, sought. One tries to become unburdened, so the journey can become easier, because the journey, this journey, is towards the height, the greatest height there is – the very pinnacle of human possibilities, the very climax. One leaves the world; one renounces the world. Not only the world – one renounces the mind, because the mind is the cause of the whole world. The world of desires, the world of possessions, is just the outer part. The inner part is the mind: the desiring mind, the lustful mind, the jealous mind, the competitive mind, the mind full of things – that is the seed. One renounces the outer; one renounces the inner; one becomes empty – that's what meditation is all about. One becomes totally empty. (…) One comes back to the world because of compassion. One helps other travelers to arrive. (…) Each and everyone is searching for the same goal. (…) If the marketplace becomes a distraction, then your meditation is not yet complete. If anything can distract you, then your meditation has been a forced thing – you have made yourself still; you have controlled yourself somehow. Your meditation is still not spontaneous; it is not a natural flow. It has not happened to you; you have made it happen. Hence the fear of coming back to the marketplace.

This is the glory of man: he is very small but bigger than the sky, because something in him is unique – the enquiry. (…) From his very conception to the very end, man is an enquiry into the search for truth. And if you are not searching for truth, you are not a man. (…) Unless your enquiry grows to such heights that your whole energy is transformed into enquiry and you become a quest, you are not a man. (…) there is no end to man's enquiry. It is an eternal pilgrimage – beginningless, endless.

The really religious person is one whose inner wells have started flowing, who has become a fountain of joy, of song and dance and celebration.

Children think in pictures, in dreams. Whatsoever they have to think, first they have to visualize it. All primitives do that. That is the language of the unconscious.

In the pasture of this world, I endlessly push aside the tall grasses in search of the bull. (…) The whole life is just a running after this desire or that. Finally, nothing is attained; only frustrated dreams, a heap of frustrated dreams. Look back – what have you attained? You have been running and running – where have you got? These are the tall grasses.

The search for the bull is the search for the energy, the eternal energy, the very dynamic energy of life. (…) The bull is a symbol of energy, vitality, dynamism. The bull means the very life itself. The bull means your inner power, your potentiality. (…) Desires are the tall grasses in which your bull is lost. So many desires, pulling you to this side and to that. So many desires! Constantly a thug-of-war: one desire pulls you to the south, another to the north.

One basic thing has to be understood: external things and experiences are not going to fulfill you, because they are not basic needs. One needs something else. But that something else has to be searched for within yourself; nobody else can give you the direction.

You have your destiny within you. You have the blueprint within you. Before you start running after anything, the most fundamental thing is to close your eyes; get in tune with yourself, with your energy, and listen to it – and whatsoever it says is good for you. Then you will feel fulfillment. By and by, you will come closer and closer to your blooming, your flowering.

The search means decisiveness; the search means taking risks. (…) Nobody can decide anything for you. Yes, others can help; others can show the path. But the decision has to be yours, because through your decision, your soul is going to be born. And the more decisive you become, the more integrated you become; the more you take the responsibility for commitment.

Life is not a matter of anybody's word. (…). You are avoiding; through belief, you are avoiding trust. Belief is the enemy of trust. (…) Don't believe beliefs – avoid them. (…) Seek on your own. You may come to find the same truth. In fact, you will come to find the same truth, because the truth is one. And once you have found it, you can say: "Yes, the Bible is true" – but not before. (…) Unless you have experienced it, unless you become a witness to it personally, all Vedas and all Bibles are useless. They will burden you; they will not make you free.

The search is difficult, because the seeker has to risk his whole life for it. (…) There cannot be any map for the truth. (…) Truth is private and not public. (…) Religion is a footpath, not a superhighway. (…) You reach as you, authentically you, and you cannot follow anybody else's path.

The mind is dropped only when you go on and on when the mind is saying to stop – if you don't listen to the mind and say: "I am going to enquire; I am going to search."

The mind wants to pull you back – to the fold, to the crowd. The mind wants you to belong (…), so that you need not decide every step on your own. Everything is decided already; everything is ready-made. You just have to believe in it.

Following will make you a Christian; understanding will make you a Christ – and the difference is tremendous.

The search is individual, full of danger. One has to go alone. But that is the beauty of it. In deep aloneness, only in deep aloneness, where not even a thought is present, godliness enters you, is revealed to you. In deep aloneness, intelligence becomes a bright flame. In deep aloneness, silence and bliss surround you. In deep aloneness, eyes open; your being opens. The search is individual.

Trust life – there is no need of any other trust. Trust life, and it leads you spontaneously and naturally to the Ultimate, to the truth, to godliness – or whatsoever you want to name it. (…) Life is the only scripture, the only Bible. Trust it and allow it to take you to the ocean, to the Ultimate.

I cannot give you the answer. The answer will come to you, and it is true only when it comes to you. Truth has to be one's own – only then is it truth; only then does it liberate. (…) Truth cannot be borrowed.

Osho, I don't know why I am here. – Nobody knows, and there is no way to know it, and there is no need to know it. (…) This constant questioning – why am I here? why am I doing this? – this constant hankering for the why is a disease of the mind. No answer is going to satisfy you. (…) The why is never-ending. Once you understand it, you drop it.

The method of religion is not speculation; the method of religion is experience.

Life can become very rich if people are left to decide. But society tries to force decisions on you. Society is afraid that if it does not decide for you, you may not be able to decide. But, in fact, because of this, by and by, you lose the capacity to decide things. And once you lose your decisiveness, you lose your soul. The word soul means integrated unity within you. It comes out of great, fatal decisions. The more you decide and the riskier the decision is, the more integrated you become, crystallized. (…) Be decisive on your own, and every decision will give you more and more integration.

In surrender, your personality for the first time becomes clear; because if you surrender, you surrender the ego – not the personality, not the individuality.

If you are indifferent, by and by all your creativity will disappear. Creativity needs passion, aliveness, energy. Creativity needs you to remain a flow – an intense, passionate flow. (…) Indifference is negative: it is suicidal; it is escapist. (…) Indifference is a slow suicide. Be in deep love, so much so that you completely disappear in your love, that you become a pure creative energy. Only then do you participate with God; hand in hand you go with Him. To me, creativity is prayer; creativity is meditation; creativity is life. (…) Very small things, (…) do them with deep care, as if it is the body of your beloved; and suddenly, you will see that you are being born anew through your own creativity. Each creative act becomes a rebirth for the creator; and each indifferent act becomes a suicide, a slow death. (…) Love makes everything sacred; carelessness makes everything ugly. (…) Never use the phrase: "Who cares?" – That attitude comes from the ego. No, if you really want to grow, care more.

Pictures have a tremendous grip on the human mind; hence man lives in fiction. And self-knowledge is not possible in fiction. You have to become more interested in the real than in the reflected. Mirrors have to be broken. You have to come back home; otherwise, you will go further and further away from yourself.

People who are too much concerned about convincing others are empty people, hollow within. They don't have anything authentic. (…) A man who is constantly worried about his impression in others' eyes, how he looks in mirrors, is a fool. (…) No mirror can mirror your center. (…) A man who is in search of his self, who has become interested in self-knowledge, goes on breaking all mirrors.

The ego is the total of all the opinions that you have gathered from others about you, and hence the ego is very contradictory. (…) The ego is always in trouble. It is a false entity: it appears as if it is real, but it is not. (…) The ego is many; it is never one. Because it has been collected from so many different people, it cannot be one. You are one; the ego is many. And if you think that you are the ego, then you are on the path of madness. (…) Your identity is self-contradictory. You cannot call it a self, because a self is possible only when you dropped living in contradictions.

One day or another, you have to recognize the fact that, up to now, you have lived in deep stupidity. And if you go on living this way – through mirrors, reflections, opinions – then, by and by, you lose your individuality; you become part of the masses; you lose your soul. Then, you are not an authentic individual. (…) When I say, you become part of the masses, I mean that you are being continuously molded by others, kneaded by others. You allow it; you cooperate with it. Alone, you lose your identity – your whole identity is through the crowd.

You have been nobody your whole life, but you go on believing in the fictions that you create around you.

Self-knowledge means that you have come to understand one thing: that you know yourself immediately, directly – not through others, not via others.

Once you have understood that you have to seek your identity within yourself, in total aloneness, you are becoming free from the masses, from the crowd. Then, individuality is born: you are becoming an individual, unique.

Man is more interested in pictures than in reality, more interested in mirrors than in reality, more interested in his image than in himself. (…) You have to be here with me in reality, totally here with me. Then, a new understanding arises. And that should become your way of life. Constantly be engaged in reality; don't get too much interested in pictures – otherwise, by and by, you will lose the capacity to be aware of reality. But mind has old, deep habits; and it is going to be a constant struggle in the beginning. (…) Try to be alert rather than more knowledgeable. (…) Only this rose is real; only this rose is true! (…) If you shift your energy from mind towards awareness, you will be immediately aware of the footprints of the bull.

Ordinarily, you follow the crowd. It is convenient; it is comfortable; it is like a sedative. With the crowd, you need not worry; the responsibility is with the crowd. You can leave all the questions to the experts. You can depend on a long tradition, the wisdom of the ages. (…) But once you imitate others, you will never be able to know who you are. Then self-knowledge becomes impossible.

Whenever you are in fear, you lose individuality. Then, there is no time to think and meditate; then, there is no time to decide on your own: time is short, and a decision is needed! – In times of fear, people imitate others. But ordinarily, also, you live in lattah – you live in a constant frightened state.

If one person goes against the crowd – a Jesus, or a Buddha – the crowd doesn't feel good with this man; the crowd will destroy him. (…) If this man is true, then the whole crowd is wrong, and this is too much. The whole crowd cannot tolerate such a person; it is a thorn, painful. (…) The search is such that you will be living in danger. (…) Society and the crowd are not going to feel good about you. Society will create all sorts of troubles for you, so that you will come back and become normal again.

Man is an escapist animal. (…) He goes on doing the same with psychological things. If there is fear, then rather than encountering it, he goes on accumulating wealth, so that he can forget that he is poor inside. Seeing that he does not know himself, rather than encountering his ignorance, he goes on collecting knowledge, and like a parrot, goes on repeating borrowed things. These are all escapes. If you really want to encounter yourself, you will have to learn how not to escape. (…) Man is more interested in fiction, and he is always ready to escape. (…) Man seems to be more interested in illusions than in reality. If you try to awaken somebody from his illusions, he gets angry; he will never forgive you. He will take revenge – you have disturbed him. These fictions of the mind and a constant readiness to escape are the two problems which have to be faced.

It is difficult to get out of the mind. So much is invested in it: your whole efficiency, your whole caliber, your whole career – everything depends on the mind. In meditation, you have to come out of it. Hence, many times you decide to come out, but deep down you go on clinging. (…) The mind is the inner mass. The mass has created a mechanism inside you; from there, you are controlled. The society believes in certain things; the society has inculcated those beliefs in you. Deep down, when you were almost unaware, it hypnotized you into a certain role. If you do something against it, immediately conscience will say no. That conscience is not really a conscience; that's a substitute, a social trick, politics. The society has created certain rules inside your mind, and if you go against them, immediately the voice from society comes from inside: 'Don't do it; it is wrong; it is a sin'. The society, from inside, will force you to feel guilty. If you want to leave this so-called conscience, and achieve a real and authentic conscience, then great effort is needed. The whole effort is going to be this: to shift consciousness from your mind to no-mind, from conscience to consciousness. Conscience is given by society; consciousness arises in you. (…) Consciousness makes you integrated; consciousness is integrity. (…) A man of integrity is a whole; not many – one. A man of integrity is pure, uncorrupted by the past, virgin. And out of that virginity arises the fragrance which we call religion.

If you are in search of the bull, you will have to take the risk of getting out of the mass. And you can get out of the mass only if you can get out of the mind, because the mass has created your mind.

Morality is not religion. Morality is a social trick. Religion is an individual discovery – you have to discover religion. Morality can be given; religion never.

Arjuna said, "I can't see anything – just the target." And Dronacharya said, "Only you can become a great archer." – Concentration is a narrowing of consciousness. A concentrated mind becomes very insensitive to everything else.

Struggle is going to be there, because the mind is not going to lose its power easily. The mind has been a dictator for so long; now you want the dictator to come down from the throne – it is impossible. The mind has become accustomed to bossing you and bullying you. It will give you a tough fight. It will go on following you, and it will go on finding weak moments when it can again overpower you.

The family always resists. (…) The society feels shaken; the family feels shaken. No family accepts such a situation; ordinarily, normally, it fights. (…) The same happens with the inner search: your mind is your inner family. Whenever you want to do something new, whenever you want to go into the unknown, the mind resists; the mind says: "No, this is not good." – The mind will find a thousand and one rationalizations, and it is going to give you a hard struggle. That is natural, so don't worry about it – it has to be so. But if you persist, you will become the master. Just persevere; persistence is needed. (…) The struggle is going to be difficult. One should be aware of it from the very beginning, so that you don't get disheartened on your journey. It is going to be difficult. The mind has a very negative attitude about your inner search; it is against it. And it is much easier to be against something than to be for it. It is much easier to say 'no' than to say 'yes' – the mind is a no-sayer. (…) The mind is going to follow you to the very end. Only at the very end, just on the steps of the temple of God, does the mind leave you – never before. It goes on following you.

The struggle is going to be a little hard, because the mind will not be so easily convinced, because it is going to be the death of the mind. So that too is natural, that the mind will resist. The death of the mind is your life; and the life of the mind is your death. If you choose mind, you commit suicide as far as your inner being is concerned. If you choose your self, you will have to drop the mind. And that is what meditation is all about.

In India, when somebody is reading in an ordinary book, it is called reading; but whenever somebody is reading the Gita, we call it path: the reading has become part of your being; you have the essence in you; the very essential has moved into your being. (…) In path, you have to read the same book every day to bring your consciousness again and again to the same tuning, as if Krishna is alive before you, or as if Jesus is alive before you. You are no longer reading a book – you have transformed yourself into a different space, in a different time, in a different world. (…) Soon words are left behind; all the nonessential is gone; only the essential remains – and that essential is inexpressible. It cannot be said – one has to experience it. (…) So if you read, it depends on you whether reading is going to help you to become free, or whether reading is going to make you a greater slave. Whether it is going to become a freedom or an imprisonment, it depends on you. (…) Yes, reading can be helpful; but ordinarily, it proves to be harmful, because the way you behave with books is harmful to you. You simply collect; you go on collecting dead facts. You become a junkyard – maybe an encyclopedia, but you lose your inner coherence, the inner music, the inner harmony. You become a crowd: so many voices; no unity. This is not getting integrated; this is disintegration.

If you have come to me and you feel at home, then your journey is finished. Now there is no need to drift anymore; now you can settle and start working – because in drifting, work is impossible. (…) One has to be available to many sources. (…) It shows you have been searching – but it also shows that nowhere could you feel at home. So the journey continues. The journey has to continue until you come to a point where you can say: "Yes, I have arrived." – Now, there is no need for any more departures. And you can relax. Then, the real work starts. (…) Initiation means a commitment: that one has looked all around – now this is the place to settle. (…) Until now, you have been just a visitor. You have not become intimate with any system of growth. (…) It is as if the plant has been removed from one place to another again and again. The plant cannot grow; the plant needs that it should settle on one ground, so that roots can go deep. If you go on removing the plant again and again, the roots will never grow; and if roots cannot go deeper, the plant cannot go higher. Hence commitment. Commitment means: now this is the soil for me, and I am ready to settle for it. It is risky because, who knows, a better soil may be available somewhere else. So the risk is there, but one has to take that risk some day or other. If you go on and on just waiting for something better, something better, the time may be lost; and by the time you have arrived, you will be dead. (…) The real thing is work. It's good to go around, but don't make it a habit. That habit is dangerous; it won't allow you to grow roots.

I don't belong to any path, hence all paths belong to me. I am concerned with the individual seeker. If I see that devotion, worship, prayer, will be helpful to you, I teach you that. If I see that meditation will be helpful to you, I teach that. If I see that just understanding, pure awareness, will be helpful, I teach that. If I feel that awareness is going to make you very tense, does not fit with your type, then I teach you to be lost completely in something, absorbed completely in something. Dancing, get into it so much that you become the dance and there is nobody watching it; don't create any separation and division between you; become the act. (…) Millions of paths go towards God. In fact, there is nowhere else to go. Wherever you are going, you are going towards God. All paths lead to Him. But when you are seeking, only one path can lead you. If you start walking on all paths together, you will be lost.

Before one can come to the right door, one has to knock on many doors. Life is an adventure – of courage, daring, and basically it is trial and error. One has to go astray many times to come to the right path.

The relationship between a Master and a disciple is the deepest; deeper than the relationship between a lover and the beloved.

To me, all ideas are rubbish; only awareness is valuable. And awareness has no ideas in it. It is a simple, pure light of consciousness.

In understanding, you disappear, just like the dew on the grass disappears, evaporates, when the sun rises.

Darkness is an absence of light; ego is an absence of awareness. If you bring awareness to your being, suddenly ego is no more.

Truth liberates, and nothing else. Everything else creates bondage, a burden.

Belief is not truth; it is a theory about truth. (…) Underneath your beliefs, whatsoever the belief, doubt continues. Doubt is at the center, and belief is on the periphery. So your life is basically determined by your doubt, not by your belief.

A real seeker is not searching for any belief to console himself. Rather, he is trying to find a deeper center in himself which goes beyond doubt. This has to be understood. You have to go deep in your own being to such a point of aliveness where doubt is left behind on the periphery. (…) Don't be worried about the doubt; bypass it! (…) Face the doubt – and go beyond it. Go deeper than the doubt. Go deeper into your being: (…) at the deepest core, at the very center, only life is. Once you have touched that deep core within yourself, the doubt is just a faraway peripheral thing. It can be dropped very easily.

There is no need to cling to any belief in order to drop it. You simply see the stupidity of it. You see the ridiculousness of it. You simply see how the doubt has been destructive to your whole life, how the doubt is continuously eroding your being, how it has been poisonous. (…) A real man of trust has no belief – he simply trusts, because he has come to know how beautiful life is. And he has come to know how eternal, timeless, life is. He has come to know that just within himself is the kingdom of God. He becomes a king.

Religion is not a search for any belief. Religion is an effort to know the very ground of your being, to touch the very rock bottom of your existence. That experience of the rock bottom of your existence is what we mean when we use the word truth. It is existential; it is an experience.

Beliefs are devices to avoid the search, because the search is arduous; the search is difficult. Many dreams will be shattered, many images will be shattered, and you will have to pass through much pain. That pain is a necessity: it cleanses; it gives you solidity, integrity; it matures you. Those pains are like birth pains, because through them, you are going to be reborn.

All beliefs – unconditionally, all beliefs – are barriers. (…) The believer's mind is the wrong mind.

The whip and rope are necessary… else he [the bull] might stray off down some dusty road. Being well trained, he becomes naturally gentle. Then, unfettered, he obeys his master. – The whip is a symbol for awareness; and the rope is a symbol for inner discipline. Awareness and discipline are the most fundamental things for a seeker. (…) Eventually, awareness is enough; but not in the beginning – because the mind has deep patterns, and the energy tends to move from the old habits and old patterns. New channels have to be created. (…) Discipline is simply an effort to create new pathways for the energy to travel, so it need not travel the old pathway. (…) You will have to create a discipline (…), so that when the energy arises, it goes into love, not into sex.

Training is needed, but training is not the goal. Training is just a means. Finally, one has to come out of training; one has to forget all discipline. If you have to continue in your discipline, then this simply shows that the discipline is not yet natural. In the beginning, you remain alert; you create new pathways for your mind energy. By and by, there is no need – by and by, even to remain alert is not needed. One is simply alert; not that one tries to be alert. Only then is the flowering – when alertness is natural, when meditation is not to be done, but simply goes on happening. It has become your very climate; you live in it. You are it.

If you are not the master, then energy moves away from you – toward things, persons, power, prestige, fame. Energy goes on moving away from you, toward the periphery. Once you are the master, energy starts moving homeward. (…) If you are the master, the mind follows you like a shadow. If you are not the master, you have to follow the mind like a shadow. And mind means outgoing energy, and meditation means incoming energy – the same energy. Just the direction is different.

If your search is not leading you toward more and more blissful states, where you can sing and dance, then something is wrong – then something is absolutely wrong. Then you are on some wrong path. Your blissfulness – your singing and dancing – is the indication. It need not be extrovert, but there will be a dance inside you. The more you come nearer to home, the more you feel happy. Happiness is a quality of energy returning towards home.

You create your world; you are your world. (…) Whatever world you have, you have earned it; you deserve it. The world is nothing but your own magnified mind.

Out of an awakened heart, it is impossible for anything wrong to arise. (…) You cannot do a right thing if you are not right in the first place. And if you are right in the first place, you cannot do anything wrong – whatsoever the appearances. (…) In the West, for the modern mind, doing has become more and more important. And when doing becomes more and more important, you lose all contact with your being; you lose all contact with the source of life. Then you go on doing a thousand and one things – except the most essential. The most essential is to know oneself, and you cannot know yourself unless you shift your consciousness from doing to being. (…) Good actions, bad actions – both are dreams. And the whole effort in the East has been this: to know the dreamer.

"When you long for God as much as you wanted air while you were underwater, you will find Him." (…) – The desire should become so intense that you put all that you have at stake. The passion to seek should be so total that not a single doubt is allowed to make you waver. The very intensity will bring truth. (…) The decision should be total. It is arduous, of course, but everybody has to pass through that arduousness once. One has to pay for truth, and there is no other way to pay for it: you have to put your whole being on the altar. That is the only sacrifice that is needed.

If you are really interested in seeking the bull, then don't go on working for it half-heartedly. Either seek, or don't seek – because a lukewarm search is not going to help; it is a sheer wastage of energy. If you want to seek, then put yourself totally into it. If you don't want to seek, forget all about it. Move into the world totally. Some other day will be the right moment for the search to begin. If you are not ready to put yourself completely in the search, to get involved with your whole heart, that simply shows that you are not yet finished with the world. The world still attracts you; desires still go on haunting you. (…) You still have not come to that moment of awareness where one realizes that the real treasure is within and not without. Then go into the outside world. Don't be half-half; that is the most dangerous situation. If you are half-religious and half-worldly, you will miss both. You will not be able to cope with the world; your religion will become an interference. And you will not be able to cope with the inner search; your worldly desires will continuously distract you. There is no need! If the world still attracts you, if you still feel that there is something which has to be attained, then go and get frustrated completely. You will get frustrated. That means you need a little more wandering, going astray. Nothing is wrong in it – go fast! Go totally, so you are finished sooner. Then you are ripe; then your whole energy turns inward. Frustrated by the without, energy moves inwards spontaneously.

All attainment needs intensity, total intensity. If the intensity is total, the struggle is over. (…) And when the struggle is over, then one understands that everything was right. Gain and loss, both are assimilated: going astray was also part of growth; and going into the world was also part of the search for God. It was needed! So when I say, go into the world, I don't say it in any condemnatory sense. I simply say that it is needed. Be finished with it! You are yet not ripe; and if you try half-heartedly to come to your inner source, it is going to be a suppression. And suppression divides, makes you ill. (…) So go into the world; be finished with the world. Don't be afraid of the world, because if you are afraid, you will try to escape half-ripe; and to be half-ripe is the worst shape to be in. Let the heat of the world make you perfectly ripe: you are so much frustrated, disillusioned, that now you are available to go on some other trip, into some other space.

The bull exists as separate from you only if you are not a master. This has to be understood. If you are not a master, you remain divided, schizophrenic, fragmented. Once the mastery arises in you, once awareness and discipline are there, divisions dissolve – you become one. And in that oneness, the bull is transcended. Then you don't see yourself as separate from your mind; then you don't see yourself as separate from the body; then you don't see yourself as separate from the Whole. You become one. (…) When you have come to a point where you can feel yourself one with the river of life, then there is no need for awareness or discipline; then there is no need to meditate; then there is no need to do anything. Then life does it for you. Then one can relax, because one can trust totally. Then there is no need even for awareness. (…) In the beginning, awareness is needed; discipline is needed. But as you grow spiritually, the ladder is transcended; you can throw it away. (…) A saint is really a saint only when he has abandoned the whip and the rope. That is the criterion. If he is still trying to pray, to meditate, to do this and that, and to discipline himself, then he is still not yet enlightened. Then he is still there and some doing continues. He has not reached home. The journey is yet to be completed.

First, the bull is transcended – the mind, the mind-energy, life, the life-energy, is transcended. And then, when you have transcended life, you transcend yourself. (…) The moment mind disappears, you also disappear – because you exist in the struggle. The ego is possible only in conflict, struggle. The ego exists in tension. For the ego, duality is needed. It cannot exist with a non-dual reality. Just watch: whenever you are fighting, your ego becomes very sharp. If you are not fighting with anything, it is not there. It depends on the fight. Hence people go on finding ways and means and excuses to fight, because without the fight, they simply start disappearing. (…) If fight is there, you can be. If there is no fight, you disappear. Hence the greatest message that I can give to you is: you have to come to a point where all fight is dropped. Only then will you transcend yourself and become one with the Whole.

Meditation has to be transcended. Awareness has to be transcended. Discipline has to be transcended. A moment comes when one has to live spontaneously.

Bring your Himalayas back into the world. (…) The real criterion is in the world. If you have really attained to nirvana, you will come back to the world, because now there is no fear. Now you can be anywhere. Now even hell is heaven, and darkness is light, and death is life. Now nothing can distract you. Your attainment is total, perfect, ultimate. Be a lotus flower!

To be empty is to become a workshop for God – because God can only function when you are not. (…) The moment you stop functioning, godliness starts functioning.

Meditation means awareness. Whatsoever you do with awareness is meditation. The action is not the question, but the quality that you bring to your action.

If you become religious in my sense of the term, you will not renounce life. You will renounce yourself, not life. You will drop yourself and be totally one with life. (…) There will be no need to make conscious effort to practice it; you will find it. It has moved into your bloodstream; it has become part of you. You cannot do other than practice it. (…) If something goes true to your being, if something is felt by your totality as truth, it is already on the way to being practiced. (…) Understanding brings its own practice. Understanding is enough.

A religious person – this is my definition of a religious person – is one who is always overflowing, whatsoever the situation. Even if death comes to him, death will find him in a deep orgasm.

All effort is born out of ego; and through effort, ego is strengthened. Ego is the disease. So all effort has to be left completely; nothing is to be done – one has to lose oneself completely in the existential. One has to become again like a small child, just born, not knowing what is right, not knowing what is wrong, not knowing any distinctions. Once distinctions enter, once you know what is right and what is wrong, you are already ill, and you are far from reality. (…) making an effort means you are fighting with yourself. A part of you is for, and a part of you is against – hence the effort.

Nothing fails like the ego in the Ultimate; nothing succeeds like the ego in this world. In the world of matter, nothing succeeds like the ego; in the world of consciousness, nothing fails like the ego. The case is just the opposite – and it has to be so, because the dimension is just the opposite.

If there is no effort, nothing is incomplete – then there is no need to dream. A dream is always to complete something; something which has remained incomplete in the day will be completed in a dream, because mind has a tendency to complete everything. (…) When there is desire, there is bound to be dreaming, because desiring is dreaming – dreaming is just a shadow of desiring.

You cannot do anything without concern. Whatsoever you do, the ego comes in, concern comes in – and then, there is anxiety. Look at this phenomenon: a surgeon operates, and he is a perfect surgeon. But if his wife is on the operating table, he cannot operate; his hand trembles. At other times, he works like a perfect mechanism, but when his wife is on the table, he cannot operate – some other surgeon is needed. What has happened? Concern has entered. (…) Now, these problems are there; now, his mind has a concern; now his hand trembles. Your whole life is a trembling, because you have been carrying so many concerns – and now, you cannot draw a perfect circle.

A great man is one who brings his greatness to every small thing that he is doing: he eats in a great way; he walks in a great way; he sleeps in a great way. He brings the quality of greatness to everything.

Belief is nonsense. Only foolish people believe. A man of understanding has faith, not belief. Faith is different. Faith means trusting life, trusting it so absolutely that one is ready to go with it, anywhere.

Life can become a celebration if you know how to live without concern. Otherwise, life becomes a long prolonged disease, an illness which culminates only in death.

You need to learn everything, because you have forgotten your nature completely.

The difficult attracts. And the more difficult it is, the more it attracts you. It becomes more valuable, because through it, if you conquer it, you will achieve a greater ego. Even if you fail, you will achieve a greater ego, because you at least tried, while others have not tried at all. If you achieve with the easy, nothing is achieved, because the ego cannot feel greater. (…) Ego is always attracted magnetically to the difficult, but easy is right. So ego is never attracted towards the right; it is always attracted towards the wrong.

This is the criterion: doing anything, if you feel easy doing it, it is right. If you feel uneasy doing it, something is wrong. If you are tense, it means you are living an uneasy life. If you cannot sleep, cannot relax, cannot let go, it shows you are living an uneasy life – you are after difficult things, impossible things.

Chu'i the draftsman could draw more perfect circles freehand than with a compass.
His fingers brought forth spontaneous forms from nowhere.
His mind was meanwhile free and without concern with what he was doing.
No application was needed, his mind was perfectly simple and knew no obstacle.
So, when the shoe fits, the foot is forgotten; when the belt fits, the belly is forgotten; and when the heart is right, 'for' and 'against' are forgotten.

No drives, no compulsions, no needs, no attractions: then your affairs are under control.
You are a free man.
Easy is right.
Begin right and you are easy.
Continue easy and you are right.
The right way to go easy is to forget the right way and forget that the going is easy.
(Chuang Tzu)

There is no human nature as such – there are just human natures. Each individual is a universe unto himself; you cannot make any general rules. All general rules go false. This has to be remembered very deeply, because on this path, there is every possibility that you may start following rules, and once you become the victim of rules, you will never come to know who you are. You can know yourself only in total freedom – and rules are prisons. They are prisons because no one else can make rules for you: he may have discovered the truth through these rules, but they were for him. Nature differs – they helped him, but they will not help you; on the contrary, they will hinder you. So let understanding be the only rule. Learn; grow in understanding – but don't follow rules. Rules are dead; understanding is alive. Rules will become an imprisonment; understanding will give you the infinite sky.

No man of understanding can follow rules strictly; only people who are dead can follow rules strictly – because no rule is for you; you are your own rule.

Life is not understood through time; it is understood through meditation. It is a going inwards. Time is an outer movement; time is on the periphery.

Wisdom is something that happens when you bring awareness to any experience. The meeting of awareness and experience is wisdom. Experience plus awareness is wisdom. With experience plus more experience plus more experience, quantity is gained, but there is no quality which would make you free and knowing.

Remember: the whole of morality is nothing but traffic rules. You live in a society – you are not alone there; there are many others. Certain rules have to be followed, but they are not ultimate; they have nothing of ultimacy in them. (…) When you live with others, life has to follow certain rules. Those rules are neither religious, nor moral, nor divine; they are just manmade. One has to be aware of this; one has to know their relativity – they are formal.

Once you start looking at reality through the mind, then everything becomes a problem; then the ego starts interpreting, and then you have only interpretations. (…) And you get more and more fixed in your interpretations, because you have invested so much in them. (…) Through knowledge, you strengthen your ego.

A mystic never chooses. He looks at the Whole without any choice on his part; he does not become a chooser. If you choose, then there is a problem immediately, because life is contradictory.

A religious person is in search of truth; a philosopher is in search of interpretations. (…) A religious person has an intuitive grasp – it is not intellect; it is his whole being. He feels rather than knows. And feeling hits the center. So remember one thing: through philosophy, you will never know the truth; you will just go about and about and about.

Mind is always conditioned; it cannot be unconditioned. Being is unconditioned; mind is a conditioning. Mind is always trained by the society in which you live, trained by the experiences through which you pass. So a frog has a frog mind – he lives in a well; that is his whole universe. (…) All interpretations come from conditioning – and only one who is unconditioned can know the real, can know the true.

It happens in old age: then one feels very irritated, cheated – as if existence has been cheating you. Nobody has cheated you; you simply magnified yourself foolishly. Your own ego created the whole problem; now you feel cheated. You cannot find a man who is old and yet happy. If you can find one, live with him – he is a wise man. You can find happy young men; that is nothing. If you can find a happy old man, that is something. When the summer has come and the autumn flood is no more and an old man is happy, then he has known something else; he has found some eternal source. (…) Only an old man can be a teacher – one who has lived through all seasons of life, who is seasoned and still happy and blissful.

One who is born old will be a child when he dies. If you are a child when born, you will be old when you die. (…) If you can die here as a child – fresh, unburdened, innocent – you will be born old. Because you will be so experienced, you will be so wise, you will be old. That is what it means: to be wise from the very first moment. If you die fresh and young, you will be born wise, because wisdom happens in an empty and innocent mind. And if you are born wise, old, you will not move in the ordinary foolishness that everybody is prone to, and you will remain fresh, wise. Then, there is no death. So, a wise man is only born once; all other lives are just preparations. Only once can he come back before his final merging into the universe; before his mahanirvana, he can come once. If you die almost as a child, you will be born once more, but you will be born as an old man. You will be wise from the first day; and then, there will be no more birth – then, you attain to the birthless and deathless.

When you come to the superior, when you come to a man of Tao, only then do you realize what it means to be wise, what it means to be intelligent, what it means to be mature, what it means to be expanding, what it means to be really conscious, total, integrated. When you come to an enlightened person, only then do you feel what it means to be here at all. Before, you moved in a dream, in shadows – you never came into the sunlight; you were never under the sky. You lived in dark caves, caves of the ego.

You live in fire; Buddha lives in a cool, very cool world. And there is no bridge between fire and ice. Unless you become cooler and cooler and cooler, you will not be able to understand. Buddha becomes communicable only when you become more silent and cool; otherwise, everything is missed.

To create the ego, you have to fight. To create the ego, you have to condemn something as bad, and applaud something as good. To create the ego, first you have to create a god and a devil; and then you have to fight with the devil and try to reach the god. A conflict is needed for the ego. If there is no fight within you, if you accept yourself totally – you are happy as you are, deeply content, deeply satisfied, not even a single note of complaint, thankful – then how can the ego exist? How can you say "I am"? The more you fight, the more 'I' is created.

There is tremendous energy, but it is dissipated in fighting: you divide yourself and you fight from both sides, and the energy is dissipated. The same energy can become ecstatic if allowed to move in an inner harmony, not fighting. Acceptance, accepting whatsoever is, is the basis of Tao.

Eternal does not mean permanent. Eternal means non-temporal; eternal means there is no time.

Action… You have moved too much; you have lost the balance. – Now, be inactive, so the balance is regained. Be active, but don't forget that inactivity is needed as much as action. (…) A rhythm is needed. A rhythm of the opposites is the most secret key of life. Always remember the opposite.

Truth has been expressed in many ways; and it has always been found that it remains unexpressed whatsoever you do. However you express it, it eludes – it is elusive. It simply escapes discrimination.

Truth is vast; expression limited.

All the mystics all over the world have always felt impotent as far as communication is concerned. Communion is possible, but not communication. This has to be understood from the very beginning.

When you become the deepest valley of receptivity, then the highest peaks of consciousness can be given to you.

Unless you know the nature of the mind, you will not be able to solve any problems of life. You may try hard, but if you try to solve single, individual problems, you are bound to be a failure. That is absolutely certain, because in fact, no individual problem exists – mind is the problem. If you solve this problem or that, it won't help, because the root remains untouched. It is just like cutting branches of a tree, pruning the leaves, and not uprooting the tree. New leaves will come, new branches will sprout – even more than before: pruning helps a tree to become thicker. Unless you know how to uproot it, your fight is baseless; it is foolish. You will destroy yourself, not the tree. In fighting, you will waste your energy, time, life; and the tree will go on becoming stronger and stronger, far thicker and more dense. And you will be surprised at what is happening: you are doing so much hard work, trying to solve this problem and that, and they go on growing, increasing. Even if one problem is solved, suddenly ten problems take its place. Don't try to solve individual, single problems; there are none. Mind itself is the problem. (…) Mind is never peaceful; no-mind is peace. Mind itself can never be peaceful, silent. The very nature of the mind is to be tense, to be in confusion. Mind can never be clear; it cannot have clarity – because mind is by nature confusion, cloudiness. Clarity is only possible without mind; peace is possible without mind; silence is only possible without mind – so never try to attain a silent mind. If you do, from the very beginning, you are moving in an impossible dimension.

Thoughts together, millions of thoughts, give you the illusion that mind exists. (…) Mind doesn't exist as an entity (…). Only thoughts exist. (…) Watch deeply – then you will become the host; and thoughts will be the guests. (…) Receive them; take care of them – but don't get identified with them; otherwise, they will become the master. (…) Remain rooted in the host; the visitors will come and go. Of course, there are bad visitors and good visitors, but you need not be worried about them. A good host treats all the guests in the same way, without making any distinctions. (…) Any thought creates misery when it becomes the host, because it is not the truth. The thought is a pretender; and you get identified with it. Identification is the disease.

If you get identified, you become the mind. If you get identified, you become the body. If you get identified, you become the name and the form – what Hindus call nama, rupa, name and form – then the host is lost. Then you forget the eternal, and the momentary becomes significant. The momentary is the world; the eternal is the Divine.

Your thoughts are things, so be careful about them. Handle them carefully! If you are not very conscious, you can create misery for yourself and for others. (…) Each single thought is creating something for you and for others. Be alert! (…) If you become really integrated in your awareness, thoughts don't enter you; you have become an impenetrable citadel, nothing can penetrate you. (…) This is what we mean by enlightenment.

Only at this moment is Buddhahood attained: when there is nothing good, nothing bad, no sin, no virtue, no darkness, no night – nothing, no distinctions. Distinctions are there because of your trained eyes. Distinction is a learned thing. Distinction is not there in existence; distinction is projected by you. Distinction is given by you to the world; it is not there. It is your eyes' trick, your eyes playing a trick on you. The clouds that wander through the sky have no roots, no home; neither do the distinctive thoughts floating through the mind. Once the self-mind is seen, discrimination stops. In space, shapes and colors form, but neither by black nor white is space tinged. From the self-mind all things emerge. The mind by virtues and by vices is not stained.

Never fight things which are not. The mind is tempted to fight, but that temptation is dangerous: you will waste your energy and life, and dissipate yourself.

Forgetfulness is the real darkness. And in forgetfulness, everything happens. You are just like a drunkard: you have completely forgotten yourself – who you are; where you are going; for what you are going. All direction is lost; the very sense of direction is not there. You are like a drunkard. That's why all basic religious teachings insist on self-remembering: if forgetfulness is the disease; then self-remembering is going to be the antidote.

All experiences are dreamlike; one has to go beyond them.

Religion is poetic; one has to talk metaphorically.

Ninety percent of your energy is wasted in activity. And because of this, when the moment for action comes, you don't have any energy. A relaxed person is simply non-obsessive; then, the energy starts accumulating within him. He conserves his energy; it is conserved automatically – and then, when the moment for action comes, his total being flows into it. That's why action is total. Activity is always half-hearted.

Activity is your escape from yourself. In action, you are; in activity, you have escaped from yourself – it is a drug. In activity, you forget yourself, and when you forget yourself, there are no worries, no anguish, no anxiety. That's why you need to be constantly active, doing something or other, but never in a state when non-doing flowers in you and blooms. Action is good; activity is ill. Find the distinction within yourself: what is activity and what is action; that is the first step. The second step is to be more involved in action, so that the energy moves into action; and whenever there is activity, to be more watchful about it, more alert. If you are aware, activity ceases; energy is preserved – and the same energy goes into action. (…) Now you can understand what relaxation means. It means that there is no urge for activity in you. (…) This is relaxation, unmotivated energy.

This is the vision of tantra. Tantra says: say 'yes'; say 'yes' to everything. You need not fight; you need not even swim – you simply float with the current. The river is going by itself; on its own accord, everything reaches to the ultimate ocean. You simply don't create any disturbance; you don't push the river; you simply go with it. That going with it, floating with it, relaxing with it, is tantra. (…) Tantra acceptance (…) comes out of an over-fulfillment; it comes out of a deep contentment – not out of hopelessness, frustration, helplessness. It comes when you don't say 'no'; it suddenly surfaces in you. Your whole being becomes a deep contentment. (…) Tantra acceptance is total; it doesn't split you.

Through experience, one transcends.

To me, a religious man is loose and natural. He is not worried about this world or the other world. He is not worried about it at all; he simply lives and enjoys. This moment is the only moment for him; the next moment will take care of itself.

If you want to learn anything, learn trust. Nothing else is needed. (…) Trust gives meaning, because trust makes you capable of allowing the Whole to descend upon you.

A philosopher thinking about truth is like a blind man thinking about light.

Nobody is made for anybody; everybody is made for himself.

No society wants you to become wise: it is against the investment of all societies. If people are wise, they cannot be exploited. If they are intelligent, they cannot be subjugated; they cannot be forced into a mechanical life, to live like robots. They will assert themselves; they will assert their individuality. They will have the fragrance of rebellion around them; they will want to live in freedom. Freedom comes with wisdom intrinsically. They are inseparable, and no society wants people to be free. The communist society, the fascist society, the capitalist society, the Hindu, the Mohammedan, the Christian – no society likes people to use their own intelligence, because the moment they start using their intelligence, they become dangerous – dangerous to the establishment, dangerous to the people who are in power, dangerous to the 'haves', dangerous to all kinds of oppression, exploitation, suppression, dangerous to the churches, dangerous to the states, dangerous to the nations. In fact, a wise man is a fire, alive, aflame. He would like rather to die than to be enslaved. Death will not matter much to him, but he cannot sell his life to all kinds of stupidities, to all kinds of stupid people. He cannot serve them. Hence, the societies down the ages have been supplying you with false knowing. That's the very function of your schools, colleges, universities. They don't serve you, remember – they serve the past; they serve the vested interests. Of course, they go on puffing your ego up bigger and bigger; they go on giving you more and more degrees. Your name becomes longer and longer, but only the name – you go on becoming shorter and shorter. A point comes where there are only certificates, and the man has disappeared. First, the man carries the certificates; then, the certificates carry the man. The man is long dead.

Knowledge has its own way of accumulating; it goes on reproducing itself. (…) If you know one thing, it will drive you into another thing, because with each question answered, ten new questions arise. Again the same will happen: ten questions answered, and you have a hundred questions ready for you. It goes on spreading. It becomes bigger and bigger, and you are lost in it. (…) This is why you are ignorant: you have not yet come out of the illusion of knowledge, the illusion of the mind. (…) mind is only your idea – it is not a reality; it is fictitious; it is just a fantasy. It is made of the same stuff that dreams are made of. You can simply step out of it.

One has to cleanse oneself every moment, because dust tends to gather on the mirror every moment. It is a natural process. While you are sitting here, the mirror in your bathroom is gathering dust. Even in the night, when nothing is happening, even the doors of the bathroom and the windows are closed, still some dust is gathering, settling on the mirror, because dust particles are there in the air itself. Every day in the morning, you have to clean the mirror. (…) Each moment, a sannayasin has to die to the past and be born anew. Then he remains transparent; then his mirror remains clear. Then there is nothing to obstruct his perspective. Then he is neither a Christian, nor a Hindu, nor a Mohammedan, nor a Buddhist. Then he is simply a mirror, just a mirror, a mirroring – mirroring all that is, within and without. And out of that mirroring, wisdom is born.

The function of the Master is to undo what society has done to you. It is an anti-university, an anti-school, an anti-college, because the Master is not here to impart knowledge to you, but to impart something totally different, something of a different dimension.

I have no philosophy of life; I have life itself. There are people who have philosophies of life, but they don't have any life.

As a consequence of being silent and enjoying existence, love arises in you. Life becomes abundant. Then, there is laughter for no reason, because this whole existence, it's so hilarious. This is not philosophy, just the consequence of being silent.

There is no tomorrow. If there is tomorrow, you cannot stop worrying about it. Tomorrow never comes. Neither is there any yesterday. All that is in our hands is the present moment, now, here. All worrying disappears; all imagining, dreaming, projecting, disappears. And it is not that you have to enjoy this moment. That rejoicing arises out of this moment. – But you are never here. You are always somewhere else. You are never in the now. Everything is available, but you are absent. Be present to this moment, and then see what happens.

There is no goal. Life is its own goal. There is nothing outside life that you have to achieve. All achievement is the projection of the ego. The very idea of achievement is ambition. What you achieve does not matter – money, power, knowledge, prestige – these are not in any way going to give you life. In fact, in achieving any kind of ambition, you are losing your life. You are sacrificing your life. You are involved in doing stupid things; and by the side, life goes on slipping out of your hands. You will realize it only at the time of death, with a shock: "I have been trying to achieve the goal of life, and I forgot life itself." – The goal is always in the future, and life is always here. The goal is always far away, and life is in this very moment. Trying to achieve it, you will miss it. You don't need to try to achieve life; you are life. Only dead people can have goals; living people live. (…) There is no goal anywhere. Existence is not moving to some target.

The best way to miss life is to have a certain attitude towards it. The attitudes originate in the mind, and life is beyond mind. The attitudes are our fabrications, our prejudices, our inventions. Life is not our fabrication. On the contrary, we are just ripples on the lake of life. What an attitude a ripple in the ocean can have towards the ocean? What an attitude a grass leaf can have towards the earth, the moon, the sun, the stars? All attitudes are egoistic; all attitudes are stupid. Life is not a philosophy; it is not a problem – it is a mystery. You have to live it not according to a certain pattern, not according to a conditioning, not what you have been told about it – you have to start afresh, from the very scratch. Each human individual should think as if he is the first on the earth. Then you can open to infinite possibilities. Then you will be available, and the more available you are, the more there is the possibility of life happening to you. Your attitudes function as barriers; then life never reaches to you as it is – it has to fit to your philosophy, religion, ideology; and in that very fitting, something dies in it. What you get out is a corpse; it may look like life, but it is not. (…) The attitude does not allow you to come in contact with life as it is – it distorts; it interprets. (…) When you have a certain attitude towards life, you will miss life itself. Yes, your attitude may cover a certain aspect, but it will only be an aspect. And the tendency of the mind is to proclaim its aspect as the whole, and the moment an aspect is claimed as the whole, you have missed the very connection with life. Then you will live surrounded by your attitude, in a kind of cocoon, encapsulated, and you will be miserable. Life becomes a misery, but that is your doing; otherwise life is eternal joy.

It is better not to label life; it is better not to give it a structure; it is better to leave it open-ended; it is better not to categorize it. You will have a more cosmic experience of things. Because things are not really divided: the existence is one orgasmic Whole; it is one organic unity. The smallest blade of grass, the smallest leaf is as significant as the biggest star. The smallest thing is also the biggest, because it is all oneness; it is one spectrum. The moment we start dividing, we start creating arbitrary lines, definitions; and that's the way how one goes on missing life and the mystery of it.

Everybody is living in a small prison of his own attitudes. My effort here is to bring you out of your imprisonment.

Our nature is of the sky. Being means the inner sky. Body means the earth; the body is made of earth. You are made of sky. These two have met within you.

Naturally, the weight of your habits is heavy, very old. Darkness is ancient – it doesn't exist; still it is ancient. Whenever rays of sunlight burst in, they are fresh – absolutely new, freshly bathed. You see them for a moment; and again, you are lost in darkness. Your darkness has a very long history. When you weigh these two, doubt arises about sunlight, but not about darkness. Darkness should be doubted. But instead, sunlight is doubted, because its rays are new, and darkness is very old. Darkness is like a tradition coming down from century to century. The rays of light have just arrived – fresh, new. So new, how can they be trusted?

"I felt I was not of this earth." – There is no one who is of this earth. We cannot be of this earth. To think otherwise is our belief, our projection. It seems so, but it is not the truth. (…) "And I felt I was a small particle of light in the infinite sky." – This is the beginning, "a small particle of light in the infinite sky". You will soon feel, "I am the sky". This is the start. Right now, we are not ready to be completely absorbed in the infinite sky. And if we feel the flight coming, the storm coming, that winds are carrying us away, still we keep separate and save ourselves. (…) "a particle of light." – You are no longer darkness, you have become a particle of light. But the difference from the sky is still there – the division remains; a gap remains. The ultimate will happen the day you become the sky. The particle of light is also separate. The day you become integrated, one, on that day you will feel "I am the vast empty sky".

Meditation does not come from outside. What is left inside when you are not tense is called meditation. That which remains when there is no desire within you is called meditation.

People say, aham brahmasmi – I am God, I am Brahman. But when Brahman is, how can 'I' remain? Only Brahman remains, not I. But there is no other way to express it. Language is for people who are asleep. Language belongs to those who have settled in a strange country, but consider it their homeland. Silence is for those who know. Language is for the ignorant. So as soon as you say anything, just saying it, truth becomes untruth. "I am Braham, I am the sky." Say it, it becomes a lie. Only sky is. But to say, "Only sky is" is not the whole truth, because "only" indicates that there must be something more; otherwise why the emphasis on "only"? "Sky is"? There is difficulty even in saying this because "is" can become "is not". This is why wisdom is silent. It is impossible to bring the ultimate wisdom into words. But we are fortunate that rare individuals have made untiring, impossible efforts. As much as it is possible, they have made the effort to bring the fragrance of truth into words.

Mind is the desire for repetition. (…) When you begin to flow with life: whatever happens, okay; whatever doesn't happen, okay. Suffering comes, it is accepted; suffering comes, there is no resistance. Happiness comes, it is accepted; happiness comes, there is no excitement. When there is calmness, in both happiness and suffering, and equanimity starts arising, then happiness and suffering begin to appear very similar – because no choice is left. Now it is out of our hands. What happens, happens.

If witnessing is attained, everything is attained. Inside, it awakens the witness; outside, it brings equanimity. Equanimity is the shadow of witnessing.

When you are in the present, you will find there is no demanding. And then, happiness takes place. When there is no wish for it, it will happen abundantly.

Unless yoga is transcended, unless a person is completely free of the idea "I am the doer", nothing has happened. You have only changed color. You are a chameleon; you simply changed color. But only the color changed – not you.

The impossible is attractive. The more impossible it is, the more the ego is strengthened by doing it. (…) Ego is worshipped when you do something impossible. (…) Ego enjoys difficulties. Man makes many things harder so his ego can be fulfilled. We make many things difficult; the more difficult we make it, the more juicy it becomes. Arduousness is not in realizing God; arduousness is juice for the ego. (…) What you say is right: "It has always been the observation of seekers that the realization of God is a very arduous phenomenon." These seekers are all egoistic. And when have seekers realized God? It has happened when seeking dropped away. You realize God only when seeking drops away, when you are not going anywhere – just sitting, at rest, in ultimate rest. It happens when the pilgrimage disappears into the void. People usually think that if they realize God, the pilgrimage will end. But it is exactly the opposite. If you drop the journey, God will be realized immediately. People think, "When we reach the destination, we will relax." The situation is otherwise: if you relax, you reach the destination. Relaxation is the key to meditation and samadhi. Effort is the key to the ego.

I am not giving you any new illusion. I simply suggest: you have seen enough illusion; now wake up a little. (…) I simply ask you to be a witness. Whatever is, I ask you to watch it. If I asked you to do something, illusion would arise. If I asked you to give up this and do that, illusion would arise. I simply suggest that whatever you are doing, whoever you are, whatever you are, wherever you are – wake up; watch with alertness. How can there be illusion in being aware? For an awakened person, there is no possibility of being in illusion.

Ordinarily, we perceive our lives through the eyes of others. We use the eyes of others like a mirror. We forget the observer and become the observed. And it is natural. A child is born; he does not know anything of himself. Only by looking into the eyes of others will he know who he is. You cannot see your own face; you will have to look in a mirror. When you look at yourself in the mirror, you become the observed – you are no longer the observer. How much do you know of yourself? As much as the mirror reveals. (…) That is why our knowledge of ourselves seems to be so confused – because it is made of so many voices, of many conflicting voices. (…) Conflicting voices are taken in; duality is created. Conflicting voices are taken in; conflicting voices are collected. A great uneasiness arises; a deep split is created. This is why you are not certain about who you are. You have collected such a crowd of opinions. You have looked in so many mirrors, and each one has given you a different message. Mirrors have no messages about you; their message is about themselves. (…) The reflection in the mirror is not about you. The reflection is the mirror's nature. (…) Conflicting opinions go on accumulating. You begin to believe that you are this accumulation of conflicting opinions. That is why you are always shaking, always afraid. How deep, this fear of public opinion! (…) We become worried because we have shaped our being according to others. (…) If you want to know yourself, you will have to stop looking for your image in the eyes of others. (…) As I see it, many seekers, explorers of truth, left society not because it is impossible to know truth while remaining in society, but because it is very difficult to know one's own face correctly while living in society. Here, people go on giving feedback as to who you are. Whether you ask or not, images of who you are go on pouring in from all sides. And by and by, we begin to live by these images. (…) People live for the crowd; people die for the crowd. What others say has become so important that you do not even ask who you are. You collect cuttings of what others say and make your self-image. This image is bound to be very unsteady, because people's minds go on changing. (…) And on the basis of these opposing opinions, you fashion your being. You are riding on a bullock cart that has bullocks pulling it in all directions, and the cart tries to move in every direction at once. Your very bones get tired. You are only dragged. You reach nowhere; you cannot move.

When the eyes are on the object, you are a spectator; when the eyes are on the seer, you are an observer. It is a revolutionary distinction, very fundamental. When your eyes are on the object and you forget yourself, then you are a spectator. When all objects of vision have departed, when you, and only you, are there – only awakening remains, only alertness remains – then you are an observer. (…) To be a spectator is a kind of self-forgetting. And to be an observer means, now all objects of observation have disappeared. The screen is empty; now no film moves on it. No thoughts remain; no words remain – the screen becomes absolutely empty, blank and shining, white. Nothing left to see, only the seer remains. And now you take a plunge into the seer. You become the observer.

When a person becomes free from being a performer or a spectator, has no desire to exhibit and be seen, and has no desire to see, when he knows that the trap of seeing and showing is false – then, no longer interested, he attains non-attachment, freedom from desire. Now, there is no desire for anyone to say, "you are beautiful", "you are good", "you are virtuous". Even if you inwardly wish people to think you are virtuous, then you know that you are still caught in the same old web. The world is still with you. It has assumed another shape, taken a new mode, but the same old trap continues. The same old pattern continues.

One is not bound. Bondage is impossible, because only God is; only one is. There is nothing that binds, nor anything to be bound. (…) Bondage is dreamlike.

Human life can be divided into four circles. The first circle is of action, the world of doing. It is the outermost. Moving within a little, we come to the world of thought. Moving a little further in, we come to the world of feeling, devotion, love. Moving still further within, we reach the center – the world of the witness. The witness is our nature, because there is no way to go beyond it. (…) You cannot go deeper than that. It is our foundation. Our house is built on the foundation of witnessing – built of feeling, of thought, of action. This is why there are three yogas: karma yoga, gyan yoga, bhakti yoga – the yogas of action, knowledge and devotion. These are the three methods of meditation. Through these three, one can make efforts to reach the witness. (…) Meditation is the path; witnessing is the destination. Witnessing is the culmination of meditation. And meditation is the beginning of witnessing. (…) Meditation is a change of direction. Whatever meditation is joined to becomes a vehicle for moving towards witnessing.

Mind and ego are not dissolved by witnessing; in witnessing, you find out that they never existed. (…) Your own imagination has projected mirages.

Surrender is possible to the extent that the ego drops. Don't wait for completeness; do as much as you can. Do that much, and the next step becomes available. It is like a man travelling on a dark night. He has a small candle in his hand that shines light only four paces ahead. If the man says, "How can one travel ten miles with this? Four paces of light and ten miles of darkness – I will get lost." Then we tell him, "Don't worry, take four paces, and when you have taken four paces, the light goes ahead four more paces. You don't need ten miles of light for walking. Four paces is enough."

Devotion is the closest to God; action is very far away – the journey is very long from there. Thought too is far away; it too is a long journey. Devotion is very near.

Culture is not created from religion. Culture is made from cultural conditioning. (…) Never mistakenly assume that tradition can be religion. And a religious person can never become traditional. (…) A religious person is a great revolution. He is a continual declaration of the eternal, of the timeless. (…) A religious person is the truly orderly person, because he has made a connection with the Infinite. He is joined to the deepest roots of life. He is related to the Ultimate. He has become disconnected with the false – he is connected to the raw truth. (…) Religion is known when all conditionings have been renounced. Sannyas means renouncing conditioning. (…) Religion is one. Religion is that which connects us all. (…) Religion connects everything.

Conditioning is your bondage. (…) Bondage is only a belief; bondage is not real.

A religious person has nothing to do with order, nothing to do with revolution. A religious person is concerned with self-discipline. A religious person wants to wake up. With the help of outer things, you have sought long; order could not be created. Now wake up! Seek on your own. Be a light unto yourself. You have travelled long with the help of outer lamps, and gone astray – only astray, falling into ditches and ruins, being injured. Light your own lamp, and move on your own. No one outside can give you order. Create your own order. Let your life be filled with discipline from within.

A new consciousness has manifested that stands back and watches. And this distance between the body and consciousness is as the distance between earth and sky. There is no greater distance than this. In your inner world, the most distant things in existence are meeting. You are the horizon where earth and sky meet.

Samadhi cannot be practiced; samadhi cannot be prepared for – because samadhi is your nature. Mental projections are lower states. Trying to stop them is like entering a dark house and trying to fight with darkness. (…) Light a lamp, and darkness disappears by itself. (…) Know your being, and projections of the mind will become quiet. Without knowing your being, projections cannot be stilled. Mental projections arise because the being is not known. If you think you are the body, desires of the body arise. If you think you are the mind, desires of the mind arise. The desires of whatever you identify with will shadow you, will reflect in you.

There is nothing new to be said; whatever can be said has already been said. Whatever facets life can have, have all been explored somewhere. Man has been seeking from time immemorial. There is nothing new to be said under the sun – only the language changes; the packaging changes; the clothes change.

Practice is not needed. (…) Practice has to be done for what is not our nature. (…) Drop all practices; look into yourself, and your nature will become manifest. “You are alone, void of action, self-illuminated and innocent.”

Inside one in whom mind has ceased to exist, there is no sadness, no happiness. These are waves of the mind.

Breathing is birth. Breathing means the process of life. When a man dies, breathing is finished; the process of life stops. This goes on moment to moment: as the breath comes in, life comes in; as the breath goes out, life goes out – birth and death are happening every second. Every incoming breath is life; every outgoing breath is death. So life and death are happening every moment. These are waves of life energy.

Ashtavakra says there are six life waves. These six waves are hunger and thirst, sadness and happiness, birth and death. (…) Ashtavakra says these are the six waves, and you are beyond these six waves; you are the observer of these.

You are alone. No one is your companion. The body is not your companion; the breath is not your companion; thoughts are not your companions. You are alone. There is no companion within – what to say of the outside! Husband, wife, family, friends, beloveds: none are companions. There is none who is near, who is related. To be near is only an outer phenomena. From within, no union can be made with anyone.

You are alone, void of action. Don't even raise the question of your karmas, your acts. (…) You have never done them. (…) You have never done anything. You are ever aloof, in non-doing. Doing has never happened through you; you are the observer of all actions. Liberation is possible right now.

Consider it: if we have to destroy the whole web of actions, we can never become liberated. It is impossible. We have done so many acts over infinite time – just estimate how many. If we have to be released from all these actions, then the release will take an infinite time. And during this infinite time, you won't be sitting idle; you will do things – so acts will again accumulate. This chain will be endless. This chain will never finish; it will never come to a conclusion.

Freedom is on the first step; there is no planning it. Planning means to be bound in plans. Make preparations, and you are enslaved in preparations. Then this will have to be renounced. How long is it going on? It will be endless.

There is no hell anywhere; there is no heaven. You have never done anything – you have only seen dreams; you only thought you were doing. You were sleeping within – the body was doing. You were sleeping inside – the mind acted. (…) You don't have to come back – just know that you have never gone anywhere.

Ashtavakra says to declare your freedom here and now. Don't prepare for it. Don't say that first you must get ready, and then… because the preparations will enslave you. (…) Drop this carrying of dead bodies. Make your declaration. If you want freedom, then in a second, in a fraction of a second, it can be declared.

Your declaration is your life. Find the courage to declare. Why make small declarations? (…) Why be involved with trivial things? (…) When the evolution of your life is dependent on your claim, then claim the most expansive – claim the Infinite, the omnipresent; make the divine proclamation. Why be satisfied with anything less? Why be miserly?

Say 'yes' to the small, and you will become small. Say 'yes' to the Infinite, and you will become infinite. Your belief is your life. (…) You have become what you believe.

Know that which has form as false; and know the formless as unchangeable and everlasting. Learning this truth, it is not possible to be born in the world again. Then you are what the Buddha has called anagamin, a person who never returns after death. We come back because of our desire; we come back because of desires and hopes. One who dies knowing, "I am the knower", doesn't enter again. He is released from this useless wheel, from coming and going.

We are just waves of the Divine. When the wave is gone, nothing is left behind. Not even ash is left; not a trace remains. It is like writing on water: it disappears as you write. In the same way, all that happens in our life are only waves.

Reflective mirrors are surrounding you: outside, inside, mirrors are reflecting in mirrors; and there is nothing at all.

You are in the body, but you are not the body. The body is yours; you are not the body's. The body is your means; you are the end. Use the body; don't lose your mastership. Though living in the body, remain beyond the body – like a lotus in the water.

Meditation cannot go deep as long as you continue desiring. As long as you expect to attain something – bliss, God, atma – meditation will not go deep, because thinking of attaining is greed. It is ambition; it is politics. It is not yet religion. (…) You are hurrying to believe. Your belief is impotent. Without doubting, you have quickly accepted it.

Buddha attained when he dropped all doing. But first, he did everything. Six years of untiring effort, he gave everything to it. By giving everything, he experienced that nothing can be attained by doing. (…) He made an untiring effort for six years, and in the midst of this effort, he found out it is not attained by effort. He didn't leave a single stone unturned, proving to himself that it couldn't be attained by inner effort. There was no desire left inside. He did everything, and he saw that he didn't attain. His effort became so crystallized that in this crystallization, doing dropped. Then it happened. I say unto you, the state of non-doing will come when you have done everything. (…) Before stopping, one needs to run totally. Though one does not attain by running, this knowing will be crystallized by it. (…) Ashtavakra is right in saying that practice is bondage. But only one who practices will find out.

I have practiced and found it is a dead end. (…) I have practiced sadhana and found that no sadhana leads one to the sadhya, to the goal. I meditated and found that no mediation brings one to samadhi. When this becomes your deep experience, and one day that moment comes when it boils at one hundred degrees, when you have given everything… Holding back nothing… You have thrown yourself totally into the fire; the effort has become total; the inner fire is total; the sadhana is total – now existence cannot tell you that you have held anything back: all is given… That day, in that crystallization, in that state of ignited consciousness, suddenly everything is burnt to ash.

Always remember the difference between information and knowing. Information means borrowed. Someone else has known, and listening to him, you have become informed. This is information. Knowing is an experience. No one else can know for you; it cannot be borrowed. (…) Knowledge about wisdom can be collected, but not the liberation of wisdom. A whole system of words can be created, but not the beauty of truth.

Doubt and trust cannot move together. It would be like one foot going east, the other foot going west – you won't get anywhere. (…) If trust exists, it is complete; otherwise it exists not.

This is the way I take the scriptures: the scriptures are witnesses. The path of truth is unknown. You need witnesses on that unknown path. When you first come face to face with truth, truth will be so vast that you will tremble; you will be unable to grasp it. You will shake to your very roots. There will be fear that you could go mad. (…) At that time, the Vedanta, Buddha, the Upanishads, the Bible, the Koran, will stand as your witnesses. In that situation, you will be unable to comprehend the new experiences that are happening to you. In aloneness, it is very difficult. (…) I am giving you a touchstone. Test your experiences on these touchstones.

The shock of truth should not break you apart, should not drive you insane. Remember, many seekers of truth have gone mad. Many seekers of truth have gone mad just as they neared the stage of becoming enlightened. They became deranged, because the happening is so vast; it is inconceivable, unbelievable. It is as if the whole sky has crashed on you. Your pot is small, and the Infinite is raining in your pot. You will be shattered; you won't be able to contain it. You are face to face with the sun, and your eyes will be dazzled, and then go dark. The sun is before you, and all is darkness – your eyes will shut. (…) At that time, the voice of Ashtavakra that has been lying in your unconscious will immediately speak. The sutras of the Upanishads will start resounding; the Gita will echo; the Koran will echo – its verses will come forth. Their fragrance will assure you that you have come home – there is nothing to freak out about; this vastness is you.

You want to become free of desire, but still you spread out a net of desire. You want to be completely clean and pure – but still you do it by means of greed; still desire goes on quivering. (…) You have gone to attain God, but your way of attaining is the same as for attaining money. You go to seek God, but your desire, your passion is the same as the one who is after material things. Your madness is the same as the madness of one who wants to attain the world. The object of desire has changed, but the desire has not changed. (…) Your desire goes on quivering. Until you have chased after your desires, until you have seen the worthlessness of chasing after them, run and fallen down and scraped yourself, you won't be able to understand. Only through the experience of desire does desire become worthless.

Faith must come from your own experience. Faith must come from the pure formlessness of your own meditation.

The same question is inside everyone of us. And this question is: all this is happening, all this is going on, but still nothing seems real. All this running about, this hubbub – but nothing makes any sense. So much is attained and lost; still nothing is attained, nothing is lost – the vast journey, birth after birth, where no destination is visible. We are – why? What is this being of ours? Where are we going, and what is going on? What is our purpose? What is the meaning of this music? This existential question is inside everyone: What is the meaning of existence? And in words, there is no answer. A question that cannot be asked in words, cannot have an answer. That which is inside us – call it the witness, observer, river of life, consciousness, whatever name you like. It is nameless, so give it any name you want: God, liberation, nirvana, being, non-being, whatever you like… fullness, emptiness, whatever; it is nameless within… – submerge yourself in this. By your just dropping into it, questions start gradually to disappear.

Mind gets caught up outside. (…) Mind goes on suggesting, a little longer: Just forget yourself in dreams! Go on running after mirages a little more! Such beautiful dreams! And there is still plenty of time before death comes... (…) We go on postponing. Night is drawing near. There isn't plenty of time; night has already fallen. Many times we have wasted this birth, this life. We are waiting for death – and death comes before meditation has come. One more life spoiled; one more chance wasted. Don't let it happen this time. (…) The veil has to be opened within you.

Don't ask questions without. No answer is going to come from there. Enter within, from where the question arises. Don't bother if the question is unclear. Enter this unclear half-light of questioning. Gradually, enter inside this faint dusky light.

When you find out that two plus two equal four, then no matter how old your conditioning is that two plus two equal five, it will have to drop. Once you know where the door is, it is impossible to try getting out through the wall. (…) When the truth is understood, sooner or later, enough courage will come so that one takes the jump and transforms himself. (…) There is no gap between understanding and courage: (…) one understands, and courage is right here; one understands this very moment, and this very moment there is courage. Then a spontaneous happening occurs. Then the sun suddenly rises.

The revolution of consciousness easily happens in the life of a man who has experienced the world, because that life experience tells him, "What I have known as life is meaningless". Half the work is done by life: through experiencing life, he knows that it is meaningless. Questions begin arising in his mind: Where is more life? Is there another life? Where is true life? But only someone who has not enjoyed the world, has only wanted to enjoy, hasn't got anything, but has only wanted to get – for him, there will be tremendous difficulties. So don't be surprised if all of India's great Masters, all the great seers – whether Jaina or Buddhist or Hindu – if they were all princes, don't be surprised. It is not accidental. It is an indication that one becomes free of the world through enjoying it. An emperor can see that there is nothing in wealth, because he has a mass of wealth, but inside, nothingness, emptiness. He has a harem of beautiful women and nothing inside himself. He has beautiful places, yet inside all is desolation, a desert. When one has all, it starts to be clear that there is nothing in any of it. When one has nothing, he lives in hopes. (…) Hence, when a society becomes prosperous, it becomes religious.

I am not saying that a poor man cannot become liberated – a poor man can achieve liberation; a poor man can become religious. But a poor society cannot become religious. An individual can be an exception, but he will need great intensity.

The poor man's religion cannot be real religion. When a poor man goes to the temple, he asks for money, he asks for power, he asks for employment. If he is sick, he prays to become well. If his son does not have a job, he prays that he can find work. (…) The poor man goes on begging in the temple for what he doesn't get in his life. What we lack in our lives is what we ask for.

The desire for what we don't have is all around us. This desire goes on catching us. (…) What we don't get – someone didn't meet a lover, someone didn't find wealth, someone didn't become famous… so we want to live one more life. We have lived infinite lives, but every time something or other remains, some trivia or other remains incomplete, something or other – and for this, another life, and yet another life.

Desires have no end. Needs are very few; desires have no limit. Man goes on living with the support of these hopes and desires. Remember, money does not enslave you; the desire for money enslaves you. Position does not bind you; the desire for position binds you. Fame does not bind you; the desire for fame binds you.

Janak had everything. He had seen everything. It was as if he was just waiting for someone to give a hint, and he would awaken. All hopes and dreams had become worthless. His sleep was about to be broken.

I am innocence; nothing sticks to me. I am peace. I am awareness. I am beyond nature. I have been fooled by illusion all this time.

Have you ever known peace? You will usually say yes. But if you look deeply, you will find that what you call peace is only a short gap between two periods of turmoil. The English expression cold war is very good. Between two wars, a cold war goes on: (…) the conflict is not manifest now – it is internal; it is underground, kept beneath the surface. (…) What you call peace is cold turmoil; and whenever it warms up, it will be hot turmoil. (…) Between two periods of turmoil, a little time passes which you call peace. But it is not peace; it is only cold turmoil. (…) For the one who knows peace, this turmoil is finished.

Either this whole universe is mine, or nothing at all. These are the two only possibilities. Any position in between these is illusory.

If you want to live skillfully, take your life as acting. This too is a drama. Sooner or later, the curtain will fall. Sooner or later, everyone will depart. The stage may be vast, but it's still a stage, no matter how vast. Don't make your home here. Stay here just as a caravanserai. You are going to depart. There is no need to sink roots here; one who does will suffer. The person who does not sink roots in this world is a sannyasin. One who doesn't get rooted here, whose feet don't become planted, is a sannyasin, one who is always ready to move on. (…) At most, pitch a tent; don't make a house here.

The meaning of gestalt is: by looking in one way, it has one appearance; by looking in another way, it has another appearance. It is the same thing, but the way you look changes the whole meaning. The world is the same. When the ignorant looks at it, he sees an infinite variety of things. And when a wise man looks at it, the infinite variety disappears – the myriad forms disappear. A single vast expanse is seen.

The world is finished for the one who knows himself. The world cannot be finished for the one who does not know himself. You will not be able to know yourself by dropping the world. But by knowing yourself, the world drops.

From ignorance of the atma, the world appears; from knowing atma, it does not appear. If you look at the being, the world is not visible. Look at the world, and being is not visible. Of the two, only one is seen; both cannot be seen simultaneously. If you see the world, then you don't see your being. When you start seeing your being, the world is not visible. There is no way whatsoever that both can be seen simultaneously.

This world is the absence of knowing your being. When the dawn of knowing your being comes, the world disappears. Everything stays just as it is, and still nothing remains as it is. Everything stays just as it is, and yet everything is transformed.

We see what we want to see. (…) What we want to know, we come to know. What we want to recognize, we come to recognize. Our intention becomes the reality of our life.

If you want to awaken from this world, don't wrestle with it. If you want to awaken from this world, just make efforts within to wake up.

When that ultimate energy descends, what happens is almost like a fight. And when the ultimate experience happens and you are defeated by the Divine and the body is vanquished and you accept defeat – then your final initiation happens. In that moment, divine blessings shower over you. Then you are new. That is when you taste the nectar of the eternal for the first time. (…) It is difficult to say how long the night may be. It is hard to say how long the struggle will last. No prediction can be made. But this struggle is auspicious.

Sannyas means to be obliterated, so existence can be. There is no companion, no guide for this journey. This is a journey of great aloneness. (…) Kabir says, "The path of love is very narrow, there two can never pass." (…) There, only the Divine remains.

If you get involved in methods, you will be in great difficulty. Every method proves false, and finally life itself proves too short. If you get stuck in methods, you will find that not just this life, but many lives are not enough. (…) You put faith in doing, because doing inflates the ego.

Ashtavakra is saying, don't do anything. The Whole is the only doer. What is happening is happening; just become one with it. Don't even ask: "How to get free of this?" – If this 'I' is happening, let it happen; who are you to get free of it? You can also accept it: good, if this is happening, then this is what is happening. You didn't create it. (…) You didn't cast its mold. (…) Nothing is in your hands. Whatever exists is good. (…) And in this total acceptance, you will suddenly find the 'I' is gone. (…) One thing becomes clear: that if you want to be free of ego, then don't make efforts, don't try. Accept whatever is, just like it is. In this acceptance, you will find the ego has disappeared as if it had never existed, because the element that was giving it energy has slipped out, the foundation has fallen down, so the house cannot stand long. And if the feeling of being the doer falls away, then all of life's diseases fall away. Otherwise, there are many traps in life.

Whatever is, observe it. Be a witness. Just watch. If there is ego, then watch ego. What else to do? Only watch – and by watching, the transformation happens. (…) Master just one thing – the witness. There is nothing else to be done. Everything else happens by itself. Everything else goes on and on, always. Why should you uselessly get in the way?

So illusion goes on and on. But look closely; open your eyes a little and see: you are not doing anything. Everything is happening by itself. If you understand, you will remain a witness, and there is nothing else to do.

Both are easy: it is perfectly easy to go unconscious in sex, to completely forget what is going on; to get intoxicated is easy. To control sex, to force it to stop, to prevent yourself, is also easy. But in both, you miss. The one who indulges misses; the celibate misses too. The real brahmacharya happens when you stand in the middle between these two; then you are only watching. Then you will find that sex arises in the body and reverberates in the body; in the mind a shadow briefly falls and departs. You remain standing far away. How can sexual desire be in you? You are nothing but an observer.

First meditation will make you natural; and then it will bring you to godliness. Because it is impossible to bring what is not yet natural to its deeper nature.

In meditation, meditation itself is dropping away. In sannyas, bondages are dropping by themselves. Sannyas is no bondage. It is only a device for dropping all bondage. In the end, it too will drop.

You have seen how an earthen lamp, when it is going out, flares up one last time. As the last oil burns out, it drinks the last drop of oil and flares up. It is its last burst of flame. (…) It is the same when you go deep in meditation: you will find when the fire is about to go out, then the last burst of flame, sex energy, arises. (…) The lamp of desires is melting; life is going out. Slowly, slowly, the fire is burning itself out. Longings are cooling down; the floods are ebbing to a stop – the flow of life is stopping. Passion is ebbing to a stop; the reign of silence is deepening. The juiciness of meditation is increasing; the juiciness of silence is deepening. The fire is burning itself out. (…) In this state, a burst of flame will flare up at any moment. Observe it. Do not suppress it; otherwise, it will move into you again. You are very close to getting free of it – don't suppress it; otherwise, the bondage will start again. What has been suppressed will flare up again and again. Whatever you have forced down will come again and again. – Let it go; let it come out; let it flow out. However high it flares up, you go on watching peacefully. It will not interfere with your meditation. You continue witnessing.

All questions arise from discomfort, from suffering, from misery.

Renunciation is just a shadow of indulgence. The renunciate is a worldly person standing on his head. When the world goes, renunciation also goes. These two live together and leave together. (…) Worldly persons and sadhus, two sides of the same coin. (…) The real wise man can be neither a renunciate nor indulgent. He knows that 'I am the witness'.

I tell you to meditate. Because the alternatives before you are meditation and thinking; right now, witnessing is not an alternative for you. Yes, if you continue to meditate, your thoughts will be finished; a new choice will present itself. Now you can choose: witnessing or meditation? Then you can choose witnessing, and meditation can be dropped. But if you decide not to take sannyas, you will remain indulgent. The choice is between sannyas and the world now. I say, take sannyas now. And one day, the moment will come when the choice is no longer between the world and sannyas. The world is gone; sannyas remains. Then, the choice is between ultimate sannyas and sannyas. Then I will tell you, forget about sannyas; now merge yourself into ultimate sannyas.

This is a filling such that one becomes more and more empty. This is a filling of emptiness. This is a filling up with emptiness. My effort is to make you blank. If you have become blank, then I have succeeded. If you remain full, then I have failed. When you become absolutely blank and nothing more remains inside of you – no trace, no word, no rubbish – in this emptiness, the Divine manifests. (…) There is only one way of being: disappearing. The moment you become totally empty, immediately the Divine descends in its totality.

Religion is experience, not thinking. Thought cannot be even the shadow of religion. And one who is entangled in thoughts will always remain far away from religion. No one is further away from religion than a thinker.

Revelation is the nature of truth. As soon as truth happens within you, your declaration starts unknowingly being disclosed. (…) This declaration is happening by itself.

The meaning of satsang is simply sitting near one who has known, and the taste becomes infectious. Getting absorbed in the waves of someone who has known, the forgotten waves sleeping within you are activated; they begin vibrating. (…) The meaning of satsang is not so much listening to the Master's words, as it is drinking the presence of the Master, as it is letting the Master come deep inside; it is vibrating in one rhythm with the Master.

I am my own destination. (…) What have I gotten from existence? I myself am the culmination of existence. When we search outside, life seems meaningless. When we search within, life becomes full of meaning: we ourselves are the meaning of life.

In the East, the goal of our greatest seeking has been to find that which is beyond time, not bound by time. What is created and falls, deteriorates in the flow of time, is a reflection. Only what stands beyond time as a witness is true.

The body is the observed; it can only be seen. You and the body cannot meet. You exist in the body; the body exists in you – but without touching, as if at an infinite distance! Their natures are so different that you cannot mix them.

The observer is not your individual form; the observer is your universal form. As an enjoyer, we are all separate; as the doer, we are all separate – but as the observer, we are all one. My observer and your observer are not separate; my observer and your observer are one. (…) When you become an observer, you become the center of the universe. (…) You lose this small 'I', this small droplet – and gain the infinite ocean.

Your devotee and your bhagwan are inside of you. (…) The revolution will happen when inside you, your devotee and your bhagwan meet and become one. Neither bhagwan nor devotee will remain. (…) Duality will disappear; non-duality will remain. The first glimpses of these non-dual moments are what we call meditation. When these non-dual moments start becoming stable, it is what we call samadhi with distinctions. And when this non-dual moment becomes permanent, becomes so stable that there is no way it can be dismissed – this is what we call samadhi without distinctions.

Discipleship is your freedom. It is not anyone's charity. Discipleship is your privilege, your dignity.

The real religion is always a laughing religion. The real religion is always healthy, fulfilled, affirming life. The real religion is like flowers; there is no sadness there.

As I see it, the attraction for alcohol will continue in man until the attraction for samadhi grows. People will go on drinking fake wine until real wine is available to them.

Inner nature is that which becomes manifest when all beliefs have been dropped. When all thoughts and all beliefs have disappeared from your mind, you experience your inner nature.

I have no philosophy of life; I have life itself.

Fools laugh at others; wisdom laughs at itself.

You will have to create the path by walking yourself; the path is not ready-made, lying there and waiting for you.

To be in time is to be asleep; to be awake is to be in eternity.

Unless you are totally destroyed as a mind, there is no hope for you.

Concentration is objective; meditation has no object to it. And in this choiceless awareness, mind disappears. Mind can exist only with choice.

That's the meaning of sannyas: a simple gesture on your part that you are available. Just a simple gesture that you are no more resisting, no more wasting your time in fighting. That is the meaning of sannyas – that you are getting ready for satsang, that now the Master can shower on you, and you will be ready to receive. It simply shows your receptivity.

Aloneness means the feeling that you are complete. Nobody is needed; you are enough. And this happens in love. Lovers become alone; through love, you touch your inner completeness. Love makes you complete. Lovers share each other, but that is not their need; that is their overflowing energy. (…) Freedom is the criterion: love gives you freedom, makes you free, liberates you. It is moksha, absolute freedom. When love deteriorates, it becomes possessiveness, jealousy, struggle for power, politics, domination, manipulation.

Tantra is purest love. Tantra is a methodology of purifying love of all its poisons. If you are in love, the love I am talking about, your very love will help the other to be integrated. Your very love will become a cementing force for the other. In your love, the other will come together, because your love will give freedom; and under the shade of your love, under the protection of your love, the other will start growing. (…) Tantra is the highest form of love. Tantra is the science, the yoga of love. (…) There are only two types of people in the world, basically: those who find their meditation through love; and those who find their love through meditation. For those who will find their meditation through love, their science is tantra. For those who find love through their meditation, for them it is yoga. Tantra and yoga, these are the only two ways.

The inner voice is not a voice; it is an energy phenomenon.

You can go on thinking about life and death, and you can go on creating many theories and hypotheses, but the whole philosophy is just rubbish. Life remains unanswered, and death remains unanswered. (…) Much excited argument, much philosophizing, but nothing coming out of it, nothing to the point. (…) Life is existential. Only an existential answer can satisfy you – not an answer fabricated, manufactured by the mind, or borrowed from scriptures.

Meaning is not the real search. The real search is to come upon life itself – raw, naked. (…) Meaning is of the mind, a projection of the mind, an interpretation of the mind. If you understand, all meaning disappears; only life is. Just life is – without any meaning, without any purpose. And that is the greatest mystery to realize. (…) All questions are foolish in a way, and all answers also. All questions are foolish in a way, because they are mind-created, and mind is the barrier between you and the real. And mind goes on creating questions; it delays the search.

Be interested in the real – and the real is within you. It has nothing to do with anybody else. No mirror is needed for self-knowledge, because self-knowledge is not a reflection. Self-knowledge is a direct, immediate encounter; you come face to face with your own being.

Love prepares you for a great thirst, a thirst for the Divine. But it is temporary, momentary, comes and goes – more like the stuff of dreams than of reality. (…) Only when love does not quench your thirst does God become a need. But both the needs are on the same path.

There is no need to distinguish between thoughts, dreams and reality. If you try, you will feel more confused. There is no way to distinguish, because as far as mind is concerned, everything appears in the mind as thought. You cannot distinguish, and there is no need. And don't go on that journey, because that journey becomes a journey of thinking, and meditation is lost. Rather, on the contrary, remain centered in witnessing. Don't be worried by the objects in the mind; whatsoever they are, they are mind stuff. Just watch it – watch it appearing; watch it being there; watch it disappearing. Sooner or later, when you are really centered, the whole mind disappears. Suddenly, you are emptiness; there is no object for you; there is pure emptiness. Then you open your eyes and look: whatsoever there is, is real.

Mind will not allow you to know the real. Mind is the disturbance; mind is the unreal. And if you get too much caught in it, then you will be trying to solve puzzles: creating and solving puzzles; and creating and solving new ones – it never comes to an end. (…) My whole effort here is to help you to become witnesses. So please don't try to get into thinking; otherwise you will become more and more confused. The life of thinking is a bogus life. And there is no way to get out of thinking through thinking – it goes on creating itself endlessly. The only way is not to get into it. So watch, and remain alert. Watch as if everything is a dream. That is the Hindu notion of maya – illusion. Everything is unreal. So there is no need to be worried; there is no need to distinguish. Whatsoever appears in the mind, because it appears in the mind, is unreal. Mind is the faculty of the unreal.

Life is authentic only when it is eternal. Otherwise, what is the difference between a dream and what you call your life? (…) Death is a great revelation. (…) This dream of life continues for a few years; then suddenly one is awakened, and the whole life proves to be a dream. (…) Each death is a door to a new formation. Each death is a cleansing. Each death is an unburdening. Each death simply relieves you of the old. (…) Who dies? You die; the 'I' dies; the ego dies. Ego is part of death; life is not. So if you can be egoless, there is no death for you. If you can drop the ego consciously, you have conquered death. (…) If you are really aware, you can drop it in a single step. If you are not so much aware, you will have to drop it gradually. (…) In fact, there is no need to take so many steps, to move so gradually. A jump into the unknown is possible.

Listen to me from your whole heart; absorb me. (…) Drop all efforts. Understanding brings its own practice. Understanding is enough.

Whatsoever you are, you will find the world exactly the same. You go on finding yourself in the world again and again. The world is a mirror. (…) If you are enlightened, you live in an enlightened world. If your energy is celebrating within, the Whole becomes a symphony of celebration.

Materialistic societies produce hollow men, men with dead emptiness within. And because of this dead emptiness, one dies before one is really born. (…) The outer is meaningless without the inner richness.

Life is non-fragmentary, but mind makes it appear fragmentary. And this fragmentation creates all the problems. Beware of fragmentation, and always look beyond. (…) The healing force is always with the Whole.

Maturity comes through understanding.

Authentic knowledge of consciousness comes only through meditation, and all else is just superficial acquaintance and basically erroneous, because the very source of it is fallacious, and poisonous.

The mind dies with total acceptance of existence.

The intimate and deep knowing comes only with no-mind. And meditation is dissolving mind into no-mind. (…) Let meditation be thy very existence.

Truth cannot be transferred. Truth is never second-hand.

The seeker dissolves in awareness.

Man is born in slavery. We are born as slaves unto ourselves. We come into the world with chains of desire. (…) freedom has to be earned. Only those who strive and struggle for it, attain it. (…) If one's eyes are open, then this whole life is a school. And one who is hungry to learn, learns from every person and from every situation.

There is only one misery, and that is isolation from God. (…) The one root misery creates the illusion of a thousand miseries.

Any commitment for the future is a bondage, and it is a destructive bondage. You can commit only for the moment.

To me, marriage is only a working partnership. If it works, good; if it works your whole life, good. If it does not work, then say goodbye. I don't think it's anything sacred. It is just an institution and a working partnership, like any working partnership of the business world; nothing to be bothered about so much.

In yoga, you have to fight with yourself to go beyond. In yoga, the world and moksha, liberation, are two opposite things. Suppress, fight, dissolve that which you are, so that you can attain that which you can be. Going beyond is death in yoga. You must die for your real being to be born. In the eyes of tantra, yoga is a deep suicide. You must kill your natural self – your body, your instincts, your desires, everything. (…) Yoga is negation; tantra is affirmation. (…) Tantra says, accept yourself as you are. It is a deep acceptance. Do not create a gap between you and the real, between the world and nirvana. (…) For your rebirth, no death is needed – rather, a transcendence. For this transcendence, use yourself, use your energies. (…) For tantra, you have to use the energy of sex. Do not fight with it; transform it. Do not think in terms of enmity; be friendly to it. It is your energy. It is not good; it is not bad. Every energy is just natural. It can be used for you; it can be used against you. You can make a block of it, a barrier; or you can make it a step. It can be used. Rightly used, it becomes friendly; wrongly used, it becomes your enemy. But it is neither. (…) As ordinary man is using sex, it becomes an enemy – it destroys him; he simply dissipates in it. (…) Tantra says, be aware of the desire; do not create a fight. Move in desire with full consciousness, and when you move into desire with full consciousness, you transcend it. You are into it, and still you are not in it. You pass through it, but you remain an outsider. (…) Tantra says, accept whatever you are. This is the basic note – total acceptance. And only through total acceptance can you grow. (…) Find out what your energies are, and accept them; and then, use every energy you have. (…) Accept them, and move with every energy with deep sensitivity, with awareness, with love, with understanding. Move with it! Then, every desire becomes a vehicle to go beyond it; then, every energy becomes a help. And then, this very world is nirvana; this very body is a temple.

Tantra means techniques for expanding your consciousness. Mantra means finding your inner sound, your inner rhythm, your inner vibration. Yantra means a certain figure which can create a certain state in you.

It is only love that transforms a human being into a god or a goddess. Love is the alchemy of transforming the lower into the higher, the base metal into gold. Love is the secret key that opens the innermost treasures of our being, that makes us aware of who we are.

The experience of the Ultimate is not an experience at all – because the experiencer is lost. And when there is no experiencer, what can be said about it? Who will say it? Who will relate the experience? When there is no subject, the object also disappears – the banks disappear; only the river of experience remains. Knowledge is there, but the knower is not. That has been the problem for all mystics. They reach to the Ultimate, but they cannot relate it to those who are following. (…) Words won't do; symbols won't help; theories and doctrines are of no use at all. (…) Communion is possible, but communication, no. (…) With a Master, you are not on a head-trip. Doubt and belief are all head-trips. With a Master, you are on a heart-trip.

Whenever a disciple is ready, the Master appears, has to appear. Wherever there is a deep need, it has to be fulfilled. The whole existence responds to your deepest need, but the need must be there. Otherwise, you can pass a Buddha or a Jesus, and you may not even be able to see that you passed a Buddha or a Jesus.

Avoid borrowed knowledge; all that is borrowed is rubbish – throw it as soon as you can. (…) Borrowed knowledge becomes a trick of the mind: it hides ignorance – it never destroys it. (…) Only that which happens to you is true. Only that which flowers in you is true. Only that which grows in you is true and alive. (…) Don't be a fool! Logic and argument have never led anybody to truth. A rational mind is just a game. All arguments are juvenile.

This is the deepest realization of all the knowers: that your being is a non-being. (…) It is like nothing: a vast emptiness, with no boundaries to it. It is an anatma, a no-self. (…) All feelings of self are false. All identifications that "I am this and that" are false. In meditation, when you come to the Ultimate, when you come to your deepest core, (…) it is a death; it is a death of the ego – the ego is just a false concept. (…) To attain nothingness is to attain all. My whole effort with you is to lead you towards nothingness, to lead you to a total vacuum. (…) You disappear, and you become the Whole. The drop disappears, and the ocean comes into existence.

The concept of self is created by the mind. There is no self in you.

Where yoga ends, tantra starts. The highest peak of yoga is the beginning of tantra; and tantra leads you to the ultimate goal. Yoga can prepare you for tantra, that's all. (…) Yoga says, "make an effort"; (…) yoga is ego-oriented – finally, it will take the jump: yoga, in the end, attains to such significance, such meaning, such depth, that it says to its seeker, "now drop the ego". Tantra is, from the very beginning, from the very first step, non-ego-oriented.

Be effortless, loose and natural. Don't fight with yourself. Don't try to make a structure around yourself of character, of morality. Don't discipline yourself too much; otherwise, your very discipline will become bondage. Don't create an imprisonment around you. Live moment to moment; live with alertness; be very aware. (…) You have to respond to the situation. (…) Why do people try to create a structure around them? So that they don't need alertness. (…) It is difficult! It is not so easy to create a fixed pattern, because life goes on moving and changing, and every moment, there is a new situation, and one has to respond to it. (…) And life is not so simple. Life is a very, very complex phenomenon. Sometimes a lie is needed; sometimes a truth can be dangerous – and one has to be aware. (…) Respond with full awareness; that's all. (…) Be empty, loose and natural. Let that be the most fundamental principle in your life.

Unless you know the nature of the mind, you will not be able to solve any problems of your life. You may try hard, but if you try to solve single, individual problems, you are bound to be a failure – that is absolutely certain – because, in fact, no individual problem exists: mind is the problem. If you solve this problem or that, it won't help, because the root remains untouched. (…) Unless you know how to uproot a tree, your fight is baseless; it is foolish. You will destroy yourself, not the tree. In fighting, you will waste your energy, time, life; and the tree will go on becoming stronger and stronger, far thicker and dense. And you will be surprised what is happening: (…) even if one problem is solved, suddenly ten problems take its place. (…) Don't try to solve individual, single problems – there are none: mind itself is the problem. But mind is hidden underground – that's why I call it the root; it is not apparent. (…) Never fight the visible; otherwise you will fight with shadows. You may waste yourself, but there cannot be any transformation in your life: the same problems will crop up again and again and again. (…) This is the fact: mind has to be solved.

Mind is never peaceful; non-mind is peace. Mind itself can never be peaceful, silent. The very nature of the mind is to be tense, to be in confusion. Mind can never be clear; it cannot have clarity, because mind by nature is confusion, cloudiness. Clarity is possible without mind; peace is possible without mind; silence is possible without mind – so never try to attain a silent mind. If you do, from the very beginning, you are moving in an impossible dimension.

Thoughts together, millions of thoughts, give you the illusion as if mind exists. But it is just a crowd, millions of people standing in a crowd – is there anything like a crowd? Can you find the crowd other than the individuals standing there? But they are standing together; their togetherness gives you the feeling as if something like a crowd exists. (…) Mind does not exist as an entity. Only thought exists. (…) The thoughts exist separate from you; they are not one with your nature; they come and go – you remain, you persist. You are like the sky – the sky never comes, never goes; it is always there. Clouds come and go; they are the momentary phenomena. (…) Watch deeply – then you will become the host; and thoughts will be the guests. (…) Receive them, take care of them, but don't get identified with them; otherwise, they will become the masters. The mind becomes the problem because you have taken thoughts so deeply inside you that you have forgotten completely the distance. (…) Always remember that which abides; that is your nature, your Tao. Always be attentive to that which never comes and never goes, just like the sky. Change the gestalt: don't be focused on the visitors; remain rooted in the host – the visitors will come and go.

Once you make the distinction that this thought is good and that thought is bad, what are you doing? You are bringing the good thought nearer to yourself and pushing the bad thought further away. Sooner or later, with the good thought you will get identified; the good thought will become the host. And any thought, when it becomes the host, creates misery – because this is not the truth. The thought is a pretender, and you get identified with it. Identification is the disease. (…) If you get identified, you become the mind. If you get identified, you become the body. If you get identified, you become the name and the form – then the host is lost. Then you forget the eternal, and the momentary becomes significant. The momentary is the world; the eternal is the Divine.

Thoughts are foreign, intruders, outsiders. No thought is yours. They always come from without; you are just a passage. A bird comes into the house from one door, and flies out from another; just like that, a thought comes into you and goes out of you. (…) You are the host, and thoughts are guests.

A thought is a great force; it is a thing. (…) Thoughts are things. If a person continuously thinks about you and your welfare, it will happen – because he is throwing a continuous force at you. That's why blessings are useful, helpful. If you can be blessed by someone who has attained no-mind, the blessing is going to be true – because a man who never uses thought accumulates thought energy, so whatsoever he says is going to be true. (…) Before the no-mind is attained, one should become absolutely positive. That is the whole difference between white magic and black magic. Black magic is nothing but when a man has accumulated thought energy without throwing out his negativity beforehand. And white magic is nothing but when a man has attained to much thought energy, and has based his whole being on a positive attitude. The same energy with negativity becomes black; the same energy with positivity becomes white.

Sometimes it happens that you see your thought functioning as a thing – but just because of too much conditioning of materialism, you think this may be just a coincidence. You neglect the fact; you simply don't give any attention to it; you remain indifferent; you forget about it. But many times you think about something, and it comes about. (…) You think it is a coincidence. It is not a coincidence. In fact, there is nothing like coincidence; everything has its causality. Your thoughts go on creating a world around you. Your thoughts are things; so be careful about them. Handle them carefully! If you are not very conscious, you can create misery for yourself and for others – and you have done that. (…) Through thoughts, you are throwing energy – and you are continuously doing it. (…) You are a dangerous thing, and continuously broadcasting. And many things are happening because of you. (…) Each single thought is creating something for you and for others. Be alert!

The further back you go, you find the earth the more and more peaceful – there are less and less broadcasters.

What is a prayer? Prayer is sending blessings to all. Prayer is sending your compassion to all. Prayer is creating an antidote to negative thoughts – it is a positivity.

Ordinarily, not aware, you go on thinking anything. It is difficult to find a person who has not committed many murders in thought, difficult to find a person who has not been doing all sorts of sins and crimes inside the mind – and then, these things happen. And remember, you may not murder, but your continuous thinking of murdering somebody may create the situation in which the person is murdered. Somebody may take your thought, because there are weaker persons all around, and thoughts flow like water: downwards. If you think something continuously, someone who is a weakling may take your thought and go and kill a person. That's why those who have known the inner reality of man, they say that whatsoever happens on earth, everybody is responsible, everybody. (…) Only one person cannot be held responsible, and that is the person who has no mind; otherwise everybody is responsible for everything that goes on. (…) It is a collective phenomenon.

A Buddha is a person who lives without the mind. (…) That is the meaning of being empty and a no-self: just being a non-being, anatta, no-selfness. Then you accumulate nothing; (…) then you transcend. (…) Buddhahood means the highest awakening. When there are no distinctions, all divisions are lost – unity is attained; only one remains. You cannot even call it 'one', because that too is part of duality. (…) No, you don't say that 'one' remains; simply that 'two' has disappeared; the many have disappeared. Now it is a vast oneness; there are no boundaries to anything.

Just as there is air, there is thought all around you; and it goes on entering on its own accord. It stops only when you become more and more aware. (…) If you become more aware, a thought simply disappears; it melts – because awareness is a greater energy than thought. Awareness is like fire to thought. (…) If you become really integrated in your awareness, thoughts don't enter you – you have become an impenetrable citadel; nothing can penetrate you. (…) The very energy of awareness becomes your citadel. And when no thoughts can enter you, they will come and they will bypass you. (…) Then you can move anywhere; then you can go to the very hell – nothing can affect you. This is what is meant by enlightenment.

The clouds that wander through the sky have no roots and no home. And the same is true for your thoughts. (…) Your thoughts have no roots; they have no home – just like clouds they wander. So you need not fight them; you need not be against them; you need not even try to stop thought. This should become a deep understanding in you, because whenever a person becomes interested in meditation, he starts trying to stop thinking. And if you try to stop thoughts, they will never be stopped, because the very effort to stop is a thought; the very effort to meditate is a thought; and the very effort to reach Buddhahood is a thought. And how can you stop a thought by another thought? (…) This will go on and on, ad nauseam; then there is no end to it. (…) So don't make yourself a battle ground of one thought fighting another. Rather, be a witness. (…) You simply remain an impartial watcher: neither for, nor against; neither appreciating, nor condemning – without any valuation. You simply sit inside yourself and look – looking without looking at. And this happens, that the more you look, the less you find; the deeper you look, the more thoughts disappear, disperse. Once you know this, then the key is in your hand. And this key unlocks the most secret phenomenon: the phenomenon of Buddhahood.

Thoughts stop by your becoming more aware, not by any effort on your part to stop them. (…) Because you want to stop thoughts, you become obsessed with thoughts.

Once you can see that thoughts are floating, that you are not the thoughts, but the space in which thoughts are floating, you have attained to your self-mind; you have understood the phenomenon of your consciousness. Then discrimination stops; then nothing is good, nothing is bad; then all desire simply disappears, because if there is nothing good, nothing bad, then there is nothing to be desired, nothing to be avoided. You accept; you become loose and natural. You simply start floating with existence, not going anywhere, because there is no goal; not moving to any target, because there is no target. Then you start enjoying every moment, whatsoever it brings. And you can enjoy it, because now you have no desires and no expectations. (…) You don't ask for anything, so whatsoever is given, you feel grateful. (…) And this is the way of the sannyasin: to remain like a sky, untinged by whatsoever comes and happens. (…) that is the deepest core of being a sannyasin – to be like a sky, space.

When you think you are tinged, it is just thinking. When you think that you have become good or bad, sinner or sage, it is just thinking, because your inner sky never becomes anything – it is being; it never becomes anything. All becoming is just getting identified with some form and name, some form arising in space – all becoming. You are being; you are already that – no need to become anything.

Everything goes on changing, changing, changing. (…) It all happens in the sky, but nothing tinges it. It remains deeply distant; everywhere present, and distant; nearest to everything and farthest away. A sannyasin is just like the sky: he lives in the world – hunger comes, and satiety; summer comes, and winter; good days, bad days; good moods, very elated, ecstatic, euphoric; bad moods, depressed, in the valley, dark, burdened – everything comes and goes, and he remains a watcher. (…) He is no more identified with anything. Nonidentification is sannyas, and sannyas is the greatest flowering, the greatest blooming that is possible.

A Buddha attains nothing. He attains that which was already there; he remembers.

Dreaming means half-conscious, half-unconscious; just on the midway, moving towards total unconsciousness; from your waking state, you are moving to total unconsciousness. On the path, dream exists. Dreams mean only that you are half-awake and half-asleep. That's why, if you dream continuously the whole night, you feel tired in the morning. And if you are not allowed to dream, then too you will feel tired – because dreams exist for a certain reason. (…) Incomplete desires hang around you. They have to be completed; otherwise you will not be able to fall into deep sleep. They will pull you back again and again. (…) The dream completes the hanging desire; then you fall into sleep. (…) Dreams are a necessity for you. (…) If a person's dreams are not allowed, he will go mad. (…) Dreams are a release of madness; and once the release happens, you fall asleep.

From waking, you fall into dreaming; and from dreaming, you fall into sleep. Every night, a normal person has eight cycles of dreaming; and between two dreaming cycles, he has just a few moments of deep sleep. In that deep sleep, all consciousness disappears; (…) that means, you completely become unconscious, the very opposite pole of Buddhahood. A Buddha is totally awakened. (…) In the Gita, Krishna says to Arjuna that when everybody is fast asleep, the yogi is still awake. That doesn't mean that he never sleeps – he sleeps, but only his body sleeps; his body rests. He has no dreams because he has no desires, so he cannot have incomplete desires. And he has no sleep like you – even in deepest rest, his consciousness is clear; his consciousness burns like a flame.

Anger comes; that shows only that your inner flame has been completely forgotten – you have become completely oblivious of it; you don't know it is there. (…) So forgetfulness is the real darkness. And in forgetfulness, everything happens. You are just like a drunkard. (…) All direction is lost; the very sense of direction is not there. (…) Your forgetfulness can invite anger, greed, lust, hate, jealousy – they don't attack you; (…) they come as invited guests. (…) That's why all basic religious teachings insist on self-remembering. If forgetfulness is the disease, then self-remembering is going to be the antidote.

If you can attain to one minute's self-remembering, I promise you to make you a Buddha. (…) You will think, "So cheap, so easy?" – It is not. You don't know how deep is your forgetfulness. You will not be able to do it for one minute continuously, not a single thought coming in and disturbing your self-remembering.

Self-remembrance is the key. Try to remember more and more, because whenever you try to remember more and more, you become centered; you are in yourself; your journeying mind falls back to one's self. Otherwise, you are going somewhere: the mind is continuously creating new desires, and you are following and chasing the mind simultaneously in many directions. That's why you are split; you are not one; and your flame, inside flame, goes on wavering – a leaf in a strong wind. When the inner flame becomes unwavering, then suddenly you are going through a mutation, a transformation; a new being is born. That being will be of the nature of light. Right now, you are of the nature of darkness; you are simply an absence of something which is possible. In fact, you are not yet; you are not yet born. You have taken many births and many deaths, but you have not yet been born. Your real birth is still going to take place, and this will be the work: that you transform your inner nature from forgetfulness to self-remembering.

I don't give you any discipline. (…) My discipline is very easy. My discipline is: Do whatsoever you like – but do it with self-remembering.

Religion cannot be practiced. (…) Religion creates the authentic being; it cannot be practiced. How can you practice being?

Simply become aware, and all karmas drop. In a single moment of intense awareness, the whole past disappears, becomes rubbish. (…) Once you realize your inner being and the light, you are no more of this world. (…) Only the dreamer is not a dream; otherwise, everything is a dream. (…) Only one thing continuously remains – you.

There must be a witness who stands aside, who always stands aside and goes on looking. Waking comes; dreaming comes; sleep comes – and somebody stands by the side and goes on looking. Only this is real, because it exists in every state. Other states disappear, but it has to remain in every state; it is the only permanent thing in you. Attain to this witness more and more. Become more and more alert, and become more and more a witness.

Religion talks in metaphors – because there is no other way to talk; because religion talks of the other world, of the beyond. It tries to find similes in this world. It uses words which are irrelevant; but somehow, those irrelevant words are the only available words – you have to use them. (…) Religion is the ultimate poetry, the essential poetry. (…) It is trying to give you the feeling of the Whole, undivided.

Don't be deceived by a metaphor: the void, the light… – don't start imagining.

You can create a whole world of experiences inside. Every sense has its own imaginative center behind it. (…) All experiences are imagination; all experiences, I say – unconditionally. Only the experiencer is the truth. So whatsoever you experience, don't pay too much attention to it. Just remember that all that is experienced is illusory; only the one who experiences is true. Pay attention to the witness; focus on the witness, and not on the experiences. (…) All experiences are dreamlike; and one has to go beyond them.

Activity shows that you are obsessed. You cannot remain yourself; you cannot remain silent; you cannot remain inactive. Through activity, you go on throwing your madness. (…) Activity is your escape from yourself. (…) Relaxation means no urge to activity in you. (…) You are at ease with yourself. Relaxation is to be at home. (…) Relaxation comes only when there is no 'must' in your life. Relaxation is not only of the body; it is not only of the mind – it is of your total being. (…) Doing is not needed at all. (…) 'Do nought!' (…) And how will it come? It will come by understanding. Understanding is the only discipline. Understand your activities; and suddenly, in the middle of activity, if you become aware, it will stop. If you become aware why you are doing it, it will stop.

What is relaxation? It is a state of affairs where your energy is not moving anywhere: not to the future; not to the past – it is simply there with you. (…) In your own energy, you dissolve. (…) This moment is all. (…) This moment is relaxation. (…) Time stops; then there is relaxation. Time is there; then there is no relaxation. (…) Relaxation is neither of the body, nor of the mind; relaxation is of the total. (…) Relaxation is not a posture; it is a total transformation of your energy.

Energy can have two dimensions. One is motivated, going somewhere: a goal is somewhere. Then, this moment is only a means: the goal is somewhere else to be achieved. This is the dimension of activity, goal-oriented. Then, everything is a means; somehow it has to be done and you have to reach to the goal – then, you will relax. But for this type of energy, the goal never comes, because (…) the goal always remains on the horizon. You go on running, but the distance remains the same. (…) There is another dimension of energy: the dimension of unmotivated celebration. The goal is here-now; the goal is not somewhere else. In fact, you are the goal. In fact, there is no other fulfillment than of this moment; there is nothing to be achieved. (…) This is relaxation, unmotivated energy. (…) So, to me, there are two types of persons: the goal-seekers; and the celebrators. (…) The goal-oriented, they are the mad ones; they are going, by and by, crazy, and they are creating their own craziness. And then the craziness has its own momentum: by and by, they move deeper into it – then, they are completely lost. (…) Just relax; no need to do anything for it. Just understand the movement of the energy, the unmotivated movement of the energy. (…) It is not going anywhere; here is all. (…) The whole existence culminates in this moment; it converges into this moment. (…) It is here, now. (…) Then, there is no tension; then, there is no anguish. The whole energy that becomes anguish becomes gratitude; your whole heart goes on beating with a deep thankfulness. And when your whole heart goes on beating with a deep thankfulness – that is prayer. (…) And if you become more and more involved in action, and less and less occupied in activity, then your life will change, and it will become a deep relaxation. (…) A Buddha is never tired. Why? Because he is not a doer. Whatsoever he has, he gives; he overflows.

Act unmotivated, just an overflow of your energy. Share, but don't trade; don't make bargains. Give because you have; don't give to take back – because then, you will be in misery. All traders go to hell.

You need not become anything – simply realize who you are, that's all. (…) Improving, whatsoever you improve, you will always be in anxiety and anguish, because the very effort to improve is leading you on a wrong path. It makes future meaningful, a goal meaningful, ideals meaningful, and then your mind becomes a desiring. Desiring, you miss.

Tantra is not an attitude; it looks at life with a total vision. (…) It looks at life as it is, without bringing mind in between – because that will be the distortion. (…) Tantra is a great yea-sayer; it says 'yes' to everything. (…) there is no negation, because with 'no', the fight starts: a conflict has come in; now you are at war. With 'no', you become the ego. (…) 'No' creates the boundary; 'no' is the boundary around you. (…) Tantra loves, and loves unconditionally. It never says

'no' to anything whatsoever, because everything is part of the Whole, and everything has its own place in the Whole, and the Whole cannot exist without anything missing from it. It is said that even if a drop of water is missing, the whole existence will thirst. (…) So tantra says 'yes' unconditionally.

The atheist is one who goes on saying 'no' to life; his saying 'no' to God is just symbolic. You may be believing in God, but if you say 'no' to anything, your belief is not of any worth; your God is hocus-pocus. (…) How can you accept the creator without accepting the creation? (…) They are one. (…) In fact, there is no division between the creator and the creation; it is a continuous process of creativity. (…) Only a total 'yes' creates a real God, reveals the real God. (…) Suddenly, everything has become one; and that oneness is God.

In the view of tantra, one who renounces is not a religious person, but an egoist. (…) The ego has subtle ways of fulfilling itself and coming again and again, in spirals, with a new face, with new colors. (…) You can renounce the world, but you will not become other-worldly; you will remain very worldly.

If you can say yes, a deep acceptance happens to you. (…) Your whole being becomes a deep contentment. (…) And a transformation comes when you accept your total being.

On the path, you will meet many people who would like to cripple you, to cut you, to dissect you. They will say, "This is bad; cut it off! That is bad; throw it out!" – They will go on cutting you; and by the time they have left you, you are simply paralyzed, a crippled one. You have no life left. That's how the whole civilization has become paralyzed and crippled. Unless tantra becomes the foundation of the whole human mind, man will not be complete. (…) Tantra accepts man in his totality. One lives one's life; one goes through it: each shade of it has to be lived; and each taste of it has to be tasted. Even the wandering, even going astray is meaningful – because if you never go astray, you will not achieve to an enriched enlightenment.

Simplicity needs a very deep and complex experience behind it. A simpleton is not simple; a simpleton is simply without experience. He may be a fool, but he cannot be a sage. (…) Somewhere Nietzsche says, If a tree wants to reach the sky, its roots need to go to the very hell. – He's right. If you want a real flowering into the sky, your roots will need to go to the deepest hell in earth.

The greatest courage in the world is to accept all that life gives to you, (…) and accept it in deep humbleness, as a gift. (…) Through experience, one transcends. (…) Accept, and, by and by, you will feel that the more you accept, the less there is desire. If you accept, how can desire stand there? (…) Then, there is no movement for anything else. (…) With acceptance, desires fall; they disappear. With acceptance, a desirelessness comes into being by itself. (…) And when suddenly one moment happens that you accept totally and all desires have gone, there is a sudden enlightenment. (…) Tantra says, 'Be yourself' – and that is the only being you can achieve ever.

Sigmund Freud is right, empirically. His experience shows that there are only two types of people: normally unhappy, and hysterically unhappy. And at the most, psychoanalysis can help this much: it can make you more adjusted. (…) Real religion starts only when you start on a journey of transformation: not to be adjusted to the society, but to be in harmony with the cosmos. To be adjusted to the society, you have to fall down.

Ambition creates restlessness. I would like you to understand your ambition. Desiring creates restlessness. I would like you to be aware of your desiring. This is the way of tantra. (…) The disease is just a symptom. When the cause disappears, the disease disappears. And if the cause disappears, you are transformed.

The mind needs occupation. The mind needs that you should forget yourself and be occupied with something. This is an escape from innate truth.

A real Master never tries to change anybody directly. He is like a subtle fragrance; he surrounds you. (…) Direct help is from the politician; indirect help is from the sage.

Don't cling to anybody, to anything, to any relationship. Enjoy, but don't cling. (…) Tantra says: remain homeless, don't abide anywhere, don't get identified and don't cling to anything. Remain homeless, because in homelessness you will attain to your real home. (…) Don't abide anywhere; then you will abide in yourself – only then you will be able to rest in yourself.

Through scriptures, you cannot attain to truth. But if you attain to truth, you will understand the scriptures. Scriptures are nothing but witnesses; they bear witness. (…) Through scriptures, you will become sectarian, (…) but you will not become religious. Religiousness happens only when the truth has happened to you. (…) And when you achieve truth, life suddenly comes to all the scriptures. Through you, they become alive again; through you, they are reborn.

Even with distraction, don't create conflict. (…) If you are inattentive, be attentively inattentive. (…) If you can enjoy the distraction, less and less it will happen to you. (…) This is the path of tantra, that everything is good and holy. Even if there is distraction, somehow it is needed.

Nothing is to be practiced, because practice creates habits. One has to become more aware, not more practiced.

A dream has to be transcended. Simply by knowing it is a dream, you transcend – this is the renunciation. (…) This is an inner phenomenon. (…) It is a loose and natural state. (…) In the very effort of renouncing a specific form, this or that, a tension comes in. (…) Accept wherever you are and whatsoever you are and whatsoever is happening to you – only then you can be loose and natural; otherwise you cannot be loose and natural. (…) Most so-called monks, sadhus, people who have escaped from the world, in fact cowards who sit in their monasteries, cannot be loose and natural. They have done something unnatural; they have gone against the natural flow. (…) To a few people, it may be absolutely natural to be in a monastery; then they have to be in a monastery.

Remain aloof! Things are neither bad nor good. (…) Nobody is a friend and nobody is an enemy. (…) The quality of goodness and badness is introduced by you; (…) it is your interpretation. (…) This you cling to; and that you avoid and escape from. Look at the whole phenomenon. (…) No practice is needed – just a look at the whole situation. (…) Mind is momentary; so whatsoever mind gives to life remains momentary: it is a color that the mind gives to life; it is an interpretation.

When you are identified with something, you have lost your soul. This is the meaning of losing your soul in the world: you have become identified with millions of things; and with every identification, a part of you has become a thing. (…) Identification brings a hypnotic state of sleep.

You can dream millions of dreams – your inner being never dreams a single dream. All movements are on the surface. Deep in the depth of your being, there is no movement. All movements are on the periphery. (…) But at the center, nothing moves; at the center, everything remains as it is – and on the center, the wheel moves. Remember the center!

Understand the metaphor of the mirror, because this is the real situation of the inner consciousness. (…) The mirror has no self to be identified with. It simply reflects. (…) It makes no difference. It reflects whatsoever is the case, but it does not interpret. (…) The mirror says nothing; the mirror simply watches without any distinction. (…) You have passed; the reflection has gone – not even for a single second the mirror retains it. This is the mind of a Buddha. (…) Your emptiness is untouched. Even while a mirror is reflecting somebody, there is nothing happening to the mirror. The mirror is not changing in any way; the mirror remains the same. This is cutting the very root. Cut the roots of a tree and the leaves will wither; cut the root of your mind and samsara falls. (…) Identification is the root; and everything else is nothing but leaves. (…) And remember, it is the same whether you are identified with greed, sex, meditation, love, moksha, God – it makes no difference.

The more you watch, the more your eyes become capable of seeing, the more you become perceptive, the more you see and the deeper you can move, and the more distance is created between you and whatsoever you do. (…) A distance is needed – and nothing can give you a distance except witnessing.

Don't cling to meditation either, because a day will come when even that clinging has to be dropped. Meditation becomes perfect when it too is dropped.

That's what I am calling witnessing: stare naked. (…) Loose, natural, staring naked within you – that is the final word.

Go slowly, because mind is a very delicate mechanism. (…) Go slowly; take proportions only which you can digest and absorb. (…) Absorb only that which is nourishment to you.

The ordinary mind wants to take more and more from the world, from everywhere, from every direction and dimension. The ordinary mind is a great taker; it is a beggar; and the begging is such that it cannot be satisfied – it is infinite. The more you get, the more the longing arises; the more you have, the more you desire. It becomes an obsessive hunger. There exists no need for it in your being, but you are obsessed; and you become more and more miserable, because nothing satisfies. Nothing can satisfy the mind which is constantly asking for more. The asking is feverish, not healthy; and there is no end to it.

Rest in yourself; don't be even indifferent to the world, because that indifference is a very subtle bridge with the world. The focus should not be on the other. Turn your lives completely inwards. (…) There is nothing to give; nothing to take; nothing to be indifferent about – only you are. You live in your own consciousness; and that is your only world. Nothing else exists. (…) And I would like to tell you: never be satisfied unless you attain this. (…) Unless you attain sat-chit-anand, absolute truth, absolute consciousness, and absolute blissfulness, the home has not been reached yet; you are still traveling on the path.

Tilopa can bring you to your innermost center of being. He can help you center: rooted in yourself, unconcerned with the world – not even unconcern is there. Everything has dissolved; only you remain in your crystal purity; only you remain in your absolute innocence – as if the world has not arisen; as if the world was not there. You come to the point (…) where you were not born; you come to the absolute source of being. (…) This is what Zen people call attaining the original face. That is what nature is.

One should not give or take – because when you give, you have moved out of yourself; when you take, you have moved out of yourself. Both are distractions; both lead you to the other. You get mixed; your energy has flown outwards. (…) Your eyes are focused on the other; and when the eyes are focused on the other, you forget yourself.

Absolutes don't exist here. Life exists in relativity.

Every moment, whatsoever you do, you remain out of it. (…) If you remain inside your being, (…) in that absolute purity, (…) no trace is left. Actions come and go; thoughts come and go; many things happen – but inside, deep down, nothing happens. (…) Only existence is there. (…) If you remain inside, you will see that everything happens by itself.

A religious man is free in his own being; he has no mold of habits and conditionings. He is not a cultured being. (…) He has grown in his awareness; and he does not need any rules – he has transcended rules. (…) Being loose and natural, he is simply truthful. (…) He has compassion; (…) it is just a by-product of his growth in awareness. He is not against society, nor for society – he is simply beyond it. He has again become a child, (…) a child in a new dimension – he is reborn. (…) The society has to come in; the society has to be passed through – it is needed. The only thing to remember is: it is just a passage to pass through; one should not make one's house in it. The only thing to remember is: the society has to be followed and then transcended; the rules have to be learned and then unlearned, transcended. (…) You have to listen to others up to an extent, and then you have to start listening to yourself. You must come back to the original state in the end. Before you die, you must become an innocent child again. (…) A society is good if it teaches its members civilization and transcendence; then a society is religious. If it never teaches transcendence, then that society is simply secular and political; it has no religion in it.

Becoming centered is the first thing towards being natural and loose; otherwise, if you are natural and loose, anybody will take you anywhere.

Knowledge is always of duality. (…) The supreme understanding transcends all this and that.

People who are too occupied in activities are afraid of themselves. Activity is a sort of escape; they can forget themselves in it. It is an alcoholic; it is an intoxicant. (…) Activity is a feverish obsession. (…) Activity has to be dropped, because it is pathological; you are ill. Action has not to be dropped; it is beautiful. (…) Action is a response: when it is needed, you act; when it is not needed, you relax. (…) A man of action, total action, acts; and when the situation is over, he relaxes.

Every journey ends in the innermost suchness of being. (…) I and my Father are one. Jesus is saying that you cannot be otherwise than the Whole, because you come out of the Whole. (…) A small drop is a miniature ocean. (…) What were you seeking? The seeker himself was the sought; the traveler himself was the goal.

Don't hope this way or that, for or against – drop all hope. Remain to the moment, in the moment, with the moment, for the moment. There is no other moment than this. (…) Remain with your innate perfection.

The first step is really difficult to pass through, because whatsoever society has forced on you will fall; whatsoever you have learned will fall; whatsoever you have conditioned yourself will fall. All your habits, all your directions – all your paths will simply disappear. Your identity will evaporate; you will not be able to know who you are. (…) Everything is melting; the identity is lost. You knew many things; now, you will not know anything. You were wise in the ways of the world; they will fall, and you will feel completely ignorant. (…) Sufis have a particular term for this man, this type of man, who comes to this state: they call him mast; they call him the madman. He looks at you without looking at you. He roams around not knowing where he is going. He talks nonsense. He cannot keep a relevant coherence in his talk; (…) all consistency is lost. He becomes a contradiction; you cannot rely on him. For these moments, a school is needed where people can take care of you. Ashrams came into existence because of this – because this man cannot be allowed in the society; otherwise they will think he is mad and they will force him into a prison or a madhouse, and they will try to treat him. They will try to bring him down, back to his normal state – and he is growing! He has broken all the chains of society; he has become a chaos. (…) In the first satori, you have to be chaotic, dynamic; you have to allow your energies to move so that all strait-jackets around you are broken and all chains are thrown away. (…) A Master is needed who can say to you, "Don't be afraid"; who can tell you to fall easily. Allow it to happen; don't cling to anything, because that will only delay the moment – fall! The sooner you fall, the sooner the madness will disappear; if you delay, then the madness can be continued for long. (…) Let it pass. It will be a nightmare, of course; but let it pass. And with that nightmare, all your past will be cleansed. It will be a tremendous catharsis. All your past will pass through a fire, but you will become pure gold. (…) Time is needed; trust is needed; a total commitment is needed.

All discipline is forced on you; it is not your inner discipline. Before you attain to the inner, the outer has to be dropped; before a new order is born, the old has to cease – and there will be a gap. That gap is madness. (…) In mid-course, if this point is passed, if the first satori is lived well, then a new order arises that is from within, that comes from your own being. (…) Now a new order arises which has a quality of freedom. A discipline comes to you naturally; it is of your own. (…) you simply do the right thing. The tumbling has disappeared; the chaos is no more. This is the second satori. (…) If you can manage to pass through the chaotic state, then the second follows very, very easily, automatically, of its own accord. You become silent; everything is calmed down, just like the Ganges when it comes to the plains. (…) Now the terrain changes; now everything flows silently. You cannot even see whether it is flowing or not; everything moves as if it is not moving, at ease. (…) This second stage has the quality of absolute silence, calm, quietude, tranquility, collectedness, at-homeness, rest, relaxation. (…) Even in the second stage, there is a very, very subtle ego, asmita, amness. (…) It will not leave any trace anywhere, but it is still there. One feels it. (…) Then, in the third satori, the individuality is also lost – atma: now the amness has also dropped. (…) That is the ultimate death. It appears like the ultimate death. (…) Now you are, but in such a totally different sense that it is better to say that you are not. (…) The river, flowing silently, reaches to the ocean and becomes one with the ocean – a vast expanse, no boundaries. Now it is no longer a river; now it is no longer an individual unit. (…) When you come back to the original source, the mother, the cycle is complete. You have come back home, dissolved with the original source. (…) This is pure isness. This is mahamudra. (…) This is the supreme, the last; there is no beyond to it.

Go on moving. A Master has to assure you that the first will pass, and a Master has to force you so that you don't cling to the second. Don't cling, don't linger, remain aware – the second too has to be passed. (…) Only at the last point can you say goodbye to the Master, never before it. Say goodbye to the Master and become the ocean. But up to that moment, you need the hand of somebody who knows.

Mind is self-perpetuating. If one dream shatters, it immediately creates another dream – in fact, it always keeps one ready. Before the old is shattered, it supplies you with a new one, a better dream, more refined, more sophisticated – and again, you are infatuated; again, desire arises. (…) It will be difficult to leave it – you have worked so hard to create it; it is not going to be easy. (…) Mind as such is a prison, and everybody is living in the prison. Unless you get out of the prison, you will never know what freedom is. (…) You will live in all kinds of dreams. (…) You will never know that the goose is always out. (…) You are the goose; the mind is your bottle.

Remember: the outside world is the world of utility; the inside world is the world of significance.

Why is your way called the way of the white cloud? – A white cloud really has no way of its own. It drifts. It has nowhere to reach, no destination, no destiny to be fulfilled, no end. You cannot frustrate a white cloud, because wherever it reaches is the goal. If you have a goal, you are bound to get frustrated. (…) once you have a goal, you are moving with a fixed destination, and the Whole exists without any destiny. The Whole is not moving anywhere; there is no goal to it, no purpose. Once you have a purpose, you are against the Whole. (…) Purpose is synonymous with mind; the mind cannot exist without purpose. (…) Once you have a fixed goal, a purpose, a meaning, then you have got that madness of reaching somewhere; then problems will arise. (…) And if the Whole is purposeless and you are with purpose, you are going to be defeated. (…) A white cloud has nowhere to go. (…) All dimensions belong to it; all directions belong to it.

The goal is here and now. Once the goal is somewhere else, mind starts its journey. Then the mind starts thinking; then the mind starts a process. (…) With purpose comes future; with future comes time.

The question is not whether one has to live through all the dreams and fantasies or not. You are living in them. You are already in them. And it is not a question of choice – you cannot choose. (…) Can you drop your dreams? Can you drop your fantasies? If you try to drop your dreams, you will have to substitute them with other dreams. If you try to change your fantasies, they will change into another type of fantasy – but they will remain dreams and fantasies. So what is to be done? Accept them. (…) When you try to change them, you believe them too much. You don't think they are dreams; you think they are real, and that changing them will be significant. (…) Don't reject, otherwise you will create more dreams. (…) the dreaming mind exists through rejection. The very phenomenon of a dreaming mind is rejection. You have been rejecting many things; that's why they pop up in your dreams. (…) The moment you accept them, they disappear; the dreams disappear. (…) The moment you become more accepting, dreams will dissolve. (…) Whatsoever happens to you, accept it as a part of your being. (…) don't create a division: this is right and this is wrong. Whatsoever is, is life. (…) Otherwise, how could it have happened? Everything is life. (…) Don't allow divisions; accept whatsoever is, and accept without any analysis. (…) A person who accepts his life totally becomes dreamless, because the very base has been cut. (…) Don't reject anything; rejection is irreligious. Accept totally; acceptance is prayer.

Mind is a killer, a murderer – the murderer of all mysteries. (…) To make everything certain is a deep urge in the mind, because mind is afraid of life. (…) Mind creates science and theology just to kill mystery, to kill every possibility of life. (…) Mystery makes you uneasy, because it is something greater than you, (…) something which overwhelms, something which overpowers, something before which you are naked and impotent – something before which you simply dissolve. (…) If the feeling of mystery is retained, (…) then every answer leads you into deeper mystery. Then the Whole asking ("why?") becomes qualitatively different. Then you ask, not to get an explanation; then you ask to get deeper into the mystery. Then the curiosity is not mental; then it becomes an enquiry – a deep enquiry into being.

Individuals are fictions. Life is not divided. Life is oneness; life is eternal present. (…) This oneness has to be felt.

One who understands stops fighting. He is not even trying to swim; he simply goes with the flood. This very current he uses as a vehicle; he becomes one with it and moves with it. This is what I call surrender; and this is what the old scriptures called the attitude of the devotee.

Time and age are indifferent. They don't force anyone to become a Buddha; they don't prevent anyone from becoming a Buddha. (…) Allow yourself to be empty, and this is the golden age. Allow yourself to be too much filled with desire, and this is the darkest age possible, the kali yuga. You create your time and age around you. You live in your own time and age.

Will-power is not a power at all, because will depends on the ego – a very tiny phenomenon; it cannot create much power. (…) will-power is a sort of impotency. (…) When you are will-less, then you are powerful, because then you are one with the Whole.

With only the still point, without the active, you cannot remain alive; you become dead. Without the still point, with only the active, you become insane. (…) A balance has to be achieved. A balance can be achieved only when you use both the polarities. (…) If you choose one, then unbalance, lopsidedness, happens. (…) Without the active part, sharpness of intelligence, sharpness of body vigor, everything is lost. One becomes dull, lethargic, weak. (…) This type of silence is not worth anything. (…) Without the still point, with the active periphery only, the ultimate result is going to be more and more madness. (…) Active civilizations become mad; inactive civilizations become dead. This happens to societies; this happens to individuals. (…) To me, balance is all. Don't choose; don't reject. Accept both, and create an inner balance. Dynamic meditation is an effort towards that balance. Active… enjoy it, be ecstatic, be fully with it. Then silent… enjoy it, be ecstatic about it. Move between these two as freely as possible. (…) Don't choose; don't get identified. Say: I am both. (…) Be both, and move easily, as freely as possible. (…) They are just like your legs, right and left.

(…) Use both! (…) If you become addicted to only one, you will be crippled. (…) Activity and silence are not contradictory; they only appear to be contradictory. (…) Brahma has no polarity against him, because he is just a balance between two polarities. (…) When both are transcended, that is Brahma. (…) Move, and constantly remember the unmoving center. Do, and constantly remember the nondoer. Make effort, and remain effortless. (…) Once you know that between the opposites balance is possible, once you have a glimpse of it, then you know the art. Then everywhere in life, in every dimension of life, you can attain that balance very easily. (…) Once you know the knack of it, whatsoever you do, the balance follows you like a shadow. This inner balance between the opposites is the most significant thing that can happen to a man.

Any gradual process will be an effort, something done on your part. So you will be strengthened more and more through it. (…) Everything gradual helps the ego. Only something absolutely non-gradual, something like a jump, not like a process, something discontinuous with the past, not in continuity with it – only then the ego drops. (…) The ego is the past, the continuity, all that you have done, all that you have accumulated, all the karmas, all the conditionings, all the desires, all the dreams of the past. That whole past is the ego. (…) The dropping is non-gradual, sudden. It is a discontinuity – the past is no more; the future is no more. Then the ego cannot exist. (…) Whenever the ego is crucified, there is a resurrection, a rebirth. You are born again. And this childhood is eternal, because this is a rebirth of the spirit, not of the body.

Whatsoever the phenomenon of inner energy, if it disappears through understanding, it is sin; if through understanding it deepens, it is virtue. The more you understand, the more the wrong will disappear and the right will become rooted. Sex will disappear, and love will deepen. Anger will disappear, and compassion will deepen. Greed will disappear, and sharing will deepen.

Two schools have always existed. One school is of sudden enlightenment: it says enlightenment happens suddenly; it is non-temporal. Another school, just contradicting the first, is of gradual enlightenment: it says enlightenment comes gradually; nothing happens suddenly. And both are right, because both have chosen one part of the phenomenon.

Nothing unripe can be thrown. Unripe fruit clings to the tree, and the tree clings to the unripe fruit. If you force it to separate, a wound is left behind. That scar will continue; the wound will always remain green, and you will always feel hurt. Remember, everything has a time to grow, to be ripe, to fall down into the earth and dissolve. Your ego also has a time. It needs maturity. (…) So to me, ego is part of natural growth, (…) and then there is a second step when it has to be dropped. That too is natural. But the second step can be taken only when the first has come to its crescendo, its climax, when the first has reached its peak. So I teach both – I teach egoness, and I teach egolessness. (…) Ego is the greatest dream. It has its beauty, its agony; (…) it has its heavens and hells. So I don't tell you to come out of your dream before the time has come. No, never do anything before the time. Allow things to grow; allow things to have their time, so that everything happens naturally. (…) You cannot make yourself egoless. Who will do it? It happens; it is not a doing. You grow into ego, and a point comes when the whole thing becomes so hellish that the dream is broken. Suddenly you see the goose is out – it has never been in the bottle.

Life is dialectical. Create, and then life says: Destroy! Be born, and then life says: Die! Attain, and then life says: Lose! Be rich, and then life says: Become poor! Be a peak, an Everest of the ego, and then become an abyss of egolessness. Then you have known both – the illusory and the real, the maya and the Brahma.

Ego is a disease if you are unconscious about it; (…) ego is a game if you are conscious about it. (…) Be conscious, mindful, and play the game! A game is not bad, but when you forget that it is a game and become too serious about it, then problems arise.

Your body is a dynamo. The more you use it, the more energy from the infinite source is supplied. If you don't use it, there is no need for any new supply. Then, by and by, the supply stops. Be more active, and you will have more energy. Be less active, and you will lose much energy. Through activity, energy is not lost; through activity, you renew it. (…) The more active, the more energy you will have; the less active, the less energy. And this is true of activity in all directions of life. (…) Love, and more love becomes available; use more, and you have more. This is the law of life. (…) Compassion, love, activity, whatsoever the dimension, the same rule applies. (…) Don't be a miser; only misers lose energy. And we are all misers; that's why we always feel dissipated.

Mind works through hypnosis.

If you are a real brahmachari, a real celibate, you can move into sex and it will not destroy your celibacy. (…) If sex disturbs your celibacy, it was nothing worthwile. You carry the quality within.

One who has really lived is always ready to die. (…) A deeper life allows death; a shallow life avoids it. This is so in every sphere of life.

A real Master will always make his disciples free of him. That is the goal.

Decide. (…) No compromise should be made, because anything half-hearted is not only useless, but harmful. Anything half-hearted divides you – that is the harm. You should remain an undivided unity.

Be more meditative. Be more silent. Allow more and more stillness to penetrate you. (…) The way is to go within, to reach deeper into yourself. (…) Answers will be coming, and you will come to know and feel that those answers are not given by your mind. There will be a total difference of quality. The quality changes so absolutely that there can be no confusion about it. (…) when your mind is silent, from the very depths of your being arises the answer. (…) It is revealed to you.

Mind is a great question-creating force. It goes on creating questions. You give the answer, and the mind jumps on it, tears it down, and creates ten more questions. When you are meditative, less and less questions will be there.

Gurdjieff has said that a woman cannot attain except through a man – and he is right. He is right, because female energy differs from male energy. It is just as if someone says that only a woman can give birth to a child. A man cannot give birth to a child – he can give birth to a child only through a woman. The physical structure of the woman carries a womb; the physical structure of a man is without a womb – he can have a child only through a woman. And the same in reverse order happens in spiritual birth: a woman can get enlightened only through a man. Their spiritual energy differs also, just like their physical part. (…) There are two ways, only two basically, which lead to enlightenment. One is meditation; the other is love. You may call them gyana yoga and bhakti yoga – the path of wisdom and the path of devotion. The basic ways are only two. Love needs another; meditation can be done alone. Man can achieve through meditation; that's why he can achieve directly. He can be alone. He is alone deep down. Loneliness comes naturally to man. For a woman, to be alone is difficult, very difficult, almost impossible. Her whole being is a deep urge to love, and for love, the other is needed. (…) the female energy reaches the meditative state through love; and the male energy reaches love through meditation. A Buddha becomes a great loving force – but through meditation.

When female seekers come to me, it is bound to happen: they will feel more love, but then a physical partner will be less satisfying. Whenever there is deep love, a physical partner will always become unsatisfactory, because the physical partner can fulfill only the periphery; he cannot fulfill the center, (…) and then there will be frustration. (…) Once the depth is functioning, once you have disturbed the depth, only God can fulfill – nobody else. So when female seekers come to me, their depth is shocked. They start feeling a new urge, a new love arising. Now their husbands or their boyfriends, their partners, will not be able to satisfy it. Now this can be satisfied only by a much higher quality of being. This is going to be so. So either the boyfriend, the husband, has to become more meditative, create higher qualities of being, or the relationship will break; the bridge cannot remain. (…) The woman will have to find a new friend or, if this is impossible, then she has to love the Divine, forget the physical part. (…) The same happens to male seekers in a different way. When they come to me, they become more meditative. (…) The more meditative he becomes, the more he wants to be alone. (…) Now their girlfriend or their wife has to grow; otherwise the relationship cannot be maintained. (…) Remember this, all our so-called relationships are adjustments. If one changes, the adjustment is broken. (…) When a man's meditation is growing, a woman's love should grow. Only then can they keep pace, and a higher harmony will arise and it will go on, higher and higher.

Ego is the source of all relationship. The world is the relationship. God is not a relationship; the Divine is not a relationship.

To be a spiritual seeker means two things, primarily. One, that life as it is known outwardly is not fulfilling; life as it is known outwardly is meaningless (…) – then, the seeking begins. This is the negative part, but unless this negative part is there, the positive cannot follow. (…) This negativity, this frustration, this anguish, is the part the world is to do. Once you become really aware of the meaninglessness of life as it exists, then your seeking ordinarily begins, because with a meaningless life, you cannot be at ease. With a meaningless life, an abyss is created between you and all that is life. An unbridgeable gap grows, becoming wider and wider. (…) Then a search for something which is meaningful, blissful, begins. That is the other part, the positive part. Spiritual seeking means to come to terms with the actual reality, not with the dream projection. Our whole life is just a projection, our dream projection. It is not to know what is; it is to achieve what is desired (…) – it is a desired projection. (…) So you go on desiring, (…) and your dreams will have a shattering disillusionment. (…) Each desire only creates in its place more desires that are still greater and, of course, in the end, more frustrating. (…) Spiritual seeking means knowing this negative part: that desiring is the root cause of frustration. (…) A no-desiring mind is one that is in spiritual seeking. A spiritual seeker is one who is completely aware of the nonsense of desire and is ready to know what is. Once one is ready to know what is, reality is always by the corner, just by the corner.

Go through the first, negative part, and the second, positive part is very easy. The second is only difficult when the first has not been traveled completely. (…) This happens: you are not really frustrated with life, but have become greedy for religious promises, (…) enchanted with religious heavens. Then everything will be difficult, because you have not gone through the first part. (…) If the first part has not been fulfilled, the thought process goes on working. It cannot be stopped. Desire is there, so desire will go on creating thoughts.

We called this world sansar. Sansar means the wheel – not only are you running, but the wheel itself is also running. (…) Even if you stand, the wheel will go on. So one has not only to stop, but to step out of the wheel. This stepping out is sannyas. (…) Be a witness to the wheel. (…) The wheel is created by infinite desires, by all desires that have ever existed, that are in existence today – all the desires of all persons, of all beings who have ever existed. You will die, but your desires have created waves which will go on. (…) Once you know the nature of this whirling wheel – of this world, of this so-called life, of this repetitive vicious circle – then you will become a silent and a blissful person. (…) You are at ease, composed. (…) So a sannyasin is not one who is frustrated; a sannyasin is one who has known the world as frustrating. (…) The more you are in the moment, the more you are non-wavering.

Just like a pendulum, the mind goes either to the past, in the memory, or to the future, in desires, in dreams. But it is never here and now; it always misses the point of here and now. It just goes to the one extreme, the past, or to the other, the future. We miss the reality between these waverings of past and future.

To be alone is a very conscious and deliberate act, more deliberate than suicide, because the ego cannot exist alone, but it can exist in suicide. Egoistic people are more prone to suicide. Suicide is always in relation to someone else; it is never an act of aloneness. (…) In suicide, the ego will become more expressive. It will enter into a new birth with greater force. Through awareness, the ego is shattered. It has nothing to relate to; so it cannot exist.

The crowd is a false substitute for the feeling of oneness.

Real courage is the courage to be alone. It means a conscious realization of the fact that you are alone and you cannot be otherwise. You can either deceive yourself, or you can live with that fact. You can continue to deceive yourself for lives and lives, but you will just go on in a vicious circle. Only if you can live with this fact of aloneness is the circle broken and you become the center. That center is the center of divineness, of the Whole.

Consciousness is individual; only unconsciousness is collective.

Living with facts is the only yoga, the only discipline. Once you are totally aware of the human situation, you become religious. You become a master of yourself.

A sexually suppressed society can remain sexual, but a nonsuppressive, uninhibited society cannot remain with sexuality forever. It will have to be transcended. So if a society is sexual, meditation will follow. To me, a sexually free society is the first step toward seeking, searching.

Sex is just an opportunity for a higher transformation of life energy. As far as it goes, it is alright, but when sex becomes the whole, when it becomes the sole outlet for life energy, then it becomes destructive. It can only be the means, not the end. (…) The moment sex becomes the end, the spiritual dimension is lost. But if sex becomes meditative, then it is directed toward the spiritual dimension.

Energy is always neutral. In itself, it is nameless, pure. The name comes from the door through which it flows. The name is not the name of the energy itself; it is the name of the form that the energy takes. When you say ‘sexual energy’, it means energy that flows through a biological outlet. This same energy is spiritual energy when it flows to the Divine. (…) seek to open the door to the Divine. When the gate to the Divine is open, all the energies that are within you begin to flow toward that door. Sex is absorbed. Whenever a higher bliss is possible, the lower forms of bliss become irrelevant. (…) They just wither away. Sex is not sublimated; it is transcended. Anything done negatively with sex will not transform the energy. On the contrary, it will create a conflict within you that will be destructive. When you fight with an energy, you are fighting with yourself, (…) and no one can win a fight against his own energy. (…) If your energies are needed somewhere else, somewhere more blissful, sex will disappear. It is not that the energy is sublimated; it is not that you have done something to it. Rather, a new way toward greater bliss has opened for you and automatically, spontaneously, the energy begins to flow toward the new door. (…) This is spontaneous; no action against sex is needed. Whenever you are doing anything against any energy, it is negative. The real, positive action is concerned with meditation.

Anything that becomes transparent will disappear. (…) And everything becomes transparent through meditation.

Your needs are in conflict. Society requires one thing, and your instincts require something quite contradictory. Social requirements and personal requirements are in conflict. Society has its requirements; morality and religion have their requirements. These conflicts have prevented man from being a harmonious whole. They have made man fragmentary. (…) In the morning, one thing is required; in the afternoon, something else is required. Your wife requires something from you; your mother requires something quite contrary. Then day-to-day life becomes a conflicting demand on you. (…) There is also an inner conflict. The part that has become manifest will always be in conflict with the part that has not yet become manifest; the actual will always be in conflict with the potential. The potential will push itself to be manifested, and the actual will suppress it. (…) Because of these conflicts, you are not in harmony. And if you are not in harmony, your energy will become antagonistic to you. Energy needs movement, (…) and this movement is possible only if there is no suppression. Otherwise, the harmony is destroyed, and your energy becomes an enemy to you. You become a house divided against itself; you become a crowd. (…) This is the situation that exists as far as human beings are concerned.

When your energy comes to harmonious unity, that is what is meant by kundalini. (…) The more your energies go up, the more they go in; the more they go down, the more they move out. (…) Unless our life energy becomes one and harmonious, and flow becomes inward, we are suicidal. (…) The ordinary state of human beings is anti-kundalini. Energy moves from the center towards the periphery, because that is the direction you are moving toward. Kundalini means just the opposite. Forces, energies, move from the periphery toward the center. The movement inward, the center-oriented movement, is blissful, while the outward movement gives both happiness and misery. There will be momentary happiness and permanent misery. Happiness will come only in gaps. The actual result is misery.

When energy is going inward, your breath will begin to have a different quality. It will be relaxed, rhythmic, harmonious.

Body and mind are one energy. (…) The body is gross and the mind is subtle, but the energy is the same. (…) One has to work from both polarities. For body, there is asanas, pranayama, and for the mind, there are the yogas that are basically concerned with your mental attitudes. (…) The body should be trained through yogic methodology, and the mind through awareness. You will require more awareness if you practice yoga, because things will become more subtle. (…) If people practice awareness techniques and simultaneously practice yogic methods, they will know deeper realms of awareness.

Kundalini is the original source of all life. (…) Kundalini, the inward flow of energy, is the only revolution, the only freedom. Otherwise you will go on creating more hells, because the more you go outward, the further off you are from yourself. And the further off you are from yourself, the more ill and diseased you are. (…) Then you become an outsider to yourself, and you do not know how to come back home. This coming back is the science of yoga. As far as human transformation is concerned, kundalini yoga is the subtlest science.

The moment you speak, you are divided. Only silence is one.

Don't try to reconcile opposites; that will be a false phenomenon. Just watch; just look deeply into things as they are. They are already reconciled; there is no conflict in existence.

Understanding at the verbal level is not worth calling understanding. In the world of religion, there is no greater deception than words. (…) When the word is understood, but not that which lies behind the word, life becomes a great turmoil.

Seeing happens when the eyes are cool. Excited eyes cannot see anything. Excited eyes, filled with their own restlessness, are insane eyes.

Truth is attained in emptiness and lost in words. Truth is attained in silence and lost in speech. Truth has no language; all language is untruth.

Real wealth would bring contentment; real wealth would bring peace, would bring fearlessness, would resonate a paradise in your life, would bring relaxation in your life. It would bring the relief of reaching the destination, or reaching home; a perfume of relaxation would arise in your life. But there is no such thing in you. (…) Your wealth does not bring peace; it only disturbs peace.

You cannot be in love with the Divine until your infatuation with life is over. (…) The essence of life is misery.

There are three types of people in the world. The first are the mind-dominated people – philosophers, metaphysicians. They go on thinking and arguing, but they reach nowhere. Their life is full of the dry sand of logic. The second type are the heart-dominated people. They sing and dance a lot, but their singing and dancing is without any understanding or discretion. They are not doing so out of freedom; it is a sort of madness or intoxication. (…) The third type are those who have made full use of mind and heart and have gone beyond. Your aim should be the third. You must desire, you must aspire for this great transcendence.

Belief is illusion.

Surrender means, I have nothing worth saving in me; I surrender my emptiness at your feet. (…) You simply return to existence what it had given to you; the gift is returned.

I am telling you that if you want to attain the Divine, then do not run away. There can be no relationship of the Divine with cowards or with escapists. The only path is the path of courage. There is a possibility of falling down in courage, but there is no other alternative.

You should remember the Divine when you have energy, because great energy is needed for this remembrance. There is no greater action than this; it needs your totality, every breath of yours, every cell of yours. (…) For the remembrance of the Divine, you have to stake the whole energy of your life.

Basically, sannyas is freedom from life. (…) sannyas means the death of attachment. (…) Sannyas means that this life between birth and death is futile, meaningless, a dream. (…) sannyas means realization of death. (…) One who is awakened is a sannyasin.

One who is lost in life and is taking the dreams to be true is a worldly person, a householder. One who makes a home in dreams or who is creating dreams in the home is a householder. But one who gets up from sleep, whose dream is over, who is awakened and is conscious, realizes that over here, there is nothing except death. (…) The attachment to life is over as soon as one sees this. Losing this attachment is sannyas. (…) Then the empty space left by attachment is nonattachment.

The Divine is always attained through grace. (…) You will not attain with effort.

The Upanishads say that when a man loves his wife, actually it is not the wife whom he loves, but through the wife he loves himself. (…) Life is a mirror, and every man is Narcissus.

The meaning of the word 'God' can only be moksha, liberation.

Sex means that my happiness is outside myself; happiness is in the other. And meditation means that my happiness is within me. (…) We are attached to those things from which we hope to get happiness, (…) which give us the hope of happiness. (…) Buddhas have said that after searching all the deserts of sex, no oasis of happiness could be found.

The question of greed does not arise if there is no attachment. (…) Anger arises when someone puts obstacles in the way of your desire. (…) So anger, greed and attachment are the shadows of desire.

Escapism is not the solution of life. Life is solved by facing it, by confronting it. You have to face all the problems of life.

The passion coming in your dream is due to your suppression when you are awake. (…) You should uncover it and see it during your wakefulness. It will not be easy for you to do so, because it will hurt your ego.

Patanjali has said that there is very little difference between sushupti, dreamless sleep, and samadhi – very little difference. Both occur when all the dreams have disappeared; the difference is that sushupti is unconscious and samadhi is conscious.

I am not saying to go and satisfy any passion that arises in you. (…) If you do it, if you indulge in it, it becomes a habit; it becomes a practice. If you suppress it, then it makes a wound inside. But there is a way in between these two: do not indulge in it; do not suppress it – just watch, just see. This is the thread of witnessing. Do not be a doer – just be a witness, just be a watcher.

People that bow down towards a temple or a mosque should know that life itself is a prayer if you remain conscious, aware. There is no other prayer; there is no other meditation; there is no other worship. Life itself becomes worship if one is full of awareness.

Desire itself leads you to misery; it does not make any difference what you desire. (…) the object of desire can be anything, money or religion – desire is desire. Desire means that you are not satisfied, you are not contented where you are and as you are. (…) Desire is anguish born out of dissatisfaction; what you desire makes no difference. Some people are building a good house on this earth, and some people are building a good house in heaven. (…) Even if you desire for heaven, it is you who will desire. It is the extension of your mind. (…) your heaven is nothing but the extension of your world here. (…) Even in heaven you will ask for worldly things, but they will be permanent there; here, they are temporary. (…) Heaven is nothing but the network of your dreams.

You cannot desire the attainment of the Divine, because that very desire will become the obstacle. When all desires disappear without any condition, when there is no desire in the mind, when there is no passion, then only the Divine remains. One cannot desire the Divine. When desire is given up, then godliness will be attained, but you cannot desire the Divine. (…) Godliness is the result of the disappearance of desire.

Those who set out in search of God, their life-style is contained in two words: prayer and patience.

No scripture can ever be used up. The more it will appear that you have found what you were looking for, the more you will realize that there is much more left undiscovered. The more you dive deep into it, the more it grows deeper. No reader can ever exhaust a scripture. Patha means reading over and over again, many times.

A sutra means: the most concise, quintessential, telegraphic. (…) the sutra is a seed; you can't be impatient with it. Only when you have sown the seed in your heart and it has sprouted and flowered, will you be able to know.

The consciousness is the atman, the soul. In this world, only consciousness is yours. The word atman means: that which is your own, one's own. Regardless of how much the rest may appear to you as your own, it is alien. All of that which you otherwise claim as yours, (…) it is all a deception, dreams, collected garbage. (…) death is the criterion for determining who is your own and who is the stranger. That which death can separate you from, know that it didn't belong to you. (…) According to religion, there is no one you can claim as mine except your own self. (…) Consciousness is your inherent nature, and that is the only reality there is. (…) Consciousness is the being, the soul. (…) No relationship can ever substitute for your soul.

Man is unconscious. His entire perspective of life is filled with unawareness; his entire vision is blurred. You can't see anything right. And you know only one pleasure, and that is forgetting yourself. (…) Whichever place helps you to forget yourself, you feel that's where you found the pleasure. You call forgetting yourself a pleasure. There is a reason for it. Because whenever you become aware, you find nothing except misery in your life. (…) Each birth of yours adds something into the chain of karmas. It takes you deeper and deeper into a pit; the hell comes closer and closer. (…) As soon as you are filled with awareness, the first thing that will happen is you will begin to see misery, the hell around you. (…) pass through it without losing your consciousness, courageously, unworried, regardless of any consequences, pain, or sorrow.

Knowledge is attained when a person has become silent, when he has dropped all the scriptures, when he returns to the world all the knowledge which he has borrowed from others, when he goes on a search of that which is his original existence – the one which he has not attained from other people.

The nature only gives birth to the body. You are the artist; you are your own creator. So the meaning of kala is: you have fashioned your own body. No one else gives you the body; it is your very desire that gives it a form. (…) Whatsoever you are is of your own making; it is all a result of your actions. You are the architect of your life. Don't blame it on the stars; you'll be simply fooling yourself. (…) For one who understands perfectly that he himself is responsible for being in this world, a transformation takes place in his life.

As long as desires persist, there can never be any liberation. All desires lead to the formation of bodies. So, as long as you have not attained to desirelessness, as long as you have not renounced desires completely, you will go on taking births and wandering in different bodies. And howsoever different the forms of the body may be, (…) the fundamental misery is only one: the soul becoming confined in the body; the entering of the soul into the prison of the body.

Spiritual endeavor will take time and intense effort, but as soon as you have begun the effort, the seed is sown: "Let me get out of this prison and be free of this body; let me be relieved of all desires; let me not sow more seeds and increase my involvement in this word; let me not desire more births." As soon as the feeling intensifies within you to overcome your unconsciousness, you begin to remember that you are one with Brahman. (…) A very intense effort is needed.

The sleep is very deep. Only a consistent hammering will be able to break it. (…) you must make an all out effort, (…) an effort that will require you to involve your total being. (…) And if you have made the right effort, if you have harnessed your total energy into searching the truth, God, or soul, then the circuit of your energy becomes complete. Whenever the circuit of your energy becomes complete, total – not broken in pieces, but whole – that very moment the world ceases to exist for you. You become God. You become free. (…) So remember, you have to apply your total energy. (…) Transformation takes place the moment you apply your energy totally.

In the waking state (first state), we have knowledge of the external world. (…) In the dream state (second state), we have knowledge only of the reflections formed in the wakeful state, but no knowledge of the objects of the world. (…) In deep sleep (third state), we have no knowledge either of the outer world or of the inner world. (…) The fourth state is turiya. (…) All meditations, all yoga, are endeavors to reach the fourth state. The fourth state means complete wakefulness, knowledge of both what is within and what is without – there is no darkness within or without. This is what is known as Buddhahood. Mahavir called this the enlightened state, jinatva. (…) Mahavir has coined a beautiful word for this state. He calls it 'the science of discrimination'. He says that the whole science consists of making careful discriminations of spiritual secrets.

Right now, your mental state is such that you identify with whatever appears before you. Someone abuses you, you become angry. In that moment, you are one with anger. You completely forget that a moment ago, there was no anger, but you existed; and in a moment, the anger will pass away, but you will remain. So anger is the smoke that momentarily engulfs you; it is not your nature. (…) Whatever happens, you are one with it. You are not aware of your separateness. You must start learning how to separate it by and by. At every stage, you have to disidentify yourself. (…) You are only the knower. (…) Little by little, stand apart from everything that happens around you. It is very difficult; the gap is small and hard to see; the boundaries are not clear at all.

The meaning of unconsciousness is to be one with whatever comes to the mind. (…) The drunk becomes one with the thought. (…) There is no ability to discriminate left with him. (…) Your life is exactly like this.

How can you break your identification with perception? First, start from your waking state, because only in the waking state there is a slight ray of consciousness. (…) Begin with the waking state; that is where your spiritual path begins. That is the first step. The second step is the dream state, and the third is deep sleep. The day you complete all the three steps, you will naturally have stepped into the fourth: turiya, the state of self-realization. (…) So start with the waking state. When you are hungry, eat, but always remember that it is the body that is hungry, not you. (…) Walk on the road, but remember that you are not walking – the body is walking. You have never walked. (…) The soul has no desires; all desires are of the body. (…) You will suddenly feel that you are divided into two parts. One part is walking; the other part is not walking. One part eats; the other does not. The Upanishads say: Two birds are sitting on the same tree. The one on the upper branch is quiet. It neither moves nor cries nor flies; it neither comes nor goes; it only sits serenely. The one on the lower branch is very restless. It moves from one branch to another branch. It jumps from one fruit to another. Both these birds are within you. You are the tree. The bird that is serene is called the witness.

As soon as you become aware, as soon as you remember, the dream breaks, because the dream works only in the absence of consciousness. (…) The dreams of an enlightened person disappear, because in sleep he also remembers that they are dreams. (…) The sannyasin has to remember constantly that whatever is happening is a dream. (…) Finally the dream disappears in the night, and this is a great attainment. If the dream is shattered, you are ready to take the third step of retaining consciousness in deep sleep.

When you shatter your own dreams, a very revolutionary thing happens: the space then becomes empty. There is nothing to see. The play is over, and it is time to go home. This is the moment that the eyes suddenly turn in, for there is nothing left outside. So the energy that flowed out to the objects now turns inwards to the observer. Meditation is energy turning towards oneself. And the moment energy turns inward, you can be conscious, even in sushupti, deep sleep. (…) Your attention was entangled in observing the world and your dreams; you remained unconscious in deep sleep. Now this entanglement is uprooted. You have no connection with the seen, and you can be without it. (…) Now your consciousness will turn inwards, and you will be awake even in deep sleep.

The experiment you have to make after you wake up from the dream is that you do not open your eyes when the dream disappears, because once the eyes open, the world of objects is present all around. The 'seen' comes back. So when you wake up from the dream, do not open your eyes. Keep looking intently at the void within. The dream has vanished. There is nothing now. So go on observing the void intently. In doing this, you will find that your consciousness has turned inwards. Then you are awake even in deep sleep. This is what Krishna means when he says in the Gita that the yogi is awake even when everyone else sleeps. What is sleep to others is not sleep to the yogi. He is awake even in deep sleep.

When you see each of the three states separately, you invariably step into the fourth state, turiya. (…) The day you realize that you are fully conscious in deep sleep, then there is no difference between you and Mahavir or Buddha or Shiva. (…) Right now, you are doing the opposite: even in your waking state, you are not fully awake. How will you be awake in deep sleep? (…) have you ever realized how automatic your actions have become? (…) All the occasions that drown you into unconsciousness can be turned into stepping stones to awareness, if you wish so. (…) A seeker should keep in mind only one factor, and that is: to utilize each moment to awaken awareness. Then be it hunger or anger or lust or greed, every state can be utilized towards awareness. If you go on accumulating awareness bit by bit, eventually you will have a good store of fuel within you. In the flame this fuel creates, you will find that you are neither awake nor dreaming nor in deep slumber; you are beyond and apart from all three.

Only the awakened person has an inner voice. Once this voice comes within range of your hearing, all that is sinful, all that is impure and dirty, all the chaos and confusion within you, will cease at once. You will then realize what a collection of personalities you have been. (…) The fourth state means recognizing the soul. Only when you break away from the first three states can you recognize the soul.

Awaken your being! Save yourself from drowning! (…) all religions are against alcohol (…) for the simple reason that it is a device for losing oneself. (…) He who is drinking alcohol is drowning. Religion is against all those things that drag you into oblivion, that make you unconscious. As it is, you are almost unconscious. You have a little ray of awakening, and you are eager to lose even that on the slightest pretext.

A great deal of energy is used up in creating dreams. (…) A mantra centralizes this energy around Ram, Krishna, Christ, Om, or whatever you like. Any word will do. (…) Mantras are instrumental for destroying dreams. Nobody has attained God only by repeating a mantra, but destroying dreams is a great step towards the attainment of God. Mantra is a method, an instrument, a hammer to shatter dreams. And what are dreams? They too are nothing but words, and that is why a hammer of words can break them. (…) Dreams are thought-waves; mantras are willpower, which is also a form of dream. But dreams are impermanent, changing; whereas the mantra is constant and one. Gradually the dream energy is absorbed in the mantra. The night you find that there are no dreams and you hear the constant music of the mantra in your sleep, you will know that you have conquered the dream state. The illusion is broken and truth has begun to unfold. Then you can enter the deep sleep state. (…) But you do just the opposite. You strengthen your thought-waves. You are seized by worthless thoughts, and you co-operate with them. You are sitting alone, there is nothing to do, and you start thinking of the coming election, of becoming president – the dream begins! (…) You are just giving energy to worthless fantasies. Your mind is filled with useless illusions. If we examine human life in detail, we will find that ninety-nine percent of life is lost in fruitless dreams. (…) Whenever the dream current begins, become awake and alert, and watch: what am I doing? (…) Thought-waves are nothing but dreams. Do not strengthen them. When the dream starts running within, shake yourself and break the dream as quickly as you can.

You have the energy of the Infinite, but your mind is like a bucket with holes. (…) Your thousands of desires are your holes. Do not go outwards; do not pay attention to 'the other'. Direct your attention inwards; synthesize! (…) Turn in; be established in yourself so that you are available to tremendous energy. (…) Move slowly towards the center, where your life-force is focused. Become established at this point, and great energy will arise within you. (…) When you have reached the self and are firmly established in it, you have reached the most profound state of existence. Existence is at its greatest density at this point, for everything is created out of here. Your center is not only your center, but the center of all creation. We are separated only at the circumference. 'You' and 'I' are separations of the body. As we leave the body and turn within, the distance gets smaller and smaller. (…) The day you know your own self, you will know the self of all creation, because at the center, all is one. Distances only exist at the periphery. (…) Shiva says: By attaining the existence within one's self, the joy of samadhi is attained.

In this world, we have to pay for our joy and comfort with toil and troubles. Here, each joy is connected with an equivalent sorrow. And human being is entangled in one dilemma: he wants to keep the joy and get rid of the sorrow. But this is impossible. (…) If the sorrow is eliminated, at the same time the joy is reduced proportionately. (…) When a man sets out to surround himself with pleasures of success and ambition, he will have to endure suffering and hardship equal to the pleasure he pursues, and this hardship and suffering break him completely. Long before he can experience any feeling of success, he has almost become unsuccessful. In this world, no one can be successful, because the price for success is terrible madness, insanity. And by the time success knocks on your door, you are not in a position to enjoy it.

All meditation is a quest to become pure. When you forget the body, forget the mind, then you will begin to attain the joy of existence, the bliss of samadhi.

A wise person renounces nothing; that which is useless falls away by itself.

The mind is the mantra. (…) Mantra means that which creates energy by continuous repetition; the very repetition creates the power. If any single thought is repeated continuously, it is translated into action. The thought that is repeated time and time again begins to manifest in life. Whatever you are is the outcome of some thoughts that have been repeated over and over again.

Whatever you try to break away from, grips you even more, because it becomes the object of your concentration. (…) Whatever you try to break away from, you find that you are hooked to it all the more. (…) Avoid the negative; beware of saying 'no'. (…) Do not be anxious to drop the evil, for then the evil will hypnotize you, and you will never be able to get rid of it. (…) He who fights the evil is defeated by evil, for such a mind makes a mantra of the evil, because mind is mantra.

All movements in the world are circular. (…) By self-observation, you will discover the circular movement of the mind. It is a mantra that is repeated over and over again. If you fail to understand this, you will be revolving round and round for endless births. Therefore, the Hindus have called the world samsara – the wheel that turns round and round. For endless lives, you do the same thing over and over again, and you are not the only one doing this. Everyone else also does it. (…) There is only one thing that is outside of this circle, and that is meditation. (…) The real dignity of your existence as a human being cannot be realized while you are captive to this cycle of endless repetition; it is born only when you break away from the wheel and stand apart. It is then that you reach Buddhahood; it is then that you attain Shivahood.

Half-hearted effort carries no meaning. (…) A lukewarm effort is meaningless. (…) You have to drop laziness. (…) If you allow laziness to win over you, it shows that you value your laziness more than meditation. (…) If this is the way you approach things, then you will eventually become more and more lazy. Effort is required for everything. Remember, life is effort; death is rest.

The energy you use for your everyday living is no more than seven praise worth. You use this for sitting, standing, walking, eating, sleeping and other jobs. This is your superficial energy, the small change in your purse. When you start meditating, this energy is used up in no time at all, because you are not accustomed to using it for meditation; this is a new activity. Now, if you let this exhaustion govern you and you stop meditating, you will never be able to enter deeply into meditation. Take no notice of your fatigue. If you continue, you will find that your persistence has tapped the energy that lies at the second level; (…) the first layer breaks down. Now this flood of newly released energy makes sleep impossible. (…) Once you have this energy at your disposal, then no matter how much you meditate, your body will never become tired. You will have something inexhaustible. (…) The second source of energy can be consumed, though not as easily as the first. If you keep on making effort, ceaselessly, this source of energy will also dry up, and the third layer will break lose. This third source does not belong to you. It belongs to God, and it never dries up; it is eternal and inexhaustible. If you become lazy, however, you will not reach the second, let alone the third. God is the supreme energy hidden in you. The first layer is that of your mind; the second is that of your soul; the third is of God. Exhaust the mind and you attain the energy of the soul; exhaust the soul and you attain the energy of God. Then, you are one with the Whole. (…) Continuous effort that becomes more and more intense is the seeker. You have to keep on trying until the third level of energy is reached, and you obtain the supreme power. Then you are a siddha, one who has arrived. Then you can relax. Before that, any relaxation is suicidal.

This quest for life cannot be carried out individually, because by yourself you are caught up in your own circle. You cannot see outside it. You don't even know that there is anything beyond it. You live in a cocoon, and for you, that is the only life that there is. Only someone who has known the absolute can bring you the news of the outside world. You are a prisoner inside your house, oblivious of the stars and the moon and the open skies. Someone from outside who has seen the moon and the stars will have to come and knock at your door and tell you to come out from behind your closed doors. (…) Therefore, the guru is the way. Guru only means the one who has had the experience, the one who has known, the one who has escaped from prison. Only he can make you aware of your imprisonment; he alone can tell you that you can escape from here, and only he can suggest the means to escape. And only he can guide you out of the prison, because he knows the door from which you can escape. There are doors in this prison where the guards are asleep, and there are doors in this prison where the guards are awake and alert, and if you try to escape through these doors, you will find yourself in great trouble. Now, at least, you are free within your prison, but if you try to escape through the main entrance, where the guards are alert, you will be caught and thrown into a dark dungeon. Then the prison will become even more constricted. And remember, if you try to get out by the method of negation, you will fall into this dungeon. If you fight with evil, you will be thrown into greater evil – that is the main door. No one can ever escape that way. No one has ever escaped through the main door, because at the main gate, all steps are taken to maintain complete security. But there are other openings in this prison which are hidden, where there is no guard. These exits are unknown to the prisoners; they have their eyes fixed on the main door.

You will understand the scriptures according to your own understanding – but you are not wise. (…) The meanings that an ignorant person draws from the scriptures just cause him more trouble and difficulty.

If you practice anything incessantly, day and night, sleep is bound to be destroyed. You have created a great flood of energy inside yourself, and its continuous motion won't allow you to sleep. (…) A man was so intoxicated by the vipassana that he began to practice it twenty-four hours a day. Besides, he had done this practice for so many years that all the brain tissues that brought on sleep had been destroyed. (…) I suggested to him that he should forget the meditation completely and become a lazy person for a full year. He should forget all about meditation. He should encourage idleness – just eat, drink and sleep as much as he could for a year; become a completely worldly person for a full year. He was disappointed. (…) He objected. "Do as I say for a year and then come to me," I told him. He returned in three months, beaming and happy. Then I had to give him a new technique. At such a point, I have to judge what is suitable and how much a particular person can take. Gradually, the duration is increased according to the seeker's progress.

Knowledge means awareness. The more you are established in the fourth state, turiya, the more your soul will be filled with life energy.

Your soul is almost dried up; you have denied it all nourishment. You have virtually forgotten that it needs to be fed. Your body consumes food while your soul is fasting. (…) Reverse the process. Let the body fast a few days, and let the soul be nourished. (…) Let a major part of your life's work be the awakening of knowledge, for that is your soul's food. (…) If knowledge of the soul does not penetrate you, if the flame within does not get its fuel, then dreams arise in your life, then desires arise, and your life loses its way and staggers in darkness. Then you live in illusion; then you merely keep weaving webs of fantasy.

Either you roam around the byways of your memory, which is a dead dream, or you wander in your imagination, which is a dream of the future, which is still to come. You are divided in these two. The present is the middle, and that is where life is – but you miss it. Knowledge, awareness, will awaken you, here and now, to this very moment. Knowledge will bring you into the present. (…) That which is present is reality, truth. To dream is to wander in that which is not present. (…) Meditation is an effort to drag you from the past and future into the present. (…) To be here and now, totally peaceful and aware, is meditation.

The biggest of egos is weak and miserable, because even the biggest ego is impotent; it has no power of its own. Power belongs to the soul. (…) Therefore, the ego has to be nursed twenty-four hours a day. It needs support; it has no legs to stand on. We have to prop it up with wealth and position; if nothing works, we support it with sin. You can visit the prison: the bigger the crime, the bigger the criminal. (…) The ego can be supported by good deeds, by evil deeds, by wealth, by position – and yet it is a cripple.

There is only one sin: to consider oneself apart from the existence. All other evil follows like a shadow. There is only one virtue: to know oneself and be one with existence. All virtues follow by themselves in its wake.

You are oblivious of the fundamental principle within. That which you presume to be the doer is non-existent. You hold on to that which is not; hence the distress and confusion.

All your life, you slave and toil, and your troubles are not diminished; in fact, they have increased. In spite of working hard all your life, in the end you find you have gained not a drop of joy; there are only mountains and mountains of sorrow and pain. Yet man runs in this meaningless rat race until his last breath. Why this infatuation for what is worthless and meaningless? (…) The useless and meaningless have one outstanding quality: they demand no effort. (…) they will take root and flourish on their own, and they will keep a tight grip on you until your last breath. (…) The meaningless grows effortlessly, but the meaningful requires great work. That's why you have chosen the meaningless; it grows on its own. (…) You learn love only with great difficulty. Every moment, you have to uproot all the weeds before you can plant the seedling of love. If you want to grow love, the weeds must constantly be kept in check, or the young plant will be smothered, as if covered by a heap of rubbish. (…) To attain to the meaningful is a journey, an uphill journey. Attaining the worthless is like rolling down the mountain; you don't have to do anything, since the force of gravitation will do everything. (…) Know that whatever happens by itself is worthless. (…) People come to me and say, "We try to meditate, but slip up again and again." (…) This is not the case with your desires and passions. You have never forgotten to be angry, and you have never forgotten to be greedy, but you have to remind yourself to meditate.

Shankara has defined knowledge as the discrimination between the meaningful and the meaningless. (…) Blindness, lack of discrimination, is maya, illusion. (…) In life both exist, the flowering shrubs as well as the weeds. You will have to distinguish one from the other by your own experience. If your attention gets fixed not on the meaningful but on the worthless, you wander in illusion.

You do not know who you are, nor where you are going, nor do you know where you come from. You have got yourself entangled with the rubbish by the side of the road. You have made a home by the side of the road, and you are so filled with worries and anxieties – just because of this worthless trash, which is there whether you take care of it or not. You have no cause to worry about it.

Indiscrimination is maya. Indiscrimination means the inability to distinguish the diamond from the pebble. You have to become the jeweller of life, because that alone leads to the birth of discrimination. (…) The day all that used to grow by itself stops growing, know that maya has ended.

You want to fulfill some earthly desire or other, even through religion. Go to the temples and listen to the prayers of people. You will find that their demands are all worldly. (…) Even in the temple you ask for worldly things. One would think your temples were supermarkets where everything is sold. You have no idea what a temple should be. Your priests are no more than shopkeepers. (…) You will always avoid the real temple. (…) If you come across a genuine temple, you will run as fast as you can.

You will never go to Buddha, because no miracles occur around him. (…) The greatest miracle that takes place with Buddha is desirelessness, but your desire-ridden eyes cannot see this. You can only see Buddha, you can only understand him, you can only bow down to him when the world's meaninglessness has really and truly dawned on you, and the curtain of attachments and cravings has really fallen away.

That which is meaningful in life demands that you stake your life on it.

Your love affairs cannot be permanent. They are all conducted in a state of intoxication; it is a form of attachment. It has not happened consciously. (…) We mistake attachment for love. Love is 'the eye'. No eye is sharper than the eye of love. It is the eye of love that sees God hidden in all His creation.

Yogis are also prey to attachment – they acquire certain occult powers; that is not difficult at all. You can read another person's thought with a little practice. You can influence others' thoughts with a little practice. You can implant your thoughts into another – again, with a little effort. This is science, and religion has nothing to do with it. (…) This is a method, an art, but this has nothing to do with religion. (…) These are the tricks of a juggler, a magician, and those who can perform them are not those who have attained. But you are bound to be impressed. (…) Remember, as long as you want to impress someone, you are possessed by the ego. (…) The ego desires attention from others. (…) It wants to be the center of the world. (…) The soul never wants to impress anybody – what is the point? It is like drawing a line on water. (…) The desire for occult powers is part of the desire to impress others. It has nothing to do with the religious quest. It is essentially worldly. (…) The yogi who is caught up in his attachments attains occult powers, but is devoid of any self-knowledge. (…) the truth is that the more power he acquires, the further he drifts away from self-realization, because as the ego becomes larger and larger, the soul becomes more and more empty. And as the ego is emptied, the soul becomes richer and richer. You cannot enhance both ego and the soul at the same time. Give up your desire to impress and influence others, or your yoga will be corrupted. In that case, even if you practice yoga, it will have a political, not a religious motivation. (…) the so-called siddhas, those who possess the powers, never reach God. They acquire many powers, but they miss the real power. (…) occult powers are oriented towards the other. (…)

As long as your attention is directed towards others, you cannot direct it towards yourself. (…) Self-realization is the genuine power. (…) Self-knowledge is attained only by him who turns his eyes away from others and into himself.

In politics, you want to influence others by hook or by crook. You don't mind using right or wrong methods in doing that. And the reason why you want to influence others is that you want to exploit them.

Ego knows neither good nor bad; it only knows how to fulfill itself. How it fulfills itself is secondary. The ego's only aim is to nourish itself and to grow strong; but since the ego is emptiness, it always remains empty in spite of everything. As life advances, a man's ego turns more and more insane. He realizes that life is passing by, most of it is gone, and yet the ego is unfulfilled. As he gets older, people stop noticing him. In fact, they are simply waiting for his departure.

Stop looking to others for recognition. Drop this beggar-like attitude. What will you gain by attaining powers? (…) By attracting millions of idiots, you will prove that you are the center of attention of millions of idiots. You are super-idiots. (…) What is the applause of misguided people worth? Before whom do you want to prove yourself? If you want to be acclaimed as one who has arrived by the world, you are looking for the recognition of fools. You yourself are a fool.

Only when attachments are completely conquered is the victory complete. What is the meaning of attachment? It is the attitude, "I cannot live without others. The other is the center of my life." (…) Attachment means: you do not live within yourself; you live for something else. (…) Attachment means, you have removed your life-force from within yourself and placed it elsewhere. (…) The life-force is not vibrating within you. It is not where it should be, and then you will be in trouble. This very attachment is samsara, worldliness. Wherever you place your life-force, you will become slave to it. (…) The curtain of attachments means that your soul is prisoner elsewhere. Whether it is locked up in your son or your wife or your wealth makes no difference. What matters is the fact that your soul is not within you; that's what attachment means. A permanent conquest of attachment means that you have given up all dependence on others. (…) Your life depends entirely on you. You are centered within your own self. You are enough for yourself, alone. You have made your own existence your center. Now if your wife dies or your wealth disappears, it does not matter at all. For these are just superficial waves. Then, whether you succeed or fail, whether happiness or sorrow, it makes no difference, for the difference was caused by your dependence.

Change is the other name for the world; yet you attempt to find in it some permanent support on which your life can depend. This cannot be. Every moment of your life is filled with sorrow, for every moment further erodes the support on which you stand.

The mind is a circle. You keep revolving round and round in the wheel of mind, and this wheel is given energy by your attachments. Break your attachments and the wheel stops, and as soon as the wheel comes to a halt, you realize that you are at the center. This is natural knowledge; this knowledge is innate. Such an awakened yogi realizes this world to be the result of the rays that emanate from his own self.

All methods serve to remove the hurdles along the way. All your rocks must be removed. The destination you carry with you. (…) The time is ripe for you to drop off the tree of the world. Don't be afraid that you will disappear. You will be lost, but only the you that is useless will be lost. What is meaningful will be multiplied endlessly.

The inner soul is the stage. It is the projector by means of which the outer world becomes an extension of the inner drama. (…) This play is going on, and you shall keep wandering in it as long as the mind is not within your control. Through control of the mind, reality is attained. (…) All sadhanas, all spiritual practices, aim at only one thing: to break and destroy the domination of the mind. (…) If you want to overthrow the mind's domination, destroy all identifications with it. (…) As you begin to stand apart from your thoughts, they begin to lose strength and become lifeless, for they get no energy. (…) As your mind begins to come within your control, as you gradually start becoming the witness, you will find that reality, your soul, your actual existence, begins to become awakened. It is misuse and failure of the mind that leads to samsara, the world; control of the mind leads to the soul. Where the mind is master, is the world; where mind is the slave, is God. (…) The mind is a ladder. (…) he who is master can go up; the one who is slave descends further and further down. (…) As soon as you gain mastery over yourself, the mind begins to work in a more orderly fashion. As soon as you lose your hold on the mind, there is chaos and confusion. (…) If the owner is one, it will give a direction to your life, and reality will assert itself. You will then be able to know yourself.

You can only become the master if you have become the witness. (…) Do not fight the mind. Fight, and it is a state of tension. (…) freedom will not result. If you fight, you give the mind an equal status. (…) You have to assert your own mastery not by hostility, but by rising above the mind. Independence will come. If it comes through opposition, it is a false freedom; there will be tension and distress. In religion, there is no place for a warrior. In religion, you have to rise above. Do not fight, for you will stagnate at that level. Don't make an enemy of your mind; you have to go beyond it. Transcend it. The key to going beyond the mind is the ability to witness.

When a person is liberated, he finds nothing opposing or conflicting in this world. All conflict and opposition cease. (…) Then worship and work are the same. Then a person accepts life as it comes, as it is. There is no need to make the slightest change.

The good that is afraid of evil is of no value. The sadhu is afraid of the sinner; the true saint is not. The saint is beyond both. The saint is one whom no circumstances can change. Staying in the world outside, he is firmly established within himself. The world cannot penetrate within him, even if he chooses to remain in the world.

No matter how hard they try, no Mahavir, Buddha, Shiva or Krishna can reveal God to you, for your God is hidden within yourself.

There is only one cause for your restlessness: you have not let your seed of meditation develop into a tree. Try as hard as you will, you will remain restless. Perhaps you imagine that peace will come if you accumulate the right things – wealth, status, honor, health, sons and daughters… but there is no end to your restlessness. The more of these things you gather, the more your life will be filled with restlessness, and the more intense it will be. (…) When you have gratified all your needs, you will suddenly realize that the actual need is for meditation. All other needs were for the body, not for your self.

Your mind is an immortal creeper. It does not die; it lives indefinitely. It follows you for countless lives. It has no roots, no seeds. Its existence is rootless. It should be dead, but it lives on you. Your mind envelops you; you are completely smothered by it. All your life-energy is sapped by the mind; you are almost dried-up. Your mind lets you have just enough energy to keep you alive, to permit your survival. (…) In a non-meditating state, the mind is ninety-nine percent and you are one percent; in a meditative state, the individual is ninety-nine percent and the mind only one percent. If you become one hundred percent and the mind is zero, that is the state of samadhi. Then you are completely liberated; the seed has developed into a full-grown tree. There is nothing left to be achieved now. (…) Then existence becomes filled with celebration.

The day the twice-born state flowers with you, your knowledge can never be destroyed. It will flow constantly. You will become a current of knowledge. Everything will become knowledge, consciousness. When the seed of meditation breaks, there is nothing but consciousness, and only consciousness within you. You are transformed into a state of awareness and of witnessing, where knowledge is indestructible, where it cannot be destroyed. (…) Then your whole life becomes an expanding consciousness. This is what we call Buddhahood – the state in which a man lives who is in full consciousness. Now knowledge cannot be destroyed; now wisdom never fades. The flame within burns constantly and without flickering. When this happens – that the seed of meditation breaks and there arises from within the eternal knowledge and constant stream of consciousness – then there is no birth; then you shall not reincarnate again. You return to the body only in a state of unconsciousness; (…) you descend into the body unknowingly. You have lost your way in the dark. The day your eyes become filled with light, you will stop descending into the body. (…) This we call Brahma; others call this God; yet others call it nirvana or moksha. (…) Nirvana means: the extinguishing of the lamp.

Great courage is required. It requires more courage than anything else one does in the world. There is no greater challenge to your bravery than religion. (…) The weak can never become religious; only the very strong can walk the path of religion. Where you see the weak becoming religious, kneeling in the temples and mosques, there is no religion there; it is only a worldly institution. The greatest act of bravery is to plunge into religion. (…) It is the readiness to choose an unfamiliar footpath, to leave the world and set out in search of Brahma, to leave the well-mapped world behind and set out on the uncharted sea. There are no maps, no guides.

Through all three states – wakefulness, dreaming and deep sleep – turiya, the fourth state, runs like a thread through the beads of a mala. Even while you sleep, there is something awake in you; when you dream, there is someone witnessing the dream. (…) That which you are is bound to be present. It can be suppressed, hidden, forgotten, but never destroyed. Whether you are asleep or dreaming or awake, turiya is ever-present. Deep within, you are always Buddha. However much you wander, all wandering is only superficial and belongs to the waves on the surface. Deep within, you have never wandered, for deep within, there is no way to wander. Therefore, the fourth state is not to be attained, but revealed. It has not to be achieved, but uncovered. It lies hidden within like a buried treasure.

In all three states – whether you are awake, dreaming or in deep sleep – keep the remembrance of the fourth state alive. Over the other three states let the fourth state pour continually. Whatever happens on the outside, just let it be; it is only the periphery. Keep your attention on the center. Be aware each moment; (…) always remember that you are the observer and not the doer. Do not take life to be anything more than acting; don't identify yourself too much with the action. Don't get too involved; don't lose yourself in it, for you are simply playing a role in the play. Keep outside of it, and within yourself. (…) Start with the waking state. (…) Whenever the opportunity arises, shake yourself and wake up. Time and time again, your remembrance will slip. Give yourself a push, a jolt into wakefulness again and again. As a person ties knots in his handkerchief to help him remember something, tie knots in your consciousness that will remind you again and again. Whatever you are doing, whenever, shake yourself into consciousness of the truth that "I am not the doer, I am only the observer". When this thought takes root within you, you will notice all your tensions disappearing. All tensions belong to the doer, the ego. As soon as you contact the observer in you, all tensions vanish. (…) When turiya comes easily in the daytime, you can utilize it in your dreams. Then, when you are about to fall asleep, let the last thought in your mind be: "I am the observer". And thus you fall asleep. If you cultivate the feeling till you fall asleep, the feeling will continue into sleep, for it is only the body that sleeps. As you cultivate this feeling more and more, one night you will suddenly become conscious of the observer in your sleep. And as soon as you become aware of the observer, a rare thing happens – dreams vanish. Dreams occur only because of your unconsciousness. When this even takes place in your dreams, the third happening becomes possible. Continue the repetition "I am the witness" into your sleep. The day this stream of awareness enters your sleep, the key to the supreme treasure falls into your hands. Now nothing and nobody can make you unaware, unconscious. He who awakens even for a moment in his sleep, his unawareness is gone forever. The day you awaken in your sleep, you become a yogi.

All dreams occur in a desire-ridden mind. (…) If you have a desire which remains unfulfilled during the day, you fulfill it during the night. (…) Dreams are lost only when a man awakens in sleep. Then dreams become meaningless, for he who awakens in sleep has no desire left in him. All desires are part of unconsciousness.

You go through life in exactly the same way as if you are dead drunk or completely drugged. You will have to break this addiction. (…) Begin with the waking state.

To be fully aware means to be fully conscious of the fact that all actions are happening outside. They are the needs of the body, not your needs.

To me, sannyas means to know the web of deception you have woven within yourself, and to eradicate it and live authentically and realistically.

As a man begins to awaken, he begins to realize that his wakefulness is false, that his dreams are the outcome of a twisted mind, that his very sleep is filled with restlessness. In all three states, there is a restlessness and uneasiness, a feeling of being harassed. As his perception sharpens, he is able to recognize the lies he has been carrying, and to drop them. More light penetrates, and his consciousness grows in strength and intensity.

Your sins were committed in unconsciousness; your good deeds also. Therefore, there is hardly any difference between your good deeds and your bad deeds; the quality is the same. (…) The real question is of breaking this unawareness, not in changing your mode of action, for that is very easy. If you are unconscious in one form of action, you are bound to be unconscious in another form of action also.

As soon as a person enters into self-awareness, he experiences prana, the life force, for the first time. Through this experience, he sees how everything around him is permeated with the emanations of the divine energy; he attains dispassion and equality of vision. And as soon as a person knows his own self, he immediately comes to know that the same flame burns in everyone of us. As long as you have not seen and experienced your own self, the other will always remain alien to you; as long as you have not recognized your own self, the other will remain the enemy. As soon as you witness your own self, you will see the light of the flame within the clay walls of everyone; you will attain the vision of equality. Then there is neither friend nor foe. No one is your own; no one is a stranger. Then it is actually you who permeates everyone; then there is only one. (…) He who knows his own self, knows his own self in others. (…) All lamps carry the same flame; all drops contain the same ocean. (…) As you become aware of the soul on one hand, God, the supreme soul, stands revealed on the other.

Do not seek God directly, for then He will only be a figment of your imagination, a religious dream and no more. (…) There is no way to seek God directly, for you yourself are the gate. (…) The soul is the door to God. Here you know your self, and here God stands revealed.

When a person sees all things as equal, he becomes like Shiva. Then he becomes God himself.

Prayer does not depend on what you say; it depends, rather, on what you are. Worship depends not on what you do, but on what you are. Religion is involved not with your actions, but with your existence. If love is at the center of your being, there will be prayer at your periphery. If there is perpetual peace at your center, there will be meditation at the periphery. If there is awareness at the center, your life itself will become an act of self-purification. But the reverse is not the case. By bringing about change at the circumference, you cannot change the center; but a change at the center automatically brings about a change at the circumference, because the circumference is simply the shadow of the center. You cannot change yourself by changing your shadow; but by changing yourself, the shadow changes accordingly. It is very important for us to know this, for the majority of people waste their lives trying to change the periphery. They stake their all into bringing about a change in their behavior and their conduct, but even if these are altered, nothing else changes along with them. However much you may modify your conduct, you will remain what you are. (…) An inner transformation is necessary, and not a change in the pattern of your behavior. As soon as there is inner change, everything changes with it.

Every utterance of one who becomes like Shiva becomes a remembrance, japa. You will not find him praying, because he does not need to set apart a time for prayer. You will not find him worshipping, (…) for he himself is worship. (…) whatever he does is worship; when he breathes, it is remembrance, it is japa. (…) All acts of the Shiva-like person are acts of devotion. He need not observe any specific practices; that would be unnatural. (…) Spontaneous samadhi is that which needs no looking after, but this will happen only when the Shiva-state becomes the core of your being, when you become Shiva-like.

A person who has attained Shivahood either remains or is absorbed, according to his own will; he can remain in existence to serve, or he disappears into the void.

Only self-knowledge can make you master of your inner powers. Only self-knowledge fills your life with light, knowledge and splendor.

There are people who are attached to the world, and there are people who are attached to the soul; both are in bondage. They have not yet reached the ultimate salvation. The knowing one has no ties – neither inside or outside. He flows naturally in and out.

Everything happens outside you, but you stand too close; that is the trouble. Keep your distance! (…) Stand apart and watch, like an observer.

You will wander as long as you identify yourself with happiness and sorrow, for then, (…) your dreams will lead you to new births. (…) The desire which lingers at the moment of death becomes the seed for the next birth. What does a tree do before it dies? It draws all its life-energy into its seeds. The seed is the desire of the tree to exist after death. (…) Because all his desires have gone, the yogi who is established in the state of aloneness is completely freed from the cycle of birth and death.

The day that life appears worse than death, as truly it is, the day that life appears so hideous, grotesque and meaningless that under no circumstance will you undertake a new voyage, on that day you undergo a transformation. Right now, if you are interested in religion, it is only a part of your search for happiness, perhaps a new kind of happiness, and that is why you never attain religion. Your search for religion will be real only when you are not prepared to step into another life journey. You have seen it all and found it meaningless. You have experienced happiness and found that it also gets filled with suffering and sorrow. (…) That which is proclaimed to be nectar is just another brand of poison. The day you recognize how useless and meaningless everything is, and also that it is all outside of you and has nothing to do with your intrinsic being, on that day religion is born in you.

When the flowers bloom, the tree's life is completed. In its blooming, the tree has attained the full fragrance of its life. What it was born for has come to pass.

Use the mantra so that all that is useless and meaningless in you drops away, and all that is meaningful and purposeful is cleansed and purified. Make use of the mantra so that all that you are right now may shatter, and you may be scattered on the ground, so that what is your possibility may sprout.

There are two ways of living. One is the way of conflict; the other is the way of surrender. In conflict, you feel that your will is different from the will of the Whole. In surrender, you feel that you are a part of the Whole, with no question of your will being different or apart. If you are aloof and apart, conflict is natural and inevitable. If you are one with the Whole, surrender is natural. Conflict brings tension, restlessness, worry, and anxiety. Surrender brings emptiness, peace, joy, and finally the supreme knowledge. The ego thrives in conflict, and is destroyed in surrender. The worldly man is always in conflict; the religious man has given up all struggles and surrendered himself.

He who is unburdened is a sage; he who has weight is still ignorant.

There is only one way to annihilate the ego. The Vedas have referred to it as rit; Lao Tzu calls it Tao; Buddha has called it dhamma; Mahavira's word is dharma; Nanak refers to it as hukum – divine order. He who conducts himself according to His command without making a single movement on his own, with no desires or feelings of his own, or need to introduce his own self, is alone the religious man. And he who puts himself under his command attains all. (…) To obey His command is the gateway to His heart. To believe in oneself is to turn your back on God. (…) The only way to stand before God is to leave your own will. (…) All defeats and all victories are diseases of your own ego. (…) All is His play. (…) it is He who wins and He who loses. He wins with one hand and loses with the other; however, the apparent winners and losers, who are no more than a means, instruments, mistakenly consider themselves doers. (…) The victory is His; the defeat is His. We are just pawns in the chess game. (…) Once you understand the essential, that all is His, what remains of the I? There is no one left to say I.

Infinite are the gates to His abode. Whichever way you go leads to His gate.

Be in the wold, yet not of it. (…) Outwardly be in the world; inwardly be in God. Let the outer physical boundary be in contact with the world, but let the center remain untouched. This is the essence.

The Lord is a loving relationship. (…) The devotee longs for something that he can touch, something he can dance around, sing around. The devotee wants a place to lay his head. (…) The Lord becomes the Beloved, and now we can be related; the way is open. (…) The Sufis look upon God as the Beloved, so the seeker becomes a lover. The Hindus, the Jews and the Christians have spoken of God as the father, so the seeker becomes a child. Nanak saw God as the lord and master, so the seeker becomes a servant.

A demand can never be a prayer; a desire can never be a prayer; a longing can never be a prayer. The essence of prayer is to offer thanksgiving, and not to ask for handouts. He has already given enough. (…) The cup is full to the brim and already overflowing. The genuine devotee offers thanks; his prayer is full of gratitude.

People keep on asking; (…) the beggars keep asking. If you are constantly asking, when will you pray? When will your worship begin? If you fulfill one desire, ten others take its place. (…) You can never be satisfied, because it is not the mind's nature to be full; its essential quality is to be unsatisfied. (…) What is the mind but a collection of all your demands? (…) Only when one is rid of the mind, does satisfaction appear.

How can the mind pray, for prayer is a state of no-mind? The whole viewpoint is changed as soon as you put the mind aside. (…) Abolish the mind, and you begin to see existence.

No gift will serve the purpose. To understand that everything is His, is enough. The gift is accepted! As long as you feel something belongs to you, you think of offering something. As long as you consider yourself the master, you may give if you like, but you err. Anything you may offer – your whole kingdom – is nothing. For everything is His, even you are His! Whatever you have earned, whatever you have gathered, is all His play.

Both in the night, when you are about to fall asleep, and in the morning, just as sleep departs and you are about to awake – these are the two moments when consciousness, in its process of changing gears, drops for a moment into neutral, when you are drifting between sleeping and waking consciousness. This is the time that Hindus call sandhya and Nanak calls amrit vela. Sandhya kal is a scientific term. Kal means hour, and sandhya means middle – neither here nor there; neither belonging to this world nor to that. At the moment of sandhya kal you are nearest to God; therefore the Hindus have made use of this time for prayer. Amrit vela, nectar time, is sweeter – the moment you are nearest to ambrosia.

It all happens in this temporal body: with one mechanism of the body you sleep; with another you awake. All dreams pertain to the body. All waking and sleeping happens to the body. Behind this body is hidden a you who never sleeps, never awakens, never dreams. (…) The bodiless is hidden within the body; the master is hidden behind the slave. You are both. If you look at the body alone, you are the slave; if you look at the Master within, you become the master.

If you want to catch the ambrosial moment, you must become conscious of the present at every moment. (…) When you become capable of seeing both sleep and awaking, you will stand apart from both. You become the seer. This is the nectar moment.

The action can never be greater than its doer. (…) Whatever comes out of you is invariably less than you, or at the most, equal to you – but never greater. How then will you attain God? Your actions will achieve nothing; the more you try through action, the more you will wander. (…) The West is an example of this. They have attained a great deal through actions. (…) But they are completely bereft of God. The more they attained in the physical field, the more they lost all those things that are born of the nondoer state, inaction, meditation. (…) All prayers became hollow and superficial. Meditation was completely lost. For if everything is to be attained by action, what is left to inaction? Therefore the occidental mind takes the Easterner to be lethargic and indolent.

All that we learn in this world serves as a means of getting the better of one another. It is a plan for your conflicts in life. You will be able to fight better and win out if you have more degrees. The universities are a reflection of your aggression; armed with its weapons, you can compete and exploit others more efficiently. You can harass them more systematically, and commit crimes lawfully. With the right rules and methods, you can do efficiently all that you otherwise could not do, and which you should not do. Education teaches dishonesty and deceit. As a result, you may win out over others, but you will never be wise. Rather, people are becoming more and more unwise, ignorant. Our universities are not centers of learning, because no wisdom is contained there. (…) Kabir says, "All the world has learned books upon books, and never has even one become a learned man. He who learns the four letters of l-o-v-e, becomes a wise man."

Those who have served Him, those who have revered and worshipped Him, have attained His presence. (…) Service is prayer; (…) service is worship. The more you get absorbed in service, the nearer you will reach to Him. (…) Service becomes worship when the one you serve is God. (…) And this can only happen if you dedicate all your actions to Him. (…) To be religious is a twenty-four-hour undertaking; the religious spirit should pervade you all day long. (…) All life in its totality is His. Nanak says, Sing in praise of the Lord of all attributes. Sing only of Him; listen only to Him; let only Him reside in your heart. (…) Keep Him in mind always. Thus you will be rid of suffering and carry home the bounty of bliss.

Not only will you live in happiness in your everyday home, but at the hour of death, when you prepare to leave for your real home, you will be overflowing, filled to the brim, saturated with joy. Then you will depart dancing, not crying. If death does not become a dance, know that life has gone to waste. If death is not an occasion of joy and celebration, know that your life was ill-spent, because you are returning home; and if going home is not a matter of celebration, then your whole life adds up only to sorrow.

Your suffering exists only because you are trying to steer your life without God. Having set Him aside, you have trusted yourself too much and taken yourself to be too clever; there is no other reason for your unhappiness.

To whom complain, and about what? He gave when He pleased; He took away when He pleased. You have no hand in it; all is His.

When a person begins to perceive correctly, knowing that He is in everything, he is filled with thanksgiving; he accepts all things equally. Then joy is no longer joy; sorrow is no longer sorrow; the dividing line is lost. (…) Attachment to joy and rejection of suffering is broken and he stands apart, free from both. Having arrived at the attitude of the witness, you shall be rid of sorrow and carry home joy.

Gur means technique, method. He who gives the method is the guru.

If you see Him in everything, the structure of your life will begin to crumble from all sides. The house you have built stands against all He signifies, because you built it when you had forgotten Him. If now you begin to remember Him, the house cannot remain. One thing however is certain: though you cannot see it today, you will get a bigger house. (…) Remember Kabir: Only he who is prepared to burn his house, he alone need walk with me.

It is only by dying completely within that the new birth takes place. In the process of birth, you have to go through the burning grounds, and he who passes through the burning grounds knowingly, voluntarily, attains a new birth. This is not the birth of a new body; it is the unfolding of a new consciousness.

You are full of fear, and where there is fear, there cannot be connection with God. (…) your religions are only an expansion of your fears. Your so-called gods are concepts born of your own fears, and out of fear you have accepted them. (…) You can't even fool yourself, because you know very well that your faith is because of your fear; you are filled with internal doubts. You may bathe in the holy places and pray in the temple, church or gurudwara, but to no avail; unless the note of faith and trust arises within, you have not really called Him. Also, when you go out of fear, you are bound to ask for something; fear always begs; you are forever asking. (…) Where there are demands, doubt is lurking. (…) Your religion is the medicine of your fear. (…) God is your insurance policy. (…) Fear is the way of separation; love is the way of integration. (…) gratitude dispels all sign of doubt.

You will gain His pleasure only when you do not stand against Him. You will gain His pleasure only when you have completely dissolved yourself in Him, when your sense of being the doer is completely annihilated. (…) Right now, however, there is a constant strain within you: I am the doer… I am the doer… (…) Until now, you have been thinking only in terms of myself, mine. (…) For a religious person, He is the doer; for a nonreligious person, I am the doer. Everything happens through Him – this attitude endears you to Him, because this attitude is religion. You stand with your back towards Him by your own will. It is your sense of doing that turns you away from God. The moment you give up this attitude, you will stand face to face with Him, and all opposition ceases.

The more you say "I have done", the more you add to your sins. So sin relates not to the act but to the attitude. Any act performed in the attitude of non-doing cannot be sinful. But if your attitude is that of doing, all acts are sins. (…) In the Gita, this is exactly what Krishna exhorts Arjuna to do. He tells him to abandon all sense of being the doer, to do only what God is doing through you. Let His will be done; don't put yourself in between.

What is the scope of your vision? What is the strength of your understanding? What is your experience? How much consciousness do you have? Don't try to see with your small lamp of consciousness when it cannot see more than four feet ahead. (…) Be a medium only. (…) Give way to Him to act through you. He who becomes His implement becomes His beloved. (…) It makes no difference who you are, His love pours on everyone all the time; it is unconditional. (…) His love and benediction pour forever. (…) It is you who are unable to accept His love.

Understand that although everything in this world is attained through labor, love is not attained thus, nor is prayer, nor worship, nor faith, nor proximity to God – because actions make the ego stronger.

A direct opening to God can be dangerous, because you may not be able to contain Him. (…) You cannot have a direct relationship with Him; your eyes are not ready as yet. In order to look at the sun, you have to start with a lamp. Concentrating on the flame of the lamp, you go on to a bigger flame, then to a yet more powerful light. Only gradually do you concentrate on the sun itself, or else, with your ordinary sight, the sun will make you blind.

You come to the guru only when you are completely tired of yourself. If you still think yourself to be very intelligent, there is no point in coming to the guru, because you are still your own guru; you still believe in your own self. You still need to wander a bit more, bear more hardships, incur more pain through doubts and indecisions. It is no use coming when you are still raw. More pain and suffering are needed to ripen you. The day that you are completely fed up with yourself, then go to the guru. (…) The word sikh is a beautiful word, coined from the Sanskrit word for student. He who is ready to learn is a sikh. He who is ready to listen to the teachings is a sikh.

Love is the path that has to be trodden alone; it needs privacy, seclusion, solitude.

When Nanak speaks of bathing in the sacred rivers, it is an internal bath where the understanding becomes clear, where you think no longer, where the head is put aside.

There is a risk in every method, if you are not conscious and aware of it, ninety-nine times out of one hundred, you are bound to fall into the hazard. (…) Through remembrance, through remembering twenty-four hours of the day that I am, a new flowing element forms within. (…) Gurdjieff calls this element the crystallized self. (…) But there is a great danger in this method, as also in the method of Mahavira and in Patanjali's yoga. And that danger is that you connect this new element to your ego, (…) that you will be superimposing the ego over it. (…) There is a real hazard that you might then deny God. Then, having almost arrived, you will not arrive. Then you will almost have reached the other shore and turn back.

There is no need to go to the temple, since the house itself becomes a temple. If the most ordinary task is filled with His special dignity, no work of yours will be ordinary; it will be extraordinary. Wherever you bathe, there will be the Ganges. (…) Extraordinariness is to live with His remembrance. Accept losing everything, but not His remembrance. (…) Remembrance is the precious jewel; let anything else in life drop away, because you know it is not worth a penny.

Have you ever come across a person who is satisfied? Even after attaining wealth, is the millionaire ever contented? (…) Instead of an atmosphere of well-being and fulfillment around the so-called successful man of the world, the reverse is the case. The nearer you approach these people, the more you sense their wretchedness. Their begging bowl has become bigger – they ask for more, and yet more! (…) Infinite are their demands; they can never be filled, because the more they receive, the more they desire. (…) the ego refuses to turn back; it forever goads a person forward. Maybe the goal is still ahead. Who knows? Perhaps just a few steps more and we may reach. The ego spreads its net of hopes before you, drawing you further and further on, preventing you from turning back. You have come so far without acknowledging that you are on the wrong path; how can you do it now? So you cover your weakness and hide your faults and go on, as if some day you are sure to succeed.

After attaining all, there is no satisfaction. You can be satisfied only if He is pleased with you. (…) satisfaction has nothing to do with what you have. It has everything to do with your connections with the supreme law – not your worldly attainments, but your relationship with God. If you have established a relationship with Him, if you have succeeded in turning your face towards Him, having His grace, that decides whether you are fulfilled or not. This is the meaning of attaining favor in His eyes. (…) when you begin to see Him in everything, then you have found favor with Him. (…) Then, whatever you do, your eye is on Him.

None but God can bestow you with good qualities. To miss Him is to miss all. He is the target, the bull's eye, the only attainment.

It is difficult to hide love. (…) If you are in love, it will show in your face – in the way you walk, the way you talk; your eyes and everything about you will give news of it. Every pore of your body will be saturated with love, because love is a remembrance. (…) All disqualifications and shortcomings vanish, as soon as He is attained. Once He is attained – for what are you greedy? What is left for your wrath? Where is the sex? Where is the lust? Where is the desire? (…) After the ultimate nuptial, there is no more search for the Beloved.

The devotee is always thirsting for the Lord, as the lover is for the beloved. (…) All that is mine is to remember You; all else is Yours. (…) The only need in life is that He should fill your vessel for you not to remain a lonely wanderer in life, that He should be your friend and companion, or else you may seek Him in many places but find Him in none.

Mahavira says that there are some who must keep on performing sadhanas in order to arrive. This is necessary for those who are not adept at hearing, because if you can listen totally, then there is nothing more to be done to reach the other shore. (…) If you have attained truth, there is no further need to listen, but you have not attained truth, so it is incumbent on you to listen. (…) as soon as you learn the art of listening, you learn the art of becoming acquainted with life itself. And as you begin to acquire the knowledge of existence, you find that the same silence which you experience at the moment of shravana is the principle of all existence. (…) For those who have mastered the art of shravana, there is nothing more to know. (…) Then the void vibrates in you, and that is the basic resonance of existence.

Anything that synchronizes with your understanding cannot change you. It can only help to reinforce that understanding. Rather than transform you, it gives you yet more stones and cement to strengthen your foundations. (…) You hear only that which strengthens your mind. (…) Only when you set aside your entire way of thinking will you be able to understand.

Sleep is an escape from the repetitive talk that is going on internally. He alone is capable of listening who has broken this conversation within. And that is the art of shravana. (…) All gurus, all religions aim at one thing only: how to break the constant dialogue within. Whether we call it yoga or repetition of mantra, the aim is to break the constant internal flow of words in order to create an empty space within.

It is absolutely necessary to empty the mind patiently for six months, because all your life long, you have done nothing but to load it with thoughts. If you persist patiently and diligently, then only six months is enough; otherwise it might take six years, or six lives. (…) Many a time, it will happen that you will forget to be a witness; you will ride the horse once again and set out on your journey of thoughts, involved once again. (…) as soon as you become aware of this, get off the horse and let the words, the thoughts, go where they will without riding them. Just keep watching. (…) Through shravana alone, suffering and sin are destroyed. (…) All sins arise because of your identification with thoughts. Then the thoughts get hold of you so badly that you shake like a leaf in a storm. Thoughts have brought you nothing but unhappiness and suffering, but you are not even conscious enough to realize that all suffering coincides with thoughts, and bliss occurs only in the state of no-thoughts. (…) When sin is gone, suffering is gone (…) – that state is samadhi.

Bliss, ananda, is a flower that keeps on blooming. (…) When the void begins to crystallize in the heart and silence is born, the ripples of ananda rise and, having risen, keep spreading more and more.

Bliss is contagious. If your doors are open, bliss enters into you like a breath of wind from a person who has attained it. (…) Prepare to be empty and you will be filled, but as long as you are filled with yourself, you will remain empty. Empty yourself, and you will be filled with supreme energy. As you depart from one corner, God will enter from the other.

What is sin? What have you been doing in the past? You have identified totally with your thoughts, constantly turning them into actions, and this is sin. Stand away from your thoughts; actions will crumble; the doer will be lost; and all connection with the past will snap. Then you realize that the past was no more than a dream.

Eradicate one sin, and four new ones spring up. (…) The question is not of sin, but of the basis of sin, its very roots. (…) The art of eradicating is witnessing, and to witness means shravana. (…) Since ego is the name given to a collection of thoughts, shravana also means the ego-less state.

The scriptures are the evidence of the sages, but the authentic knowledge is attained only from within oneself, and not through their words. (…) Truth is an experience. (…) Patanjali should be read only later on, only for corroboration, to show that you are on the right path.

Thoughts are an addiction that has no answer. (…) A real answer can only be found in the no-thought state.

Meditation exists only where mind is not, where the internal dialogue is gone.

It is very difficult to attain knowledge, very easy to lose it; for the path is very subtle, and you can go astray any moment on the slightest excuse.

Your actual experience of death depends on what you are. Death is the statement, the test, of how you have lived.

All obstacles are within you and not outside of you. Obstacles are there because of your insensibility, and they cannot simply be removed. The only way is to awaken within; then all obstacles vanish.

As Buddha has said, "The dark house attracts the burglar." (…) You cannot deal with thieves individually, one by one. Who knows how many thieves, how many criminals lurk within darkness? The only way is to light a lamp. One single lamp lights the whole interior. (…) And once the house is lighted, once the lamp is burning, once awareness stands on guard, no obstacle or hindrance dare enter within you. (…) If there were only one hindrance, you could get rid of it, but they are infinite. (…) Destroy one, ten more will take its place. (…) you are enmeshed in endless entanglemnts. No matter how cautious you are, you keep adding fresh hindrances at every step. (…) Through meditation, through contemplation, through witnessing, all hindrances on the path are eradicated. (…) Awareness is the ultimate goal. (…) A person who practices self-denial and controls his every action must always be afraid, for within him, the imprisoned passions continue boiling.

There is a different kind of honor that does not depend on others; it is the respect that arises out of internal dignity. He dies with majesty who feels death to be the union with God. He departs with joy and celebration in his heart, being grateful to existence for the life granted to him. His air of thanksgiving for everything around is stamped on his face and in his every hair. (…) When death is no longer fearsome to you, you die with dignity; otherwise you cannot. For how can you be dignified when you weep and wail, entreat and beg?

The gateway is within you; the wandering is within you; the obstructions are within you; the paths are within you. When once the lamp is lit, you can see in both directions: what is truth and what is untruth. Under the light of the lamp, all desire is seen as untruth, and to follow desire is the mundane world. As the light burns within, you will see that desirelessness is truth and also the gateway to liberation. (…) You are tied down because of your desires. Desires are the chains that hold you. Each desire forms a fresh link in the chain, and God knows how long and intricate is your chain of desires. You desire and you enter the prison; you desire and you are tied down. And the more you desire, as you invariably do, the stronger become the shackles that bind you, and the thicker become your prison walls. (…) As soon as you awaken, your eyes are open completely and you see clearly. (…) Desirelessness is the door to salvation.

The world begins when the one is lost, and it is natural that the journey ends when the one is found again.

Dhyana, attention, is the one guru of the five senses. If you remain scattered among the five, you are misled, but if you catch hold of the one, you will arrive. (…) The most profound art of living is to attain mastery over your attention. (…) Existence is born in the act of perception. It fades when the attention is withdrawn. (…) Existence shifts with attention; it manifests only in the path of attention. Once you understand this, you become your own master. (…) Having discovered the Master within, (…) now you follow and do the bidding of the Master within. (…) On the superficial level, dhyana means attention; on the deeper level, dhyana refers to meditation. It is meditation that leads to the discovery of the Master within. There is nothing more profound, nothing deeper than meditation. (…) Meditation is the method, and God, paramatma, is at the completion of the experience, the knowledge. You may be able to say something about the path if you have traversed it, but nothing about the destination. (…) God is an experience; the ultimate experience. It is such an experience that you are absorbed in it completely, so lost that there is no one to return and speak about it.

If you are flowing towards God, the world will be lost to you, and it is for this reason that sages call the world maya, an illusion. (…) as awareness flows godward, the world fades from perception. And where awareness is not, existence or nonexistence of that place becomes irrelevant.

Religion is the basis of all life, of all existence. Without it, existence cannot hold together; the world would fall apart. It is the foundation on which stands the mansion of existence. (…) Religion is the foundation, the inner quality of nature, (…) its dharma. (…) Jesus often said: "If salt loses its quality of saltiness, how can you make it salty again?" There is no way. Anything that loses its intrinsic quality is no longer that thing; it was what it was because of its very nature, its quality. The sun is the sun because it gives light; fire is fire because it gives heat – and man is man because of meditation; that is his nature. The person who loses the quality to meditate is a person in name only. Though he still looks like a human being, he is actually an animal, because he lives like an animal. (…) A Buddha, a Kabir, a Nanak, these are proper human beings. But the bulk of humanity has fallen so low that we call such special people avatara, incarnates. Naturally, we do not look upon them as human beings, for then what are we? (…) to maintain that we are human beings, we have to create a special place for them, just a little above us. It solves our problem to call them godlike, or gods, and remain human beings ourselves. But we are not human beings.

When a person is deeply established in meditation, he becomes manushya, because consciousness and awareness as a higher state of mind is the nature of man. When you attain your own consciousness, you find that it is the portal to the consciousness of all of existence. So the only way for man to reach God is to discover the innermost basis of his own nature.

Unrest and turbulence follow in the wake of dissatisfaction, when I feel things are not happening as I would wish them to happen, that I am not as I should be, that I have not been given what I am worthy of receiving. (…) Your mind will concentrate on all that you do not have and see only insufficiency and misery.

The Lord is forever. It is I who exist at specific times and become nonexistent at others.

The complaints of all humanity manifested in the words of Jesus: "My God, why have you forsaken me?" (…) But Jesus pulled himself together: "Thy will be done, oh Lord, not mine." At that moment, the man faded and Christ was born. (…) You will also experience these moments. (…) But this in itself proves that you have not trusted Him wholly, or else you would have accepted totally. If your acceptance bears even a little hesitation within, it is not perfect acceptance. If you accept complainingly, your acceptance is incomplete. Your faith must be wholehearted – whatsoever He wishes. (…) The perfect devotee has no complaints; his confidence in Him is complete: "Thy will be done. Thy will is my will." The wave's desire cannot be different from the ocean.

The knowledge of non-truth is in itself freedom from it. (…) The moment of recognition of truth is also the first leap into experiencing it.

One can go astray either by choosing a wrong path or by remaining undecided about which right path to follow; in both cases you will fall into error.

Supreme surrender is the ultimate spiritual path, the highest practice of a devotee. (…) Nothing remains after this.

The one thing that you are not prepared to admit under any circumstances is that you are ignorant. (…) You admit the wrongness of your acts, but never the wrongness of the person behind it. (…) Remember, you will be purified only if you are prepared to be annihilated. (…) If you go to the gates of God as somebody, then even if you appear as a sannyasin, a renunciate, a wise man, whatever, you will fail. The gate opens only for those who are nothing, nobody, who have annihilated their selves totally. (…) When the ultimate love arises, there should remain no sign of you. (…) Remember the words of Jesus: "He who saves himself will be lost; he who loses himself will be saved."

He who considers himself to be something is unworthy before Him. The truth is, he never even reaches Him. Proud eyes are blind eyes. (…) Kabir has said that the guest arrives in the house of one who is empty. (…) You miss Him as long as you are filled with your own self. The day you empty yourself, He fills you.

Let your past actions be discharged peacefully. Accept them cheerfully and be contented. Remember, you are settling your accounts and do not create fresh links; then gradually your connection with the past is loosened and disintegrates.

Man is incompetent when he seeks through his intelligence. (…) To trust one's intelligence is the way of the ego. (…) The only condition to attain Him is that the I must drop.

Until you are completely exhausted and thoroughly frustrated, until your dejection is complete, you cannot let go of the ego. (…) Buddha came to the realization that there is nothing worth achieving either in the mundane or in the spiritual world. All is a sham; all the running about is meaningless; even liberation is useless.

Dreams stop when there is nothing left to be attained, for dreams follow on the heels of desires. (…) No desires, no dreams. (…) All activities leave. As soon as all effort ceases, grace descends. As soon as your hopes are shattered and all activities drop away and all struggling ends, the ego falls and the palm opens. (…) When the I-ness falls, He himself comes, and the I-ness persists as long as there is hope for attainment.

There are infinite waves on the surface of the ocean. If you do not concentrate on the ocean but get involved with the waves, you will keep wandering. For the waves will form and disintegrate endlessly; one wave will lead you to another, then another… and another. You will be like fragile little paper boat, jumping from one wave to another, drowning in one, then in another, suffering here, suffering there. You will not reach any destination, because the waves have no destination; there is no change. (…) You cannot rest in the waves. You can rest only where all waves become tranquil. There you attain that which never changes. Do you realize that the more changes there are in your life, the greater is your restlessness? This explains so much of the agitation in the world today, because there is constant change. (…) Nothing is the same on two consecutive days. In the West, the change is reaching a frightening pace. (…) Remember, if you keep floating with the waves, you are a worldly person. If you begin to search for the ocean within the waves, by and by you become a sannyasin. To seek the eternal in the changing is sannyas. To grasp the unchanging within the changing is the art of sannyas. That alone is religion.

Man is absolutely without intelligence. He gets himself caught in the web of his desires and then wanders about within them. (…) If man's desires are fulfilled, man finds himself in as much difficulty as when they are unfulfilled. (…) Only he who desires God never repents; whatever else you ask for ends in regret.

Surati involves a continuous remembrance, like the threads in the beads. Do everything that the world demands of you, but let your mind stay always with Him. (…) no purpose is served by running away from the world. (…) Let life go on outside as usual, but within let there be only He. Keep your relationship with Him always fresh and alive. (…) There is only one wretchedness – to forget God. There is only one wealth – to attain His remembrance. He whose surati awakens has acquired all that is worth acquiring, achieved all that is worth achieving. (…) Life is transformed the moment surati awakens.

He who takes shelter in Him who is indestructible cannot be destroyed.

All our efforts prove futile, and only after trying totally can we realize our incompetence.

As long as you feel you have known God, you are under an illusion – you err.

Energy is neutral, impartial; God is absolutely impartial, unbiased. If you use the energy well, you can attain the highest experience; use it ill, and you can fall into life's deepest abyss.

The realities of life can only be known actively; you must enter into these realities.

Whoever has known Him has called Him sachchidanand – truth, consciousness, and bliss.

Maya is God's festivity.

To be silent is the art of establishing contact. Only silence is the way.

You have to return to God along the same path as God descended into creation.

The day truth dawns on you, you will stop wasting your energy in creating untruths; instead you will begin to utilize it to know truth. Samsari involves a person who is busy creating untruths. (…) Stand a little away and observe the falsity of your world.

Seek truth first. Do nothing before that. For whatever you do before that is bound to be false. Only one thing is worth doing: recognize truth. Then you may do anything. For once you know truth, it begins to act from within.

God alone should be your only purpose. When you are ready to renounce all else, when your goal is His attainment, only then is the concentration enough.

The first step is His remembrance, and the second step is letting go of everything – but only after doing everything, remember! (…) You strive and you strive and you strive, then the moment comes when you fall down exhausted. (…) No sooner do you become helpless than the fountain of the supreme strength begins to flow for you. As long as you rely on your own strength and give it importance, your power is not worth a penny. (…) Don't be a beggar; do not save yourself; the full energy of God is at your service.

He who takes life to be the goal wanders. Life is only an opportunity and not the goal; (…) we have to reach somewhere by way of it. (…) He who makes it his home denies himself the authentic home. (…) Samsara is not a home. Those who make a home of it, we call householders. (…) For a sannyasin, the world is a dharmashala, a rest-house where he tarries for a while, and then moves ahead. (…) A sannyasin has somewhere else to go, and he never forgets his destination – this is surati, remembrance. (…) A sannyasin will stay in the world and out of it.

A religious man has a deep sense of dissatisfaction with himself; (…) a religious person is critical of his own self. (…) deep down, nobody loves his own self. You are not fit to love your own self, and that is why people are afraid to be alone.

You desire God, but you have no throne befitting Him.

The world is a marketplace filled with crowds and people. (…) You have nothing to do with anyone, nor has anyone anything to do with you. As each one is playing his own game, you are bound to bump into one another at times. It is inevitable with so much traffic on the road. There is no need for you to get upset about it. (…) Note that almost everyone is asleep and dismiss the incident.

Most of the things you have collected are useless. Get rid of them. It is space that makes a house.

As you ripen, the music of life begins to change so that you can begin to hear the internal sound.

The art of knowing the most intrinsic discipline of the supreme law of life is called dharma, religion.

Religion is not wisdom, nor a decision of your intellect. Religion is a quest by a man who is tired of his intelligence, who is harassed by it, who has tried every direction and finds himself a helpless failure in the end. Such a man lets go of his intelligence and says, "Your will, not mine, O Lord! Take me where you will." This Nanak refers to as divine order.

The day you begin to recognize the law, you will have found the door. As long as you are oblivious of the rule, you will keep knocking your head against the wall. (…) No one is punishing you; you are reaping your own harvest. (…) Suffering and sorrow turn you back to God.

To come back, to retrace your steps, is called knowledge. Every man will have to come back. (…) Wandering requires a little intelligence, (…) but then to come back to the path, you need more awareness.

The ignorant man swaggers about in arrogance. Without modesty, the ignorant are totally unaware of the ignorance that fills them. An ignorant person struts about as a wise man. (…) Only the wise man knows how vast his ignorance is. He feels: "What do I know? Hardly anything."

Man finds ways and means to support his exaggeration. And on this stands his greatest exaggeration – that I am. It is the biggest lie in this world. If the existence of God is the greatest truth, the existence of I is the greatest lie. (…) Existence is one. (…) But each man, each individual person constantly proclaims "I am".

You become wise only by going deeper into the question.

The cycle of death and birth is God's request to you to sing properly.

Whenever you grasp hold of something, even your friend will seem an enemy.

He gives you license to wander, for if you do not wander, how will you gain experience?

Self-restraint means giving direction to life, giving it vision and a goal. A man without restraint runs in all directions, not knowing where to go or what to attain; he has no aim, no goal in life. He is like a blind man shooting an arrow. A life of restraint is one in which a person is well aware of his goal; he knows exactly where to let his arrow fly. An arrow that is let fly haphazardly cannot possibly hit its target. No power is attained without restraint and moderation. (…) Once you decide upon a goal, then you have to let go of everything that does not further your goal. If you want to achieve one thing, you have to let go of a thousand others. He who tries to attain everything ends up with nothing; you have to make a choice.

The mind is fragmented, so never trust it. (…) This is your internal state: your mind travels in a thousand directions, (…) tearing you into fragments. (…) the mind is broken into a thousand pieces, with each piece going its separate way. (…) when consciousness is cut off and mind falls into fragments, man becomes incomplete. (…) Unless and until you become an integrated whole, you are not fit to be offered at the feet of God.

Do not listen to your mind; (…) heed the witness within. (…) Let remembrance become your goal, then you will gain the ability to throw off the fragments that besieged your mind. To practice self-restraint involves the ability to leave the chaff for the wheat, to let go of the useless and worthless in favor of the useful and worthwile.

Always remember: truth is only one, not many. (…) Only the one is worth attaining; the untold others are only worth discarding.

Everybody passes through pain and suffering, be he in the world or a sannyasin. The worldly man weeps and wails and misses. He who passes through suffering with full awareness, with the attitude of acceptance, makes his suffering a stepping stone and goes beyond suffering. To practice restraint is to accept the suffering as the spiritual path. One should not be vanquished by it, but on the contrary, make it a stepping stone and rise above it. Therefore, it is like a furnace. (…) When gold is thrown into the furnace, one has to exercise great patience. He who is impatient fails. (…) He who recognizes suffering as a friend is in no hurry. He can maintain his patience, and God is attained only through patience – infinite patience.

God is consistently near you. (…) No one is high, no one is low in his eyes; no one is worthy, no one is unworthy. If you are unworthy, you are the cause of your unworthiness. Bring about a little change within yourself, and you shall become worthy. For there is only one difference between you and the worthy: the worthy person stands facing towards God, while the unworthy stands with their backs to Him.

There are four types of people in the world: the wise, the seeker, the ignorant, the idiot.

Anger is poison; forgiveness is ambrosia. (…) Deviousness is poison; innocence is nectar. (…) Hardheartedness is poison; compassion is nectar. (…) Discontent is poison; contentment is nectar.

Enlightenment is our inherent nature. Wisdom is our inner nature. Godliness is our way of being. It is our center. It is the fragrance of our life, our being.

Life is a game. Don't take it as more than a game. Take it as more than a game, and immediately you are in trouble.

A seeker's sex is burnt when he doesn't allow his bliss to move downwards, but channels it upwards. (…) He starts raising upwards that energy which naturally flows downwards. (…) Three words have to be understood. One is sex: sex is pleasure moving downwards. The second word is love: love is pleasure stuck in the middle, neither going downwards nor upwards. And the third word is prayer: prayer is pleasure moving upwards. (…) The energy is the same.

When the pendulum of a clock is going to the left, remember that it is gathering momentum to go to the right. One who has a subtle vision will be able to see this. One who goes into extreme indulgence will one day go into extreme yoga. (…) One has completely indulged; one has done completely whatever is possible in the world. Now there is no way to move further there, no way to satisfy the ego. There isn't any more for the ego to demand, so the pendulum must go back in the opposite direction. When the pendulum of a clock goes all the way to the right, it must return towards the left.

Beingness means the mind is clear, calm, the waves of desire no longer flowing.

Sannyas is a means of becoming free of the crowd.

Only through satsang is there an emergence of centering, of sanyam.

One who has known himself has become the Ultimate. What he knows, he becomes.

Only those will start on a journey of yoga, of union, who are completely clear that it is not possible to attain happiness here. (…) No one can ever attain happiness on the outward journey. (…) The further you go from yourself, the more you become opposed to your nature. And to dissolve in your nature is happiness.

Do not go against this body; don't start torturing it, otherwise you will not be able to understand.

Trust is the inner eye. (…) Trust is the culmination of love. (…) Trust awakens from what has already happened. (…) Love falls towards the ground; trust rises towards the sky.

Music is the easiest method of meditation. Whoever can let himself dissolve into music has no need to seek anything else to dissolve into. (…) Music is the ultimate wine. Dissolving deeper and deeper into it, your thoughts will go, your ego will go. Understand music as meditation.

Krishna makes every side, every facet of his life divine; with him every direction of life becomes sacred. (…) Krishna accepts life in all its facets, in all its climates and colors. He does not choose; he accepts life unconditionally. He does not shun love; being a man, he does not run away from women. As one who has known and experienced God, he alone does not turn his face from war. He is full of love and compassion, and yet he has the courage to accept and fight a war. His heart is utterly non-violent, yet he plunges into the fire and fury of violence when it becomes unavoidable. He accepts the nectar, and yet he is not afraid of poison. (…) Krishna accepts the duality, the dialectics of life altogether, and therefore transcends duality. (…) What we call transcendence is not possible so long as you are in conflict, so long as you choose one part and reject the other. Transcendence is only possible when you choicelessly accept both parts together, when you accept the Whole.

Krishna's life is free, limitlessly free. Krishna's life accepts no limitations. It is not bound by any rules of conduct; it is unlimited and vast. (…) There are no limits he cannot transcend. And this freedom, this vastness of Krishna, stems from his experience of self-knowledge. It is the ultimate fruit of his enlightenment.

Spirituality rejects both violence and non-violence. It accepts the immortality of the soul. And such spirituality turns even war into play. Spirituality, or religion, accepts, and unreservedly accepts, all the dimensions of life, everything there is to life.

Krishna symbolizes acceptance of the opposites together. And he alone can be whole who accepts the contradictions together. One who chooses will always be incomplete, less than the Whole, because the part he chooses will continue to delude him, and the part he denies will continue to pursue and haunt him. (…) The mind of the man who rejects and represses becomes obsessed with that which he rejects or represses. (…) He who accepts and lives life in its totality, he who lives wholly attains to life's wholeness. And he alone is holy who is whole.

Whatsoever you are, you are. Accept it; don't desire for it to be otherwise. This is what non-ambition means. (…) Remember, you cannot be ambitious in the present moment. It is impossible.

The way is not known. It cannot be made known to you by others; it cannot be given. The way cannot be shown; it cannot be transferred. You have to seek it.

If you have really experienced the inner light, sex will disappear. (…) There will be no desire for sex.

If the inner changes, the outer must change, but the reverse is not true.

The wisdom of the ages says, “Use all your energy. Create harmony within you.” (…) Everything can be used in such a way that even poison becomes a medicine. Wisdom will never discard anything; it will use it in a creative way. (…) Every energy has to be used wisely; nothing is to be discarded.

The flowering of your being will happen only when real silence has happened to you, never before. You cannot force the flower to open; it opens by itself. (…) Be with your troubles and move through them. Don’t leave them; don’t escape from them. A moment will come when you have gone beyond them, but that moment always comes from passing through them. Pass through the storm, and a real silence will come. Then your being will flower, not till then. (…) Jesus says, Love thy enemies as thyself. (…) Experience the enemy in its totality, with your totality, so that you can transcend it. (…) The storm is the soil; without it the flower cannot bloom.

Unless you experience, you have not known. Unless you experience, there cannot be faith. Before you have experienced, all belief is false; all certainty is just façade; all knowledge is just information and nothing else. (…) Knowledge comes only through your own experience. Insist on your own experience. (…) Ask for the real. (…) Those that ask, shall have.

Your own innermost center is your real Master. Outer Masters can help, but their help is basically directed toward finding the inner Master. And when the inner one is found, there is no need for the outer Master. You have become a Master in your own right.

Existence is always the same. You go on changing, and your mind goes on being projected. Existence works as a mirror. You are mirrored in it.

You cannot hear the whole of the music suddenly. You can hear it only in fragments, because the mind is such a small thing.

Leave life; transcend it. Move to some other life which is beyond this life.

If you move deeper in the dance, you will reach the dancer. The dance is just the form.

Not until the bonds of personality are loosed, can that profound mystery of the self begin to be seen. Not till you stand aside from it will it in any way reveal itself to your understanding. Then, and not till then, can you grasp and guide it. Then, and not till then, can you use all its powers, and devote them to a worthy service.

The more inward you move, the less and less you become. When you reach to the innermost center, you are no more; the old man is dead. (…) you have reached that which never changes.

Emptiness always drives people insane. You need some grounding; you need some centering; you need some relationship with existence. (…) A tree cannot live without roots, nor can you.

Consolation is opium. (…) Every wound has to be healed, not covered.

Anybody who gives you a belief system is your enemy, because the belief system becomes the barrier for your eyes; you cannot see the truth. The very desire to find the truth disappears.

Eternal rest is nirvana; eternal rest is moksha; eternal rest is liberation; eternal rest is samadhi, truth, enlightenment – different names for the same experience.

The man who has no belief system, but has encountered truth itself, suddenly finds himself changing into a new man. There is no effort involved. Grace comes by itself; compassion comes by itself; violence disappears; fear disappears; death and birth disappear. One starts feeling at home with the universe. There is no tension; one is absolutely relaxed. This is our home. One stops searching and seeking; one starts living, dancing, loving. Knowing one's own innermost center is also knowing the center of the universe. Doors of all the mysteries open; you become more mysterious. (…) And because you experience this festivity within you, it starts overflowing.

Authentic religion does not need any God, does not need any priest, does not need any prayer. All that it needs is an authentic exploration of your inner world. That exploration I call Zen.

Continuously go on remembering that the world that you are in is a momentary phenomenon. It is just a dewdrop on a grass leaf. Any moment, a breeze passes by and the drop slips and is gone forever.

Within and without is a division of the mind. (…) In self-awareness, there is no within and no without. (…) In self-awareness, the within and the without have disappeared. There exists only one.

Personality is your circumference, not your center. (…) Personality is not individual; it is social. (…) Personality is a learned thing; it is false. (…) The whole society depends on personality.

Mind moves from one polarity to another.

Once the ego is dropped, suddenly you are one and whole and flowing.

One has to become a clean slate, a tabula rasa – one has to become utterly clean. Only when you are utterly clean, when nothing is written on you, can God write something. (…) Truth can whisper its mysteries into your ears only when you are absolutely empty – emptiness is purity. (…) Purification is a purgative part; then perfection stands of its own accord. (…) only if you are totally desirous of truth, then you will be ready to go through the pains of purification. If the desire is lukewarm, you will not be ready to go through the pains of purification. (…) One can only be ready to go through purification if the desire is so total that one is ready even to die, if that is what is needed.

Life is worthless for a seeker; everything is worthless – except truth.

Sannyas means seeing how you are caught in prisons, why you are caught in prisons. And the very seeing is enough.

The real Master's work is to become gradually useless for the disciple.

Burn the mind that clings to something; burn the mind that wants to depend on something; burn the mind that avoids responsibility; burn the mind that seeks the dead, that is obsessed with fixed things and afraid of free flow.

The crowd is untruth; truth is always individual. (…) That's how the mind of the crowd functions; it always goes for the non-essential, for the meaningless.

Unless awareness becomes a part of your very texture, unless awareness goes so deep that even while you are asleep you are aware, it is not of much use. (…) Ordinarily people look alert and are asleep. (…) Sleep has to be broken. (…) A man is called aware when he can fall asleep and still remain transparently alert deep down. (…) Only then a man has attained to jikr, remembrance.

A constant procession of thoughts in your mind makes you blind. You cannot see beyond them. They create a fog. You become clouded. It is just like dust gathered on a mirror; then the mirror cannot reflect that which is. The dust will distort. The dust has to be wiped off, washed; the mirror has to be made clean – then it reflects.

The psychotherapist is the plumber of the mind. (…) They do good work; they know what they are doing – but remember, a plumber is a plumber. (…) A therapist is a man like you, but he has a certain expertise. He can help you so far. (…) A Master is qualitatively different – a Master has being; he simply is. (…) The therapist keeps the person in the mind; the Master helps the disciple to go beyond the mind. Their functions are almost contrary. (…) To adjust you to this society is to adjust you to great sickness. This society is mad; it is neurotic. And all your psychotherapists are in the service of this neurotic society. (…) They are the modern version of the priest. (…) the priest was enforcing a certain kind of society on people, in the name of God. (…) Without the priest, the politician cannot function, so the priest had to come back with a new name. The psychotherapist is the new priest, and they are serving old purposes – old wine in new bottles. The Master has always been against the priest, and the Master is going to remain against all kinds of priests, whatsoever their name.

Religious truth is not a thing. It is a significance; it is a meaning. Each one has to discover it; each one has to go on the exploration. (…) There is no way of transferring it. (…) Knowledge can only give you a false promise. (…) Before man can become a man of knowing, he will have to drop all knowledge. (…)

Conditioning has to be dropped. (…) That is the real renunciation. (…) God can come only through knowing, not through knowledge. (…) Thinking can destroy belief, but it cannot lead you into truth.

A Master has to hit you, so that you can become alert and awake. (…) You have to be shocked into wakefulness.

First a man has to seek, and then he has to surrender his seeking too, because in the seeking the seeker goes on existing.

Religion is the science of the inner, and science is the religion of the outer.

Philosophy is inconclusive, an endless game, pure speculation.

Man has three layers: first, the body; second, the mind; third, the soul. (…) Mind is nothing but a bridge between body and soul; in itself, it has no value. (…) Mind is where soul and body overlap. (…) When you are totally in your body, mind disappears; when you are totally in the soul, mind disappears. (…) Mind is maya, illusion. (…) You don't live in reality; (…) you live in a mind world.

The mind continues to be contradictory, because that's its trick to survive. And that is its way to keep you always discontented, always frustrated.

Nobody can be independent, and nobody can be dependent. Independence and dependence are both aspects of the same coin called ego. A real person simply does not exist as a person. (…) The ego is a ghost; it is utterly unreal.

Division is false. (…) Don't think yourself separate.

Become more relaxed; don't force. (…) Anything brought by will-power is going to be wrong. (…) In acceptance, relaxation happens. And awareness is nothing but the fragrance of relaxation. It is the flowering of let-go.

Come to the root cause of suffering and understand the root cause. (…) You are suffering from desire, but you think that you are suffering from things. (…) Not at all. You are suffering only from one thing: desire. (…) Look into desire. Meditate on desire. See it as deeply as possible. Penetrate to the very core of it. In that very penetration, there comes a renunciation which is not of your making, which is a gift.

Man constantly wants to fall back into unconsciousness, but cannot. (…) one has to grow, grow in consciousness. That is the only growth. (…) To fill your whole being with light and awareness – that's what growth is.

Whatsoever you have learnt is always transferred to the robot. Then the robot does it, and you are free to learn something else. This is perfectly okay in ordinary life, but slowly, slowly, the robot becomes bigger and bigger, and your consciousness remains tiny. The work that one has to do upon oneself consists in taking back from the robot, de-automatizing processes. And if you de-automatize any process, great awareness is released.

When a man is really conscious, all desires disappear just as dewdrops disappear when in the morning the sun rises.

All knowledge is false. (…) Knowledge means that the knower is separate from the known. (…) Knowledge is divorce. (…) Love understands; knowledge only pretends.

The Master is needed only to take away all that is unnecessarily around you – the hindrances, the barriers. The Master will give you your real being by taking all that is unreal in you. When you surrender to a Master, you surrender only the unreal, because you have only the unreal.

A mystical 'experience' is not an experience at all. (…) An experience is always outside of you. (…) the seer remains always outside the seen; the observer remains outside the observed; the experiencer remains outside the experienced. (…) In the mystical experience, there is no division at all. (…) The mystical experience is such that you are involved with your totality; (…) it pulsates with your totality. (…) Liberation does not happen to you; you become liberation. (…) One does not see God; one becomes God.

Habits are formed; alertness is lost. The man of rituals lives through habits.

Trust arises on the path of meditation at the last stage. Trust arises only when you are arriving home. When the arrival is so close and when you are almost approaching, and you can see the door and you can see the house and you can see that you have reached, then trust arises – you say, "yes". But on the path of love, trust is asked on the first step. (…) Here you surrender, and not even a split second is lost and you have arrived.

If you are to love, then love something of the Divine, something that transcends things, something that transcends forms, something for which you will have to raise your eyes to the sky. (…) be very cautious about your object of love, (…) because your love is your destiny. (…) Love something of the Divine, and you will find your way.

Thinking is the absence of understanding. You think because you don't understand. When understanding arises, thinking disappears. It is like a blind man groping for the way; when eyes are there, you don't grope for the way; you see it.

Beware of the mind's consolations. Consolations will only postpone; they can never be fulfilling. Seek reality, because only reality can fulfill.

Faith is dangerous, never cheap. You will have to put your whole life at stake. It needs courage, but only courageous people can be religious.

For us, life is a flux; everything is changing. (…) Our inability to see the real, the eternal, creates a flux-like phenomenon all around us. It is our flickering consciousness. Have you watched sometimes in a dark room? – a small candle burns, and it goes on flickering. Because of its flickering, the whole room seems to be moving, waving, changing. If the flame is constant, the room stops changing – it becomes constant. Our consciousness creates the mirage, the illusion, the dream-like world that surrounds us. This has to be understood very deeply, because this is the very base of all essential religions. (…) Attain to inner integrity, attain to inner crystallization, and suddenly all flux-like phenomena disappear, and suddenly you are face to face with the real, the substantial, the permanent.

The mind cannot be constant. Even for a few seconds, the mind cannot be constant. Your mind will slip somewhere else: some memory, some imagination, some work that is incomplete, some worry, some plan; you must go somewhere. (…) If mind is there, there is going to remain the flickering. (…) Mind cannot be stable, so all efforts to make mind stable are impossible. That is not the nature of the mind. The only way to be stable is to drop the whole mind as such. (…) Then in all the forms, the formless is revealed. (…) When the false is dropped, reality is revealed. There is no other way to seek reality. One has to drop the very mechanism that creates falseness.

People who are struggling with their mind are fighting a losing battle. They are not ever going to be victorious.

You sit in a movie house, you see a thousand and one things passing on the screen, and mind is a projector. (…) one has to find the projector hidden behind your back. Hidden deep in the unconscious is the projector: becoming, desiring. The constant desire to be somebody, to be someone, to be somewhere else, is the cause of the mind; then the mind continues. How to stop the mind? Be here-now. Accept that which you are. Drop all ideas of improvement, of bettering yourself, of achieving something. (…) Empty-handed we come, empty-handed we go, and in the meanwhile, empty-handed we remain. And if you think your hands are full, then you are befooling yourself. Then you are taking your dreams as real. Your hands may be full of dreams. (…) By being empty, by not holding anything, one goes beyond life and death. That is the meaning when Jesus says again and again, Lose yourself. (…) Those who are empty will be fulfilled, and those who are trying to fulfill themselves will remain empty. This is the paradox.

Where are you going? Some conditioning, from many lives of dreaming, desiring, has become your reality – what Hindus call samskar. You go on after it, not knowing why. It has become a habit. You cannot resist it; you are always on the move.

Happiness is when you are in tune with reality. Happiness is a harmony between you and the real. So if you are unhappy, remember, you must be going away from reality. Be aware that you must be somehow not falling in line with reality. There must be a conflict between you and the real, and of course, you cannot win against the real; there is no way. You have tried all the ways. The whole humanity has tried all the ways possible, but there is no way to win over reality and against reality. You have to follow reality; you have to come into a deep accordance with reality, in tune with it. You have to become a note in the great orchestra that reality is – not fighting but surrendering, submitting to it, ready to dissolve into it. That is what Bauls call love: the readiness to dissolve into reality, the readiness to merge, melt, the readiness to be one with reality. (…) You will disappear as a drop of water; (…) you will become the ocean.

Nothing is lost by losing yourself; everything is lost by resisting.

Your interpretation has to be dropped.

If you are on the periphery, you are capable of only looking at the periphery of life. And the periphery goes on changing. (…) The wheel moves, goes on moving, but at the center of the wheel, something remains permanent. On that permanent hub, the wheel moves. On that unmoving hub, the wheel's movement exists. (…) If you are at the center, you are capable of looking into the very center of life. (…) Once you touch your source of permanence, your eternity, you have touched the eternity of life also. (…) When awareness grows, the wheel moves slower and slower, because there is no point. (…) When awareness grows, dreaming stops, by and by; desires slow down. One day it happens: the wheel is as silent, as unmoving as the hub. That is the point when enlightenment happens.

The dreamer's mind is divided in two: witnessing and dreaming. Then you are not one; you are split. (…) Bring these fragments together. Any one thing, continuously followed, will help you to crystallize. (…) While you are simply witnessing, you are one. There is no duality in you. (…) meditators try to meditate continuously. They do a thousand and one things, but one thing continues as a current, as a thread underground. (…) They do many things, but they connect everything with meditation. That becomes their one-mindedness. (…) One simply goes deeper and deeper into the present, and that is the door of God. The present is the door, and your single-mindedness is the key.

Sex is the only energy that gives you hints that there is something which you cannot control. (…) This is my understanding: that people, if they have lived rightly, lovingly, naturally, then by the forty-second year, they start transcending sex. If they have not lived naturally, then things go ugly. (…) When you are young, you can repress something because you are very energetic. But by the time you are forty-two, when energies are going, declining, then sex will assert itself, and you will not be able to control it. (…) So, please be finished with it; don't wait for old age. Then everything goes out of season.

Unless you have lived your life, you cannot move into religion. Only one who lives his life truly, one day comes to the point where a new desire for life beyond arises.

The mind of one who is moving inwards, the man of being, is almost dissolving. The mind of the inward traveller is dissolving; you cannot predict him. (…) He has a direction, but no destination. (…) Destination is fixed by the mind; direction is earned by living.

The whole idea of renunciation is of a vision, of a great understanding, of looking into things in their reality. You need not escape from the world. You can remain in the world and become absolutely unattached.

Consciousness is divided by language. (…) Drop language. (…) Look directly into reality.

The mediocre mind is very afraid of discovery, and discovery is the greatest secret in life. (…) It is a non-ending process. Direction is a non-ending process, a non-ending movement.

A person can use his mind when working on matter; then logic is a great instrument. And the same person can put aside the mind when he moves into his meditation chamber and moves into no-mind. Because mind is not you – it is just an instrument, just like my hand, just like my legs. (…) One should become so capable that even the closest instrument of mind can be put aside and can be put off.

Accept this reality. (…) Accept it with totality. (…) Whatsoever comes in the moment, live it. (…) Life is possible only because of death; soul is possible only because of the body; the tree is possible only because of the roots. (…) Live when life is there; (…) die when death comes. Move with life, and move with death.

If the center is missing, you go on decorating the periphery.

All comes – you just create the capacity; all comes – you just allow it. Life is ready to happen to you.

Man is a quest, an eternal enquiry, a perennial question. The quest is for the energy that holds existence together. (…) God is an energy field.

A head-oriented man is cut off from the universe. He lives in the universe, but lives as if in a deep stupor. He lives in the universe, but lives as a tree that has lost its roots. (…) He has lost contact; he's unconnected. That's what alienation is. The modern man feels too alienated, feels too much an outsider, does not feel at home, at ease with life, existence, the world. He feels almost as if he has been thrown into it, and it is a curse rather than a blessing. (…) from the very childhood, we are being crippled. Our roots with the heart are cut. We are forced towards the head, and we are not allowed to move towards the heart.

Love is when God has found you. (…) Love is a radical change in your innermost core of being.

People live an unfruitful life; people live without fruition. Nothing is born out of them; they simply live and die. There is no meaning and no significance in their lives. (…) Significance arises only in the peak of consciousness. No other fruit will do. Otherwise, people live a fruitless life.

All that you can do is to allow. Let ripeness appear in its own time. It will come in its own time.

The life process is to rise on the stepping-stones of our dead selves to higher things.

Tandra is the first glimpse, the beginning of satori. Dreams disappear first. Then, in the next step, sleep disappears; and in the third step, what you call waking, that disappears. And when all three have disappeared, then arises what we call real waking. (…) In fact, to say 'be single-minded' is almost to say 'be without mind' – because the mind exists only in conflict. (…) Mind is many; single mind is no-mind.

Your real self is transcendental. What you call 'I' is not your real self. 'I' is imposed on reality. (…) The real self is one.

Lust is raw material – you are given raw material to work. (…) Lust is a raw, uncut diamond – it has to be polished; it has to be understood. (…) Love has to arise out of lust. If you avoid lust, you will be avoiding the whole possibility of love itself. Love is not lust, true; but love is not without lust, that too is true. (…) Without lust, there cannot be transcendence; you cannot attain to love. (…) Without love, nobody can transcend lust. Repressed, lust becomes more poisonous. It spreads into your whole system; it becomes toxic; it destroys you. (…) The whole energy which is repressed becomes a load and pulls you down. (…) With lust repressed, you lose all opportunities to fly in the sky. With lust transformed into love, you have passed the test of existence.

There is no undercurrent of meaning in life. Life is accidental; you are not created for any purpose.

One who dies in love never dies again. Then all deaths are finished for him.

Love has three possibilities: sex, the lowest; love, higher than sex; and prayer, the highest.

Immaturity means an immature man, an unconscious man; maturity gives man a direction.

Growth is towards disappearance.

Until you die, you will live a dead life. (…) Your life is nothing but a slow suicide, a slow death – spread over seventy, eighty years.

Knowledge is food for the ego; ignorance is death for the ego. And death of the ego is life for you; and life of the ego is death for you.

Because the majority of the people are also dead, a dead, established society fits. Once you become alive, once your life energy arises, you will suddenly feel that you fit with existence, but you don't fit with the society. (…) Sannyas means an effort to seek ways and means to be in harmony with the Whole, even if it creates a rift between you and your society. (…) One has to find his home in the Ultimate. And all societies are against God. (…) Religion is always beyond society.

You cannot force a phenomenon like enlightenment; you cannot manipulate it. You have to wait for it. It comes when it comes; it comes on its own.

In a certain phase of spiritual growth, you need teachings and all, and you need to be taught about the path; you have to be assured about it; you need many trainings. But a moment comes when one has to grow above them. First one has to learn many things, and then one has to throw it all into the dustbin; otherwise, that too can become a clinging.

Unless you die, you cannot love. Unless the ego disappears, the love cannot come to flower. (…) Die first as you are, so that the Divine can be born in you.

Watch your pretensions and drop them. This is what an honest, sincere, authentic man should be – true to himself. And whatsoever the price is, pay it; it has to be paid. (…) This is what a sannyasin should be: dropping all illusions, remaining true to his being, whatsoever it is.

With selflessness, love becomes unmotivated. It flows spontaneously for no reason at all. (…) When the self is absent, then everything becomes unselfish.

Whatsoever happens to you, it happens because of you. Outside causes are secondary; inside causes are primary. And unless you understand this, there is no possibility of transformation. (…) This is the difference, the basic difference, between a religious mind and a non-religious mind. (…) Causes are inside; outside are excuses. You can change the outside, but nothing will change if the inside remains the same. The inside will create, again and again, the same pattern whatsoever the situation, because man lives from the inner to the outer.

You are a repetition. And unless you stop this repetitiveness, there is no possibility of change. (…) With awareness, habits drop. Without awareness, it will be almost impossible. (…) Something or other will have to be done, unless you become aware. You become aware, then you feel the tension. Don't do anything. Once you become aware that there is tension, it is already relaxing.

Religion is not concerned with others; it is not a social phenomenon. (…) Religion is concerned with you, absolutely with you. (…) Religion is when you are so alone that there is nobody left to be met. (…) Always remember, you are here for yourself, for nobody else.

If you understand that religion is a device, then it will be clear to you that a device cannot be a device forever. I am creating many devices. They will be dead one day. Then they will have to be dropped. (…) The work is done. It is no longer needed. You have gone beyond it. Then don't carry it and don't get attached to it, because that attachment will be suicidal. (…) No device can be unlimited. It is devised by a certain man, devised for certain other men. It is meaningful only in a certain context. (…) If you carry it out of context, it will cripple you; it will become a poison.

Sufis say life is interrelated: everybody else's karma is my karma; and my karma is everybody else's karma. It is a net of interrelationships. (…) Everybody is just like a small pebble in the lake.

A man who is really free is beyond good and evil, sin and virtue. In fact, he is beyond all dichotomies, all dualities. He is both, and he is neither.

Morality is how to live with others; religion is how to live with oneself. Morality is how not to go wrong with others; religion is how not to go wrong with yourself. Religion is that which you do in your total loneliness, in your innermost shrine. (…) Religion is reuniting with your own source. (…) When the light comes from the center, it is beyond morality, good and bad; everything is dissolved. Simple light, superb in its own self, in its intrinsic value.

The word swami means the Master. Swa means the center of your being; and swami means one who has found it. Finding one's center is the beginning of a divine dimension – then all is peace; then flowers of peace go on blossoming, endlessly.

When you live a rich life of many experiences, good and bad, you attain to a certain understanding. (…) You have lived all, and when you live all, by and by, you rise above all. Through living, you come to understand that it is useless.

Only a beggar hankers for a palace; the man in the palace is already finished with the palace. (…) When you live life in its totality, you have to renounce it. Only those who have not lived rightly, who have not lived at all, or who have lived lukewarm and tepid lives, they cling. Clinging shows an ignorant mind which does not understand. Renunciation is simple; it is a natural outgrowth; it is a maturity. (…) You cannot renounce because you have lived a beggar's life.

Happiness and unhappiness are one, and if you go on desiring happiness, you will go on becoming unhappy.

Excitement is a burden on the heart. (…) It tires you; you cannot be happy for a long period, otherwise it will be too much for your body, for your mind, for your psychosomatic being.

A wise man need not throw himself into deep contemplation; he exists in it. He is deep contemplation.

It is impossible for men of knowledge, knowledgeable men, to conclude anything. (…) You have to rise to a certain consciousness; only then can you understand.

The more distance, the more awareness. The more awareness, the more distance. You become settled. You become a Buddha under the Bodhi Tree. But this will not happen to you until you die as you are.

The new is always there, but there is no space in you for it to come. The guest has come, but the host is not ready. Give space! Become more spacious within you. Create room, emptiness.

This, too, will pass. (…) Let it become a constant remembrance. (…) And that presence will transform you.

I look into you, and I don't see any other barrier than yourself. You are standing in your own way. And unless you understand it, nothing is possible towards inner growth. (…) Your barrier is you, and it will follow you like a shadow.

The ego is born through reflections. You see your reflection in the eyes of others, in the faces, in the words, and you go on accumulating those reflections. Not knowing who you are, you have to find an identity. (…) A child will really enter into the world when he starts feeling who he is. (…) If you go backwards, you will be able to remember up to the age of three, four; beyond that you will not be able to penetrate. (…) No identification has come up yet; who will carry the memory? (…) very soon, the child starts filing impressions in divisions. (…) A division has started. The conscious is that which you cherish and love – your beautiful image. And in the unconscious you go on throwing the ugly image. Division has entered the mind. This is the beginning of schizophrenia. (…) this has been my observation, that whatsoever your identity, whatsoever your ego, deep down there is confusion – because the condemned part is always there. In your foundations, it is always there, and you are always shaky and confused. (…) You are a chaos. Your ego is just a trick to hide the chaos, just a blanket word in which you can go on hiding everything. You are a madness within.

This is the first thing to be understood: that nobody can know himself through mirrors – because mirrors will interpret. (…) a mirror never shows who you are. A mirror simply says how he reacts to you. (…) everybody else around you, all the mirrors, reflect. They are reactions. They are not saying anything about you. (…) Ego is the accumulation of impressions, shadows, reflections. And with this ego, you live in hell. Unless you drop this ego, the possibility for heaven will always remain closed. (…) And right now, you cannot drop it, because the dropper will be the same: the ego. (…) And you will collect the reflection that you are the most egoless person, that you are so beautiful, so humble, so simple, that you don't have any ego. And you go on collecting. (…) You cannot drop the ego; you can only understand. (…) You have to understand how you have accumulated your self-identity, how you have gathered your self-image. And this self-image is confusing, because you have gathered it from many divergent sources – so you are always a crowd; you don't have unity. These impressions can't have unity. (…) One has to move withinwards; one has to drop all the mirrors. (…) Once you understand that the ego is false and a crowd, the crowd disappears and the falsity drops. (…) You bring understanding, there is light, and the ego disappears. And when the ego disappears, for the first time you have become a unitary being. (…) And to me, to be whole in anything is to be meditative. (…) You become one. Now whatsoever you do, you are totally in it. (…) Only in that state do you for the first time become aware of who you are. Before that, all identities are false. You have come to yourself directly.

A man who is ready to learn can learn from anywhere. A man who is not ready to learn cannot learn even from a Buddha. It depends on you.

Be watchful. Through being watchful, by and by, the ego will die, because ego is created by a non-watchful mind, a non-alert mind. Through watching, witnessing, the ego dies. And nothing is possible until you die.

Unless you are right, whatsoever you do, say, be, is going to be wrong.

Religion is a revolution, not a conformity. (…) It is a conversion of your total being. (…) for the first time, your inner light shines. You start rising in a different dimension.

Religion is a personal search. It is not part of society.

A religious man does not belong to any sect. (…) Through rituals, temples, ideologies, the ego is strengthened.

Nobody is born in religion. (…) Religion is born in you.

Religious consciousness means you have dropped all that is man-made: doctrines, dogmas, churches, words, language, prayers, forms, rituals. (…) Then in that silence, God Himself becomes part of you. (…) Until you die, nothing is possible.

A student is one who is enquiring about God, not desiring God; who has come to know, not to be; whose search is intellectual, not total.

The more you understand, the more life will become mysterious. (…) The more you know, the more you feel the unknown surrounds you from everywhere. (…) And out of vast ignorance, a light arises, enlightenment arises.

When you become a Christian, you are a coward; when you become a Mohammedan, you are a coward; when you become a Hindu, you are a coward. When you become religious, you are tremendously courageous – you are going for an adventure; you are seeking the unknown; you are moving into the uncharted, the unmeasured, the unmeasurable. There is every danger you may be lost; there is every danger you may not be able to come back; there is every danger that you will lose all control; you may go mad. That's the price one has to pay for real religion. (…) People are afraid, so they cling to false substitutes. Christianity, Hinduism, Islam – these are false substitutes, cheap, very easily available. (…) these labels become pathological: you will pretend; you will become a hypocrite; you will become a false entity. (…) imitated religion, borrowed religion creates pathology, a neurotic world. Realized by oneself, religion gives you tremendous health, well-being, celebration of life, joy, benediction.

Your so-called religions don't allow you any peak. They cripple you; they paralyze you; they cut you short. They only allow you a minimum of life. That's what renunciation means: live at the minimum. Only the basic needs have to be fulfilled. (…) A real religion will make you open as the sky. A real religion is bound to be affirmative. (…) You will say 'yes' to life, and you will say 'yes' totally. (…) If your religion is just a conditioning, then it will be life-negative. You will be afraid of living; you will feel guilty; you will always be confused about what to do and what not to do. (…) Borrowed religion never goes beyond morality. Authentic religion is amoral; it is always beyond morality, good and bad. It knows no distinctions.

Religion, if it is going to be at all significant, has to be a continuity in you. Eating, you should be prayerful; walking, you should be prayerful; talking, you should be prayerful; listening, you should be prayerful; sleeping, you should be prayerful. Let prayer spread in each of your activities.

Changing the circumstance is a deception of the mind. It is not going to help. Change your consciousness.

To transcend contradictions is to transcend mind, and to transcend mind is to know what love is. (…) Love knows no object; love is not addressed. Love is only of God. (…) Love is never of the part; love is only of the Whole. Love is almost synonymous with prayer.

Enlightenment can never have a technology; by its very nature, it is impossible.

Man's quest for truth is eternal. (…) Man's very being is a search for truth.

Man is a bridge. You cannot rest while you are a man; you have to go.

All persons don't have souls. By your birth, you have not got a soul – very significant, very meaningful. One has to become a soul; one has to integrate this crowd inside, these selves fighting with each other.

Wisdom is always timeless; it has nothing to do with your life experience. (…) And remember, it is always wisdom which is crucified on the cross, because the knowledgeable people cannot tolerate it. It offends; it is offensive. (…) Wisdom is your innermost nature; it cannot be given to you.

Truth is not an experience; it is beyond experience. Consciousness without content is what truth is; when all experiences disappear, and only the experiencer is left in pure consciousness…

The mass lives in a very dark way; it lives in the jungle. Only very few people escape from the jungle and enter into the forest, and only very few of those who enter the forest ever enter into the garden. Many more become attached to the forest, and they remain there. Let it be this way: only one person in one million ever escapes from the jungle and reaches to the forest. Out of one million in the forest, one escapes from the forest and reaches to the garden. And out of one million in the garden, one escapes from the garden and reaches into the home. That has been the proportion up to now, and this is going to be the proportion. Religion is only for the few. It hurts, because you would like religion to be for everybody. But I cannot help it. If music cannot be for everybody, and painting cannot be for everybody, and dancing cannot be for everybody, then – excuse me, I cannot help it – religion too cannot be for everybody. And in a communist world, religion becomes impossible, because they don't allow individuality; they don't allow freedom; they don't allow any person to be different from the mass. (…) In a communist world, a religious person cannot exist; he is not allowed. A communist world believes in the society, in the absolute domination of the society. The individual is thought to be a danger. Anybody trying to be an individual is looked at as the enemy. (…) Religion is an individual flowering. Religion can exist only in an individualistic society where freedom is allowed, where freedom to be oneself is allowed, where nobody interferes with you, where you are left alone to yourself, where you can do anything that you want to do with yourself. The society interferes only when you start interfering with other people's lives, otherwise not. (…) This is possible only in a democratic country; this is possible only in a capitalist country.

Life is very short. (…) Use the opportunity that is available to you, and use it as much as you can. Let your inner flame burn bright.

Truth is a challenge, the greatest challenge there is. It is a challenge to enquire; it is a challenge to seek; and it is a challenge to be. (…) it is something that you have to become. (…) The challenge of truth is the challenge of your own innermost core, the challenge to come home, the challenge to come back to the center, the challenge to recognize yourself, the challenge to know, to encounter yourself. It is arduous; to face oneself is arduous, because we have staked too much ignorance; self-knowledge becomes very, very difficult. (…) Hence, many are called, but very few arrive.

The journey is arduous. It is going to be difficult; it is very inconvenient to go into the unknown, because you have to move away from your securities, away from your comforts, away from all that you have belonged to up to now – your identities. But only when you move away from yourself do you come to know yourself. Because that which you think yourself to be right now is not your real nature. It is a deception that you have managed; it is a hallucination.

A million seeds are produced so that one seed can become an oak. Millions of people are born so that one person can become a Christ or a Buddha or a Krishna. Remember this law of the seeds.

Don't claim knowledge, because knowledge is illusory. (…) Only ignorant people think they know; the wise people know that they don't know.

The moment you give a name to something, you have created the world as dual; you have brought a dualism; you have brought a subtle schizophrenia into the world.

A man has to be a synthesis of will and surrender. A man has to grow his will-power, his ego, first; (…) the ego has to be strengthened, made very integrated. And after the thirty-fifth year, one has to learn relaxing, dropping the ego, and becoming more and more surrendered to the Divine. (…) First, sharpen your intelligence, know the ways of the world, wander all over the world, be a conqueror, and then… move inwards. You have known the outside; now try to know the inner. And to know the inner, one has to relax. One has to forget anxiety, anguish, tension. One has to be non-competitive; will is not needed. To conquer God means to be conquered by God; to conquer God means to relax and surrender unto his feet. (…) My understanding is this: that only strong egos can surrender; weak egos cannot surrender. (…) Remember, surrender is the last and the greatest act of will. Surrender is not a cheap and easy thing. (…) Surrender is not out of impotence; it is out of tremendous power. (…) You have lived the ways of the will, and you have found nothing. You have looked into all the possibilities of ego, and you have only suffered. Then you decide, "Now let us try the ultimate: dropping the ego." To drop the ego, you will need a great will – otherwise it is not easy to drop the ego. It is the greatest act in the world, the last. Only very courageous people can do it. (…) Will is good for the beginning, good for the young people to play with as a toy, but for those who are becoming mature, they have to drop it. (…) Ego can only give you toys to play with.

I am not against sin; I am not against anything. I say: Use everything; go into it. God has made this whole world available to you for a certain purpose; the purpose is learning. Sin is a lesson, is a must. (…) First know what sin is. Become aware, and drop it on your own accord. (…) But this has to come from your own understanding – otherwise it is borrowed. And God never wants anybody second-hand. Be first-hand. Let your experience be original.

When you are clear, your ego is in control; your clarity is nothing but your ego in control. When you are confused, your ego is thrown off-center; then you don't know what is what.

I am not against ritual. I am simply saying that ritual is not religion; ritual is ritual. And a little ritual is always good: it keeps you in balance; it keeps you sane. (…) I would like you to remember the tightrope-walker. (…) He is a symbol of life. He leans to the left, feels that no, if he leans a little more he will fall; immediately he balances by leaning towards the right. Then he starts falling towards the right; immediately he balances himself again, leaning towards the left. He continuously leans from left to right, right to left. And that's how he keeps himself in the middle. This is the mystery: to keep in the middle, he has to lean to the left, he has to lean to the right – because the middle is not static; it is dynamic. (…) So always, if you want to keep yourself balanced, healthy, sane, you will have to lean to both sides: sometimes a little ritual, sometimes no ritual; sometimes a little scripture, sometimes no scripture; sometimes a little worship, sometimes no worship; sometimes a little prayer, sometimes no prayer. In this way, you will become a tightrope-walker. And remember, again I repeat: life is process; life is dynamic, river-like; the middle is not a static posture. You cannot just stand there in the middle; then you will fall. If you are static, you will die.

First, the experience; then the mystic has to translate it according to his mind. And the mind is given to him by society; the mind is conditioned by society. The mind is nothing but an experience of living with people. He has to translate it – that which is known in tremendous aloneness, that which is experienced in absolute solitude, has to be brought into the mundane world, has to be reduced to a mass language, a mass medium. Much is lost. (…) But for those who are still in the dark night of the soul, stumbling, groping, some explanation is needed. It will be very, very far away from the truth; it will be a lie – but still it is needed. So mystics speak.

The mystic has to be listened to as if you are listening to music. And yes, I say to you: it is a music far deeper than any musician can create.

Information is knowledge received by tuition; knowing is knowledge unfolded in intuition.

Only God can reach us. We can be available; that's all.

You lose your being in a real love; it is great, it pours from heaven. And the same is true about meditation: real meditation pours from heaven. It is nothing that you do; it is something that happens. On your part, only one thing is needed: you have to remain receptive.

When the mind is silent, the heart is radiant. When the mind is chattering, the heart is dead. You cannot exist in the heart if you exist in the mind. (…) The mind is a very jealous wife: it absorbs you totally; it does not leave you a single moment to move towards the heart. And even if you start thinking about the heart, the mind creates a false heart in the head. (…) Thinking is a false thing; the mind produces pseudo-coins to deceive you.

Two things are easy: doing something is easy, or falling into sleep is easy. (…) Just between the two is the thing: don't do anything, be as quiet as you are in sleep, and yet as alert as when you are doing something – as alert as if you are fighting your enemy with a sword, and as quiet as if you have fallen in sleep. Where sleep and awareness meet together, there is sahaj samadhi. (…) And in that moment, you suddenly feel your whole energy has shifted towards the heart. The head disappears; you become headless. (…) The head is no more the center of your being, (…) no more on the central stage, no more the controller, no more the manager, no more the boss. The mind settled; the moving has become non-moving. The mind, when it is not moving, is a no-mind, because movement is the mind itself. (…) If there is no movement in your mind and all thought processes have stopped, mind has disappeared, because mind is nothing but a thought process. (…) And there, you come to see that which is, the reality. Through the mind, you have always come across your own projections. Through the mind, you never come to the real. The mind goes on creating ideas about the real. You never face reality as it is; there is always a screen of thought, and the thought always goes on distorting the reality. You never see that which is; you are never objective. Your imagination goes on working; your wish-fulfillment goes on working; your desires go on coloring things. You can never see things as they are unless the mind is completely put aside. When you see through the heart, you see the reality.

Real freedom is not against bondage; real freedom is beyond bondage. If your freedom is against bondage, you are not really free. (…) The Himalayas cannot become your freedom. You are afraid of the wife; and if the wife comes to see you in the Himalayas, you will start trembling. (…) you are not really a free man. (…) A freedom against bondage is afraid of bondage, and a freedom which is afraid is not freedom at all. Freedom and fear never exist together. Fear is death of all freedom, and freedom is possible only when all fear has disappeared, utterly disappeared.

This is freedom: to be free from all narrowness. (…) Freedom means no definition. Undefined you are, as vast as existence itself. And that is the truth; you are that. (…) You are the Whole, not an iota less. The part is the Whole; let me declare it.

Either move through love, and you will attain to God, or move through God, and you will attain to love.

That which is you cannot see because of your thinking. (…) you carry ideas in your head, and you are always looking through those ideas. (…) You go on looking for that which society has prepared you for, but not for that which is the reality. No society has yet been able to prepare you for reality – because society is a myth; society is a fiction; society is a lie.

Your vision is not clear. Your vision is clouded by what you expect.

Whatsoever I am saying, you cannot believe it, because you have not seen it. (…) there is no way to become convinced. What I am talking about is something you experience; only then do you know it. So how can you become convinced about it? There is no way to make you convinced a priori, beforehand.

The highest harmony is between love and renunciation. (…) If your love is so great that it can contain renunciation, only then is it love. If your renunciation is so great that it can contain love, only then is it renunciation. (…) You love, and yet you remain unattached; you love tremendously, but still you don't cling – that is renunciation. Love the world, and don't be attached. Be in the world, but don't be of the world – that is what renunciation is. That's what I call sannyas. (…) That is the greatest growth; that is the destiny we are seeking. And unless it is attained, you will never be fulfilled. (…) A sannyasin will be a miniature of God – his love will be total; his renunciation too.

In the East, we have always symbolized existence as the flute, the hollow bamboo on the lips of God. (…) Existence is a passage; so is man. (…) The whole existence is a hollow bamboo – God flowing through it, filtering through it, being expressed in a million ways. (…) we are all hollow bamboos on the lips of the Infinite. The song is His, and so is silence. Once you understand this concept of being a hollow bamboo, you are on the path of love.

God and His existence are not two separate things, but interdependent, leaning on each other, searching for each other like two lovers. The lover will not be total if the beloved is lost; and the beloved will not be whole if the lover is lost. When they are together, when their togetherness is such that they are melting into each other, only then are they whole.

Our love is confined in limits. (…) The unhappiness that comes through love is not because of love, but because of the limitations that surround it. (…) When love renounces all limits, it reaches truth.

You can throw a man into hell only when he hopes for heaven. Otherwise, there is no possibility.

Up to the third state, the state of prayer, you can say love exists as a dialogue. Beyond the third, in the state of meditation, the dialogue has disappeared. Now it is not that you love; now you are love. Now love is all that is there – the lover has disappeared; the beloved has disappeared; only love has remained.

Heart is very subtle, and absolutely useless as far as the world is concerned.

Total confusion is one of the ways to reach God. It means all your knowledge has proved meaningless; and when I say all, I mean all. (…) Total confusion means you are in a tremendous dark night of the soul. There is no light available, and there seems to be no possibility. You are hopeless. (…) The future has disappeared; the past has proved meaningless. The anguish has come to the utter peak. From that very peak, mind disappears – because mind can continue only if you are partially confused. Mind cannot exist in total confusion. In fact, mind cannot exist in anything which is total. (…) If confusion is used totally, your beliefs disappear; it will clear the whole ground. And in that state of no-belief, confusion becomes impossible. When confusion becomes impossible, there arises a clarity, and through that clarity is truth.

Ego is impermanent. If your love is out of the ego, it is impermanent.

You first please look at yourself. Don't try to become a do-gooder. These are dangerous people. In the name of doing good, they simply try to interfere with other people's lives. Who are you to help others? You have not even helped yourself yet. Physician, first heal thyself.

Truth cannot be taught, because words cannot convey it; words are impotent. (…) That's why in the world of religion, teachers don't exist; only Masters.

Religion is the learning of being. All other learnings are just training for memories. All other disciplines give you knowledge. Religion gives you knowing, not knowledge – the capacity to see, the tremendous energy to be.

Truth demands you in your totality. Truth won't tolerate any competitor; it is jealous. Truth is like a woman; it wants to possess you totally. (…) Learning is not possible if you simply wish. (…) A wish is just a ripple on the surface of the mind, a whim in the mind – and truth is not open for those who come to it in such a feeble way.

This is the meaning of resurrection – the false within you will die.

Man has been sent on a journey. He looks to be without a home – because he has to attain a home in his being. He looks uprooted – because he has to find a richer soil for his roots. Man is nothing but a reaching of nature towards a higher harmony. But that is so if you look at the whole journey, and you can see the destiny. If you can't see the destiny, then man simply looks like a child gone astray, like a disease. That's why for Sartre, or Camus, or Jaspers, man looks meaningless, a tale told by an idiot, full of fury and noise, signifying nothing. (…) But Buddhas see deeper. (…) Religion is nothing but the effort to make the journey complete. (…) Nature has pushed you, and religion is to complete the journey – otherwise you will feel meaningless, depressed; you will live in anguish.

Awareness creates anxiety. When you are aware, you know that happiness is not going to stay. You are aware that this happiness is just going to pass, like everything else. This too will pass. A sadness settles. Even while you are in your happiest mood, you cannot be absolutely happy. (…) The happiest moment will always carry the saddest possibility in it, and you will be aware of it. Alive, young, full of life and zest – but death is there, following you like a shadow.

Each individual has to open his own heart.

No meditation is needed, but that state comes only after you have meditated for a long, long time.

Every man, and you are included in it, lives a closed life, lives in his own world. There is not one world around you; there are as many worlds as there are minds.

Character means a conditioning. (…) Character means notions, values given by others. (…) A man of character is in bondage. He is not conscious; he is a slave, a slave of a particular society which he happened to be born in. (…) He cannot go in any way different from his character. If he goes, then he feels guilt. That guilt brings him back, because it is too much. (…) If he goes against the society, he will feel a deep rejection, a repulsion against himself. (…) He is punished by his own being. (…) A man of character has a conscience. The perfect man has no conscience, no character. He is simply conscious. (…) Conscience is a trick played by society on the blind man. (…) The society tries to control you from the outside and the inside, both. (…) A man of perfect awareness has nothing to do with character. He comes out of it. He has no conscience, because he has consciousness. (…) Whatsoever he does is good. He never repents. He has no conscience; he never feels guilty. (…) A man of awareness is not controlled either by past or by future. (…) His existence culminates, converges, on the only existential moment that is – here and now.

This is what is happening to everybody. You are under house arrest by the society. The character is the army around you. (…) you cannot escape it, because character is inbuilt in you; it has penetrated you.

In your ignorance, everything is incomplete. You have not completed anything. Millions of experiences are inside you, waiting for their completion.

In haste, nobody can come to know himself. It is a very, very deep awaiting. Infinite patience is needed. By and by, the darkness disappears, and you will come to the light without any source.

You have to encounter yourself. Self-encountering is a suffering in the beginning, painful, deeply painful – that's why you are avoiding it. (…) Know thyself – but nobody wants to listen, because to know thyself means to know thyself as suffering. (…) But only through suffering bliss is achieved; there is no other way. One who has passed through all sufferings becomes capable of the ultimate ecstasy.

Life is a gift. (…) You cannot force existence to make you meditative. That very effort is of the ego. That very effort creates misery. That very effort is suicidal; it destroys you.

Hurry kills. Haste is waste. (…) Just being is the target.

Let life happen; don't try to force it. Through doing, only worthless things are achieved; through non-doing, all that is beautiful, all that is sacred, all that is divine.

To be with God is to be in meditation.

God is total relaxation. (…) Letgo is the secret of life. Letgo is the secret of religion.

You think that somewhere in the future there is some target to be achieved? Life is already here! (…) Postponement is suicidal.

Mind can never be happy. Mind is your accumulated discontent. Mind is your accumulated unhappy past, the whole suffering that you have passed through; it is a wound in your being. And the mind tries to seek, to pursue, and you miss.

You may be enquiring, but that doesn't mean that you are ready to receive. (…) Curiosity is not enough.

In this life, a man may not be aware of his possibilities. He may be completely oblivious of the type of work he has done in past lives.

If you think that you know without knowing, your doors are closed. You have to feel the ignorance, and feel it profoundly, feel deeply in the very depths of your being that you don't know. In that knowledge of ignorance, the doors will open. You become available.

Everybody asks for attention, because attention is food for the ego. Whenever people pay attention to you, you feel important. If more people pay attention to you, you feel very, very important. When nobody pays attention to you, you feel already dead; people have forgotten you; you are worthless. You start feeling your uselessness.

Your presence is the barrier; self-consciousness is the barrier. Self-unconsciousness is the gate.

The Whole exists in the part; the part exists in the Whole. (…) You cannot draw a dividing boundary. The part melts in the Whole, and the Whole melts into the part. But you have become too much of the part; you have chosen, you have become a self; (…) you got identified with the part. And you have completely forgotten the no-self. (…) You have become a discord.

Don't be identified at all. (…) Don't be identified with the part – because you are also the Whole. And don't be identified with the Whole – because you are also the part. (…) You are both and neither, and that is transcendence. (…) Without identification, the I disappears. (…) Real, authentic religion is born when you are not identified at all. (…) Then, there is grace. (…) This is the highest appreciation, (…) because when you are absent, God is present. (…) God is nothing but your purest being.

If you are tense, you will need dreams, because they help you to relax.

A religious man sticks to his needs. (…) Desires are false needs.

Near the age of forty-two, religion starts becoming important for the first time. You may have dabbled a little here and there in religion before, but now religion starts becoming for the first time important – because religion is deeply concerned with death. Now death is approaching, and the first desire for religion arises. Carl Gustav Jung has written that in his whole life he has been observing that people who come to him at the age of forty or nearabout are always in need of religion. If they go mad, neurotic, psychotic, they cannot be helped unless they become deeply rooted in religion. They need religion; their basic need is religion. And if the society is secular and you have never been taught religion, the greatest difficulty comes nearabout the age of forty-two, because the society does not give you any avenue, any door, any dimension. (…) The whole system is burdened with toxic elements: ambition, desire, future, tomorrow. You lived in dreams; now your system cannot tolerate it anymore. And you remain so tense for the future that tension has become your very style of life. Now it is a deep-rooted habit.

At the age of forty-nine, man becomes uninterested in women. (…) But society can suppress or force.

At the age of fifty-six, one should be so mature as to come out of all social entanglements. Finished! One lived enough, learned enough; now one gives thanks to everybody and comes out of it. Fifty-six is the time one should naturally become a sannyasin. One should take sannyas; one should renounce. Life should have an entrance and it should have an exit; otherwise it will be suffocating.

To die celebrating is the readiness to die. Sixty-three is the time when one becomes completely enclosed in one's self. The whole energy moves in and in and in, turning in. You become a circle of energy, not moving anywhere. No reading, not much talking. More and more silent, more and more with one's self, remaining totally independent of all that is around you. The energy by and by subsides. By the age of seventy, you are ready. And if you have followed this natural pattern, just before your death, nine months before your death, you will become aware of your death. As a child has to pass nine months in the mother's womb, the same cycle is totally repeated, completely repeated, utterly repeated. (…) This womb is no more outside in the mother; this womb is in you. (…) One moves to the innermost shrine where the flame has always been burning, where the light has always been, where the temple is, where the god has always been living. This is the natural process.

Everything that comes has to go; everything that arises has to fall.

Living is not enough; one has to penetrate the mystery. A calm and quiet life brings you meditative moments. Meditation brings you to renounce all that is useless now. (…) The whole life becomes garbage; only one thing remains always eternally valuable, and that is your awareness.

Exactly nine months before his death, a man of awareness, a man who has lived totally, can see: now death is coming.

Die to the past, die to the future, and live in the present moment.

When you have lived your life, trust arises; it is an afterglow of a lived life.

The body has a certain function to fulfill; the function is that of consciousness flowering. Once the consciousness has flowered, the body is nonexistential; it is simply irrelevant.

The natural desire of the human mind is to become special, to become special in the ways of the world. (…) The mind is always ready to go on some ego trip. And if you are fed up with the world, then again the ego starts finding new ways and new means to enhance itself – it becomes spiritual. You become a great mahatma, a great sage, a great scholar, a man of knowledge, a man of renunciation; again you are special. (…) The really spiritual person is one who is absolutely ordinary. (…) his specialty is not outward.

Religion is not a quest for explanation. Rather, it is an exploration of love, a nonending journey into love.

The old Indian scriptures say that existence is when God breathes out, and when God breathes in, there is nonexistence.

These are the two possibilities: whenever enlightenment happens, either a person becomes absolutely silent, or he bursts into song.

Unless a man is religious, he remains a crowd.

If you can be aware of the inner and the outer, if you can love the inner and the outer, you have arrived.

Don't postpone, because tomorrow never comes.

Move in freedom, move in total freedom, and each moment remember to drop the past. (…) Don't accumulate.

Religion is not a result of something that you practice. (…) when you practice, you become tense. Religion enters in you any moment you relax. (…) Truth cannot be practiced. You have to relax into it; you have to dissolve yourself into it. Truth can never become something that you can hold in your hand.

Sooner or later, when you are ready, I am going to drop talking in a sequential way. Sooner or later, when my sannyasins are ready, my talks will be more like a collage. (…) You will have to find out your own meaning. I will say a few things, but I will go on jumping and I will not connect as I connect right now. Once you are ready, more attentive, more aware, more alert, I will not connect with logic; I will drop the logic. The unity will be there, but not on the surface. (…) the unity will consist in me. (…) I am waiting for the day you are ready, so I can be as absurd as God is.

Sannyas is the visible effort of surrender.

This is my observation: if you are unhappy, you will find somebody who is unhappy. (…) The same attracts the same. (…) You meet people of the same plane.

Life is dialectical. (…) There is harmony in the contradictions; the contradictions are complementary. (…) The opposites only appear to be opposites because our understanding is not very deep.

A rich life is the life of harmony. A rich life is the life of a subtle synthesis. (…) This synthesis is the goal of all religion, of all mysticism, of all yoga. (…) There is a subtle balance between opposites, and in that very balance, there is transcendence; you go beyond the dual.

All inferior people go on trying to prove that they are something. All ambition arises out of an inferiority complex. (…) An intelligent person, by his very intelligence, becomes noncompetitive.

Real renunciation means unconditioning the mind. Real renunciation means you don't belong to any society; you don't belong to any religion; you don't belong to any country – you don't belong; you are alone. You belong to the Whole in your awareness. But that is possible only by tremendous awareness, understanding, intelligence, awareness, not by playing the game of renunciation, renouncing one thing here, then the other thing there. (…) Otherwise, renunciation will be repressive; you will be tired and nothing much is going to happen out of it. It is understanding that makes the difference, all the difference. (…) Awareness is the true path. Neither indulge or renounce, but be aware. (…) Move with awareness; it is a tremendous experience of no-mind. (…) Awareness means an intensity, such an intensity of wakefulness that no thought interferes.

By changing the roots, you change the whole tree. It is futile to go on changing a single leaf each time, and changing branches – sometimes anger, sometimes sex, sometimes greed, and then there are a thousand and one leaves. (…) The root problem is that you are living an unconscious life, and the root change will be that you start living a conscious life.

The real self is not a self at all. We develop the ego just to hide the fact that we don't know who we are. (…) Ego is deception. It is a deception that you are giving to yourself. It is really difficult to live without self-knowing, so we create a false ego. It gives a little consolation. One starts feeling that one knows who one is. (…) It exists not; it is a pretension. (…) It simply hides ignorance; that's why all the religions insist on dropping the ego. (…) Drop the ego and face your inner being, your inner vastness. (…) Enlightenment is possible only when you are ready to lose yourself.

Man lives in lies; God lives in truth – but how to bridge both? (…) Myth is the way – fiction, yes, spiritual fiction. Myth is a bridge between the lie and the truth. A myth partakes of something of the lie and something of the truth; it is a bridge. (…) You can move through the myth towards truth. And if an alive myth is available, don't miss it, because a dead myth loses all contact with truth. It becomes a lie. That's why religion has to be born again and again. (…) Christianity is a lie; Jesus is a myth. Krishna is a myth; Hinduism is a lie.

Sannyas is a via negativa. I go on taking things away from you – your thinking, your ideology, your religion, your church, your Bible, your Koran. I go on taking away. By and by, I will leave you alone; everything is taken from you. Now you will feel as if you are in an abyss; now you cannot cling to anything. Relax, rest in this abyss, and suddenly the whole gestalt changes. (…) This inner silence is your nature. (…) And you will see, out of this aloneness, bliss arises, bliss flowers. But there will be a transitory period when you will not be able to know what is going to happen. (…) The old light has disappeared, and the new has not arisen yet. Christian mystics have named those days rightly; they call them 'the dark night of the soul'.

Reality cannot be avoided. (…) Just look into it yourself. It is your life, and you have to live it. Don't borrow. Never be secondhand. God loves people who are firsthand. (…) Look into your problems. And there is only one thing I can say to you, that in your problem, there is hidden the solution. The problem is just a seed. If you go into it deeply, the solution will sprout out of it. Your ignorance is the seed. If you go into it, knowledge will flower out of it. (…) In fact, all is given to you – (…) you just have to look inwards.

There is no need to disturb the practical world. Let it continue as it is. That's why I don't say, renounce the world. I say, be part of it. It is good. Just know that it is all arbitrary, that all the distinctions are only useful, not true. They have a utility, but no truth in them. Use the distinctions, but never be lost in them.

Attain to a perception which is transcendental, because the wave is the ocean, and the ocean is the wave.

Knowledge dropped, you attain to the eyes of wisdom. (…) these are the three types of people in the world: the ignorant, who is trying to become knowledgeable; the knowledgeable, who has forgotten his ignorance; and the wise, who has dropped knowledge and has come to accept his ignorance as ultimate and is no longer making any effort to know anything whatsoever. He has come to know that nothing can be known, that knowledge is impossible, that ignorance is the very nature of existence. In his ignorance, he has become relaxed. He rests in his ignorance. Then, one becomes wise.

If something of me has penetrated your heart, you will come back.

Start from the within. The real religion consists of going inwards. (…) If you go into the without, you will be moving into nothingness, emptiness. Of course, you can fill this emptiness with your own images and with your own ideas, but you are creating a neurosis. (…) It is madness.

The world looks real in the same proportion in which you are unconscious, asleep; the more aware you become, the world becomes more and more unreal.

One should grow out of all confinements. (…) God means the whole existence.

You are enjoying your ego. You are continuously strengthening it, decorating it, making it more and more valuable. This is your choice.

I am needed, a Master is needed, because your desire to be enlightened is not very strong, not very intense. You don't feel the urgency; you don't feel thirsty enough for it. It is not your first priority. (…) First comes the world, and then comes God. (…) You have become so attached to the prison, you don't want to get out of it. Even if the door is left open, you don't escape. You go on deceiving yourself; you don't even look at the door.

People are afraid of freedom, and people are afraid of knowing life too deeply. People are afraid to love; people are afraid to be. They have lived long in the dark; now they are afraid of the light. (…) their life in the darkness has become a settled routine; it is secure. Why take any chance? Why go into the unknown and the uncharted?

The Master is not a must; enlightenment can happen without a Master.

The unnatural has to be dropped, and the natural has to be allowed flowering, expression.

There is a constant thug of war between mind and life. Those who choose mind remain dead; those who choose life are the salt of the earth.

Only superficial things can be reduced to knowledge.

Life is so much intertwined; everything is part of everything else. Only in words do things exist; in reality, no thing exists. It is all together; it is one thing. (…) Beware of language. Language creates so many games, and you can be caught in those games. That's why the insistence of all the great mystics of the world that the reality is known in silence. When language is completely dropped, only then is the reality dropped – because language creates barriers.

If you go deeper into yourself, you will reach to that profound depth which is the depth of all. Only on the periphery are we separate; at the center we are one. The center is one; only peripheries are different. (…) But you will need luminous eyes to see this reality, to recognize this secret one inside you – this vastness, this totality, this wholeness. (…) Drop all dust. Sacred or mundane, holy or profane, drop all dust. Cleanse your eyes; that's what meditation is all about.

Jesus says, Let the dead bury their dead. (…) Let your past disappear from your being. (…) Disconnect yourself from the past – and this has to be done every day, because the past is created every day. What is today will become your past tomorrow. (…) If you can let the past go, you will be available. That availability is luminosity. You will have eyes which can reflect, which can see; you will have become a mirror. Meditation is the way of becoming a mirror. (…) Let only one thing remain in the deepest of your heart: that you have to bloom into a meditator. And all else will follow it.

You remain unfulfilled because of your imagination. Life is ready to deliver all that you need, this very moment – but your idea of perfection becomes a barrier. (…) You can always imagine a better state of affairs. (…) Then you cannot love; then you cannot live; then you cannot sing; then you cannot dance. All celebration will disappear from your life; you will be pathological. (…) For thousands of years, man has been conditioned to be neurotic. Joy is when you accept yourself as you are. Joy is a function of immense acceptance. (…) Perfection means you reject yourself, and you naturally reject others too. A perfectionist is hard upon himself, and hard upon others too. He cannot relax and he cannot allow anybody else to relax. Let-go is impossible for him, and he will condemn anybody who is living a relaxed life. Naturally, he suffers deeply; his life is a suffering. (…) That is a pathological mind. It is not capable of enjoying, and it is not capable of letting others enjoy.

Prayer is a consequence of real meditation. Only a meditator can pray, because he knows, because for him, God's presence is something experienced, something lived. Then prayer is no more a complaint; then prayer is a surrender; then prayer is pure love – no desire attached to it, no conditions. It is sheer gratefulness. Meditate, and let prayer come after meditation. (…) First prepare the ground; then prayer happens on its own accord. (…) Prayers done without meditation are formal, foolish. Prayers done without meditation are meaningless – a sheer wastage of time and energy and life. (…) Prayer means a dialogue with the universal mind.

Destroy all consolations. All consolations have to be taken away from you. And your so-called religion is nothing but a consolation. When there is no consolation, you will have to search – it will become a continuous urge in you. The fire will grow and grow, and it will enflame your being.

Total intensity is needed; totality is needed. All partial efforts are useless.

If you accept yourself, that is the beginning of accepting all. If you reject yourself, you are basically rejecting the universe. If you reject yourself, you are rejecting God; if you accept yourself, you have accepted God. (…) Then whatsoever happens is good, because it happens out of God.

You have been conditioned for centuries not to accept yourself. All the cultures of the world have created anxiety in you. Anxiety is the tense state between that which you are and that which you should be. (…) The awakened man is one who has slipped out of the trap of society, who has seen that this is just absurdity. You cannot improve upon yourself. When you stop improving upon yourself, life improves you. In that relaxation, that acceptance, life starts flowing through you. And when you don't have any grudge, any complaint, you bloom, you flower. (…) Accept yourself; that is prayer. Accept yourself; that is gratitude. Relax into your being; this is the way God wanted you to be.

People cling to miseries; (…) people go on punishing themselves in a thousand and one subtle ways. Why? Because that fits with the program. If you are not as you should be, you have to punish yourself; you have to create misery for yourself. That's why people feel good when they are miserable. Let me say it: people feel happy when they are miserable; they become very uneasy when they are happy. This is my observation of thousands and thousands of people: when they are miserable, everything is as it should be. They accept it; it fits with their conditioning. They know how horrible they are; they know that they are sinners. You have been told that you are born in sin. What nonsense; what stupidity. (…) The child is natural and innocent; society punishes him and makes him feel guilty. (…) Then, your whole life will be nothing but an effort to create more and more punishments for yourself. (…) If somebody is innocent, we don't have any regard for him; we don't have any respect for him. The innocent is condemned; the innocent is thought to be almost synonymous with the criminal. The innocent is thought to be foolish; the cunning is thought to be intelligent. The phony is accepted; the phony fits with the phony society.

A non-meditative person and a meditative person are bound to fall apart.

Frustration first needs a requirement to be fulfilled: it needs affluence. (…) A rich man has nothing to hope for; all that he could have hoped for is available, and it has failed. (…) Now he knows there is nothing to hope for. The future is dark; the future is nothing but despair; there is no light that he can live for. (…) America is disillusioned – because America, for the first time in human history, has succeeded in becoming rich. Because of this disillusionment, there is tension. Life seems to be meaningless; there is no point – why go on living? (…) Nothing fails like success. When you succeed, then you know what failure is: you have arrived, and all is empty. You have reached the mirage. When you were in the wilderness, the mirage was a reality – it was an oasis, a green patch of land, and you were thirsty and you were moving, moving towards the oasis. America has arrived, and there is no oasis at all – it was just illusory, a mirage. (…) Those who have not yet arrived, they still have hope. The beggar seems to be contented, because he can hope for tomorrow – he still has illusions; he has still to succeed. It has nothing to do with religion; it has nothing to do with India; that contentment has always been there with poor people. (…) The poor man has nothing to lose and much to gain.

If the American wants to know about meditation, prayer, God, he comes to India. This is strange – because the advanced culture has to go further ahead to find religion, not go back. But there is a psychological reason in it: it is a kind of regression. When you are too much in stress, you tend to become childish; you want to go back to childhood. If a young man feels too much stress, he starts falling backwards; he becomes a child. He behaves in a childish way; he starts doing childish tantrums – he cries, he weeps, he becomes illogical. Stress gives him the idea, "Go back. Childhood was golden; it was paradise. Go back." But that which has been lost, has been lost. One can never go back. (…) Going backwards is regression; going backwards is just a consolation. It is not going to help; it will not give you growth. (…) Go on; go ahead. (…) I am not teaching you Eastern religion; I am not teaching you Indian religion. I am teaching you a far advanced religion that belongs to the future, not the past.

Go ahead. Become affluent; become rich; now the problem arises. You have achieved what you wanted to achieve, and now it is proved to your heart's desire, heart's content, that it is futile. Now go ahead. Now become more mature – now see the futility of immature desires; now see the futility of the immature games that you have been playing with your life. Now move inwards; now penetrate your innermost core. There is no need to go to any backward culture. (…) Materially you have become rich; now become rich spiritually.

I only happen to be here in India because I have to be somewhere. I only happen to be here. When you come to me, you are not coming to India – because I don't represent India; I represent a global future.

I respect richness in all its aspects – even the material richness, because that helps you to go towards spiritual richness. I don't praise poverty in any way, neither outer nor inner. I am all for richness – be rich materially, so that one day you are finished with that dream and your energies can move unhindered towards inner riches.

Remember, the tension has not to be reduced; the tension has to be overcome. The tension has not to be reduced; the tension has to be transcended – you have to go beyond it, not below it. Don't be an escapist; use all of life's opportunities to go beyond them.

The inner world is the kingdom of God. It is a kingdom – you have to become kings, emperors. Unless you have become a god in your innermost kingdom, you will remain unfulfilled.

They say that philosophy begins in wonder. Perhaps. But philosophy always tries to destroy wonder. (…) The whole effort of philosophy is to demystify existence. The more you think you know, the less you have awe, wonder, reverence, love. Existence then seems to be stale, flat; there are no mysteries in it. And of course when there is no mystery outside, there is no poetry inside. (…) Poetry can arise only if life remains worth exploring. The moment you know, poetry dies; knowledgeability is the death of all that is beautiful in you. And with the death of poetry, you live a life which is not worth living – it can't have any significance; it can't have any celebration. It cannot bloom; it cannot dance; you can only drag. (…) Religion is born in wonder, lives in wonder. Religion begins in wonder and ends in more wonder.

Being is when you are not; knowledge is when you are too much. Knowledge is an ego trip; being is egolessness.

Philosophy will give you ideas that you know. And religion will make it clear to you that you don't know and that you can't know – that truth is not only unknown, but unknowable. And when you face the unknowable truth within and without, the poetry bursts forth; you are in a dance. In that innocence is samadhi, ecstasy.

Religion is not any philosophic endeavour. It is poetic, utterly poetic. Religion is poetry. (…) Poetry does not depend on the form of the expression; it depends on the content – it depends on the innermost core that is expressed in it. (…) There is something wrong with the poet in the eyes of a philosopher – because the poet is illogical, and the poet remains in the state of innocence, and the poet trusts the mystery of life. And the poet does not try to know; the poet tries to live this mystery, this existence. He is not worried about the why of it; he is not concerned with analyzing it, dissecting it. (…) Religion is the ultimate form of poetry, the essential form of poetry. So I say to you: one must understand the 'Ah!' of things, and then all is understood. (…) The poet understands; the religious mystic understands – they don't know. And understanding is possible only when you participate. (…) When two things pulsate in such unison that it is almost as if they are one, (…) when the participation is total – then only do you know.

If you can melt with existence, then you are religious. That melting I call prayer. When somebody has melted so deeply with existence that he is not there as a knower separate from the known, but the knower and the known have become one – in that moment the secrets are revealed. But then, the mystery is not destroyed; the mystery is deepened even more.

The very requirement of knowledge debars you. You will know much, but you will not understand at all. You will go on gathering knowledge; you will become very much informed; but deep down, you will not have any insight into the reality of things.

Let wonder be your religion. (…) Joseph Campbell has said: "Those who desire and strive for salvation most earnestly are in their zeal bound the more, since it is exactly their self-seeking that is giving them their pain… When the Buddha extinguished ego in himself, the world burst into flower. But that, exactly, is the way it has always appeared to those in whom wonder, and not salvation, is religion!" (…) Clean your eyes of dust, of knowledge. (…) Jesus says, Unless you are like children, you will not enter into the kingdom of God. Remove the dust, and again things will become beautiful; again things will have meaning and significance.

If you become too knowledgeable, then this whole life is nothing but a tale told by an idiot, full of fury and noise, signifying nothing. (…) You will have to renounce knowledge.

Mind is a monkey – it jumps from one branch to another; it goes on jumping; it cannot stay in any place. (…) The mind can only live either out of the past or out of the future. (…) the mind feeds on the non-existential. (…) the moment you bring it to the present, it melts and disappears. It is as if you take a candle into your dark room and darkness disappears. Darkness cannot face the candle. The darkness was only the absence of light; it was an absence. It had no existence of its own; it was shadowy, non-existential.

People remember only things which have not been digested. (…) When I say, don't go into the past, I mean the psychological past. And when I am saying, don't project into the future, I mean the psychological future. (…) Love is possible only when you stop the mind's constant rushing into the past and future.

The atheist is one who thinks he is an orphan. And the religious person is one who trusts that he is not an orphan – he senses some hands.

There are three paths. The first is the path of action – the hardest, most difficult, most masculine. Moses, Mohammed, Rama, Patanjali, Gurdjieff – these people belong to the path of action. Something has to be done to attain God; great effort is needed; absolute effort is needed; it is arduous and uphill. (…) The second path is the path of knowledge. It is in the middle – neither too hard, nor too simple; neither too easy, nor too complex. Buddha, Mahavira, Shankara, Ramana, Krishnamurti – these are the people who walk on the path of knowledge. People who are not too masculine and not too feminine follow this path. The third is the path of love, the path of devotion, bhakti. It is the most simple, most direct, closest. (…) You need not do anything – on this path, doing will be your undoing. You need only relax and trust. The path of love is the feminine path. (…) If you can choose the path of love, then choose it. If it is impossible, only then choose the second – the path of knowledge, awareness. Or, if you cannot choose even that, only then choose the path of action – that is the hardest and most desert-like. Down the ages, those who have arrived, almost ninety percent of them have been the pilgrims of love; nine percent have been the pilgrims of knowledge; and only one percent the pilgrims of action.

When you witness a certain thing in yourself, it cannot enter into your system. It always enters when you avoid it, when you escape it. When you become absent, then it enters into your system.

Meditation is when you are emptied of all that is old and told and done to death. Then you see. Or rather, then there is seeing.

No society allows grown-up minds. Grown-up minds are dangerous for the social structure; they are rebellious. (…) they see all the kinds of stupidities that go on in the name of culture, society, nation. (…) A grown-up person cannot be reduced to a slave. (…) The family depends on dependence; the society depends on dependence – they all depend on your non-growing selves; they all try to keep you stuck somewhere. (…) Your family, your culture, your society, has a great investment in you, and it does not allow you to grow.

Nobody has committed great crimes. All crimes are small. Yes, the so-called great crimes are also small; great crimes don't exist. Man cannot do great things – neither great virtues, nor great crimes. All that man can do is small. Man is small and limited. Great things can be done only by God – you forget about it. All that you can do with your small life is to have a little joy, to have a little light, to have a little laughter.

Those who have been total in their living – they transcend. Not through repression but through experience, transcendence comes. There have been people like Buddha and Christ, Kabir and Krishna – but these are the people who have not repressed. These are the people who have gone as deeply as possible into life, who have understood all its ways, who have seen all its possibilities. And seeing it, understanding it, becoming aware of it, they have gone beyond it. There comes a tranquility, a stillness, a silence, a purity, an innocence – but that is not cultivated. Nobody can cultivate innocence. (…) When you live your life utterly involved, committed, it comes, it certainly comes. One day suddenly you see all has passed – days and nights, summers and winters, all has passed. You have looked all around; you have seen everything; you have understood all – in that understanding is transcendence. That understanding is transcendence. Otherwise, you can go on repressing. And repression is out of fear, not out of understanding. (…) Love life; don't be afraid.

Existence is neutral – it simply reflects; it is a mirror. You make an ugly face, and you see an ugly face in the mirror. And you smile, and the mirror smiles. (…) This is the law. Life reflects and echoes whatsoever you throw at life – it comes back; a thousandfold it comes back. Smile, and the whole existence smiles at you. Shout and abuse, and the whole existence shouts and abuses you. And you are the root cause; you created the whole process. (…) Remember, the rewards and punishments don't come from the outside; you create them. You are the occasion for them; you are the soil. You are free, and in freedom you become utterly responsible.

There are many people who go on listening to their inner voices. These inner voices are just crap. These are just fragments of your mind; they have no value at all. (…) Don't believe in any voice. Just remain aloof, just watch. And watching, they will disappear, because if you don't get identified, you will not be feeding them and nourishing them. (…) Remember, God has no voice except silence. Silence is the voice of God. And when all the voices have gone, then there is utter silence. (…) Silence gives you clarity, gives you light; (…) silence gives you eyes to see your path. And then you start moving in life with eyes. Ordinarily you are moving blind. A blind man needs guides; a blind man needs maps. A man who has eyes needs nothing. (…) God comes to you as silence. (…) Remember it: only trust in silence and in nothing else – otherwise you will get trapped by the mind again and again.

The first sign of a seeker is that he drops all dogmas. How can you seek with a belief inside you? (…) Only a mind that has not yet concluded is capable of knowing, because that mind is receptive.

When one flower opens, it is never just the one flower – it triggers a process; then flowers go on opening. (…) The first flower may be difficult, but the others simply go on coming. The first experience is difficult, because you don't allow it. (…) One light starts burning in you, and the whole of life becomes aflame. Then you see each and everything as luminous.

The seeker's heart burns with one desire; he knows only one passion. All his desires are dissolved into one desire; he becomes a torrent of one desire. (…) His whole life is turned towards God: the search for truth, the search for the total, the search for the universal spirit. Just like that, the seeker remembers and destroys the wheel of life and death forever. (…) One who longs for God so totally goes beyond life and death – he knows transcendence.

Those who have looked into the human mind deeply, their observation is that whatsoever you fall in love with – a woman, money, power – you are really searching God. Searching in a wrong way, in a wrong direction, but still searching for God. (…) If you can, remember that it is always God whom you love… It is always God; God is your original object of love. Everything else is just a reflection, just an echo. (…) feel grateful to the mirror that has reflected something of the beyond, but go in search of the beyond. If love grows rightly, it becomes prayer.

Real prayer consists of two parts. First, becoming silent, listening to God's music. And second, a thankfulness. The real prayer demands for nothing, asks for nothing. The real prayer is a desireless silence. And after that music has been heard, what is there to say? A gratefulness, a gratitude has to be expressed.

One starts living when one does not know how to live.

On the path of love, knowledge is not needed, but a state of innocence. (…) All that men strain and strive to become is at best as unnecessary as painting red roses red. At worst, it is unnatural – striving to be spiritual, by whatever means, is putting legs on a snake. (…) On the path of love, there is no striving, no practicing of anything. No yoga postures, no religious rituals, but just an innocent heart unburdened of knowledge, unburdened of all borrowed rituals. To see this is to cease to strive. (…) All that the religions have reached after is already given in grace – if we have the grace to see it. There is nothing to be done but to see that there is nothing to be done, and no one to do it. Remember, the doing creates the illusion that you are a doer. Doing stopped, the doer automatically disappears. (…) The ego need not be dropped – stop doing, and it disappears of its own accord. (…) And when there is no doing and no doer, you have arrived; you have arrived home. To see this is emptiness.

The Master is not a person; the Master is a presence. And you cannot be related to a presence. The moment you recognize the presence, you are dissolved.

The real answer does not put an end to the question, but to the questioner. (…) The real Master puts an end to you, so that you can be that which you are destined to be. (…) A Master simply hits you hard to make you aware; then your awareness will do everything. (…) Understanding transforms your being. In understanding, the question is finished. (…) Understanding is never more or less. Either you see or you don't; there are no degrees between the two.

A person who can be blissful alone has gone beyond any kind of dependency. And he is the person who can go into the world and give his love to people, because he no longer needs anything from them – he can simply go on giving unconditionally. He no longer belongs to the crowd. He can go into the crowd, because the crowd cannot distract him from his own center. He can live in the crowd, and he will not be part of the crowd; he can live in the crowd, and the crowd will not be in him. That is what meditation is all about, to be capable of being alone. (…) A mature person is one who has changed the whole pattern of his being. He is now ready to give. He has taken enough from the world; now he is ready to give.

The improver is never a grower; the grower is never an improver – they are diametrically opposite.

This is the way to die – full of love, full of prayer, ready to go on that adventure called death. (…) The longing to be one with the Whole is love. (…) Remember, if death reminds you of love, then you are on the right track. If love reminds you of death, then you are on the right track. If your love is possible only by denying death, then your love is false. And if the very idea of death destroys your quality of love, then you have not yet known what love is. Death and love go together; they are aspects of the same energy. When death fulfills your love, and when in love you are ready to die, when they have the same taste and the same flavor, then for the first time you have really become aware of the mysteries of life, love and death.

Unless your whole life has been a preparation for death, you will miss the point; unless your whole life you have been learning how to die, unless you have not been missing any opportunity to die in love, in friendship, in trust, in surrender. (…) Slowly, slowly, knowing death in its many aspects, you will come to recognize it as a friend, not as an enemy, as a great rest and relaxation.

Don't look for any salvation in the afterlife. Salvation is here, because salvation is through experience. Salvation is not through renunciation; salvation is not through virtue; salvation is not through doing good to people. Salvation is through experiencing life as deeply, as intensely, as passionately as possible. Virtue arises out of that passionate living. (…) The do-gooder is not a good person; and the good person is never a do-gooder. The good person is one whom good follows just like his shadow. He does not intend to do it; he has no intention to serve anybody, but his life becomes a service. It comes effortlessly.

If you cannot know truth while alive, how will you be able to know truth when you are dead? Life gives you a three-dimensional opportunity – of the body, of the mind, of the soul. Death will take two dimensions away from you; your life will become one-dimensional, of the soul only. This three-dimensional school of life is the greatest possibility to know, to understand, to be.

Don't be a victim of fantasies. Spirituality is not a sensational experience – it is maturity; it is let-go; it is becoming desireless. Nothing is really experienced. (…) Spirituality is the disappearance of all experiences. You are left alone and there is no object in your consciousness; consciousness is pure like a mirror and nothing is reflected in it. That mirror-like consciousness reflecting nothing is spirituality.

Desirelessness is satisfied desire. When desires disappear, there is contentment. And desires cannot disappear unless you have made love to God. No other experience is going to satisfy you. In fact, the definition of God is nothing but this: that experience which satisfies you so totally that desire never arises again. That experience is God: the ultimate experience that leaves you contented for ever and ever.

Only two things are needed: start moving inwards; and recognize a Master. (…) Truth is inside you. All outside search is going to lead you from one lie to another lie. (…) Drop all outward search. (…) Truth is in your inner silence. (…) When thoughts have disappeared, you will know what truth is. And when you have started experiencing a little bit of truth inside you, only then will you be able to recognize the Master. (…) A student cannot recognize the Master; only a disciple can. (…) A student looks through the head; the disciple looks through the heart, silently, with no prejudice. (…) you can become a disciple only if you are meditating. (…) The Master does not give you anything; he simply gives you your own being. (…) when the Master and the disciple meet, great music arises; a great melody is born – because it is the most harmonious phenomenon in the world. (…) The meeting between the Master and the disciple is between two souls – it is the deepest love possible. Great music is heard.

Have you seen one person fully psychoanalyzed? There is no possibility, because mind is not just like a rubbish heap, that you can go on throwing out rubbish and one day the mind will be empty. No: the mind manufactures rubbish; while you are emptying it, it is creating more rubbish – fresh rubbish, stronger rubbish, better rubbish. It goes on creating. Only for a few moments will you feel a kind of unburdening, and again it is there. (…) Mystics believe in drastic methods.

Mind divides; love unites.

Remember, you are not to choose the center against the circumference – because without the circumference, the center cannot exist, just as the circumference cannot exist without the center. (…) Take one away, and the other disappears.

Whatsoever goes well with you is fine. Don't impose unnecessary structures upon your being. You are already in a prison; don't create bigger prisons for yourself. (…) Work as diligently as possible for becoming more conscious. Let your whole concern be consciousness. And when you are conscious, when you are a little bit alert, aware, when a light starts burning in your inner being, when you are able to see, many things will change. Not according to any structure, not according to any ideology, not according to any fanaticism – but according to your own understanding, things are bound to change.

The trees grow only if their roots grow in the earth. With man it is just the reverse: man grows roots only if he grows.

Henry David Thoreau said, "Only that day dawns to which we are awake."

When you feel rooted in existence, you feel it is your home. (…) Then, there is no need to possess anything, because the whole universe is yours. This I call renunciation.

Man lives without any remembrance of who he is. Then you can go on doing a thousand and one things, but failure is going to be your fate. You are doomed to fail, because unconsciousness fails. Only consciousness succeeds, because it is only through consciousness that you become part of the divine cosmos. Unconscious, you remain apart. Unconscious, you are confined by your ego; you are like an island. Conscious, the ego melts; you become one with the Whole, the harmony of the Whole. The part is going to fail. The part cannot succeed. Only the Whole succeeds.

Let this be remembered by you always and always: there is no way from the periphery to the center. There is certainly a way from the center to the periphery. If the inner changes, the outer changes of its own accord – but not vice versa. Just by changing the outer, you will not be able to change the inner. In fact, by changing the outer, you will become a hypocrite. By changing the outer, you will become split; you will become two. Rather than becoming one, you will be divided. And all divisions bring misery. And this is the greatest division: when somebody's center speaks one language, and the circumference another – he starts falling into a kind of schizophrenia. These two poles will become farther and farther apart, and he will not be able to keep himself together. Sooner or later, he will fall into fragments. That's what madness is.

Until you have understood the quality of the Buddha, his mindfulness, his awareness, you will go on misunderstanding. And whatsoever you will do out of your misunderstanding will create more misery, complexity, turmoil in your life. Rather than becoming a blessing, it will become a curse. That's what has happened to humanity at large.

When all that is false is eliminated, and only that which is truth is left, intellect becomes silent.

Why do you want attention? Because you are empty. (…) Deep down, you are so poor that if nobody is paying attention to you, you start feeling as if you don't exist at all. Your whole existence depends on people's attention.

When a person becomes absent, God becomes present in him. The more you are absent as you, the more God will be present in you.

Come out of your idiotic world of dreaming. You cannot become anything else than you already are, hence the whole effort is idiotic.

Desire is absurd; longing is existential. (…) Desire is accumulation of the outer; longing is opening of the inner. (…) Man desires the world; man longs for God. (…) That which is intrinsic in you is longing. Divert your energies from desire into longing. Desire distracts you from your Tao, from your dharma, from your nature. Desire takes you astray. It allures you into fantasies which are not possible; (…) it gives you hopes which cannot be fulfilled. (…) Time, energy, life will be wasted, and in the end, there is only frustration in the hands and in the heart. (…) Longing is fulfillment.

It takes years of psychoanalysis to make you a little alert. That little alertness helps, but the process is too long. (…) Vipassana can do within months what psychoanalysis will do in years. And vipassana works on the third, goes deeper than psychoanalysis. And when you work deeper, the problems that were very important before simply fade. If dreaming becomes a conscious process, it will change your waking awareness. If in sleep you become conscious, it will change your dreaming awareness. (…) Awareness is transformation. No other discipline is needed.

Remember, the mind is very cunning. It can always find rationalizations. It can call ego 'self', 'soul'. It can call egoistic attitudes self-respect, and hide behind those words. You have to be hard. You have to expose the mind to the very roots; only then is there a possibility of your being exploding in bloom. The mind has to be dropped, and it is dropped when it is exposed. It is a cheat; it is a fraud.

To succeed existentially means to live moment-to-moment in utter joy. Logic cannot allow you; joy itself appears to logic as illogical.

Logic opens a door to reality; the door of logic becomes science. Love opens a different door to reality; the door of love becomes religion. (…) Philosophy, if it enters from the door of logic, is bound to disappear sooner or later into science, because what philosophy does, science can do better. Philosophy can live only if it enters through the door of love. Then nobody can take its temple; then it is a real sophia – real wisdom.

Life is not reducible to logical syllogism. Life is far bigger. Its mystery is infinite. Only love can understand it. Only love has the infinity to cope with it. Everything else is very finite. Only love can dare to move into the indefinable, to move into the subtle.

Time depends upon the state of development of the individual. The more advanced a person is in his total human development, the less is his awareness of time. The perfected person has no consciousness of time. Time simply means that you are not in the present. Time means past and future. When time disappears, you are here-now. And only then there is contact with reality. Logic functions in time; love functions in timelessness. Logic needs time; love needs no time. And only love can reveal to you the nature of reality. (…) God cannot be known through reasoning; God can only be felt through the heart – because God is the heartbeat of the Whole. You will have to find synchronicity with the heartbeat of God. You will have to fall in rhythm. You will have to attain to a kind of harmony. Hence, Sufis are so mad about music, singing, chanting, dancing. (…) Only in dance does the moment of grace arrive when you are not, and God is. Only in dance does the separation between the mind and the body disappear – and you are one whole, one piece, all together, no more fragmentary. If you can dance deeply, so deeply that the dancer disappears in the dance, this is prayer. And once you have known what prayer is, then all is prayer. (…) All action is one, and the infinite life is enclosed in every action. This is what Hassids call avoda – service through ecstasy. In all deeds of the awakened one – speaking and looking and listening and going and remaining standing and lying down – the boundless is clothed. But the first experience comes either through singing or dancing or meditating. In short, the first experience always comes when time disappears. (…) When you are without time, you are with God.

Samadhi is the burning of all knowledge, of all mind. Not only of the knowledge, but of the knower too – all disappears in the fire of samadhi. (…) And only in this fire, that which is, is known.

Repetition, the power which weakens and discolors so much in human life, is powerless before ecstasy, which catches fire again and again from precisely the most regular, most uniform events, and yet always remains new, utterly new, radically new.

People go on working, year in, year out, their whole lives, for things which don't matter at all. (…) They have lost track of the essential and have become distracted in the details of the non-essential. They work hard; they devote their whole life, but to rubbish. If you look at their work, you will appreciate their sincerity. But if you look at the outcome, you will laugh at their stupidity. (…) The Sufi thinks only of the essential. He discards all that is non-essential. He looks only for the diamonds – he does not collect rubbish; he is not interested.

Scholars are poor people, stuffed with knowledge – but all knowledge is dead. (…) Logic has its ways. It is a beautiful game; you can enjoy it. But those who are interested in reality are not interested in such games.

To prove that Buddha existed, one has to exist as a Buddha – there is no other way.

Remember it: a man who has only slept and has never known what awakening is, to him dreams are true. Because in sleep, everybody thinks dreams are true. But the man who has known both the dream and the awakening, to him dreams are untrue.

To divide yourself in two is to move towards a split. You are one. (…) Never divide yourself, otherwise you will be in a conflict, a civil war, fighting with yourself. And that is utter stupidity. To fight with oneself is to dissipate energy unnecessarily. It is a wastage. The same energy can become jubilation.

Religion is a state of let-go. (…) Be in a let-go. (…) Put your mind aside. (…) Let God decide. (…) Don't be so rational. Religion is available only to those who can go deeper than reason. To go deeper than reason is to go beyond reason. And religion is available only beyond. What you call religion is nothing but mind fabrications.

Nothing has happened, nothing is going to happen, remember.

I am not interested in disciples – unless somebody's need is really intense. I am here, not for the crowd and the mob, but only for the chosen few.

When a disciple surrenders to a Master, he does not surrender to the Master – the Master is just an excuse. (…) Surrender is not to anyone in particular. (…) The disciple only surrenders, that's all. (…) The surrender is of no significance to the Master; (…) the Master is not getting anything. (…) That's what real surrender is: dying as an ego. When you die as the ego, you are born as the Divine. So the crucifixion of the ego is the resurrection of the soul.

Religion is a risk, a rebellion, a rebirth; religion is not a consolation, not a conformity, not a convention. Religion is not part of the world; it is something of the beyond. Religion cannot be learnt; it can only be imbibed. There is no study which is going to help you to become religious; all studies lead astray.

Why do I call religion a risk – and not only a risk, but the greatest risk? (…) Because you have to lose yourself. (…) nothing less than the totality is required – you have to lose yourself totally. (…) It is a jump out of the ego into the egoless abyss. It is a discontinuity with the past, with all that you have thought you are. It is a breakthrough. You lose your identity – it is a great crisis in identity. You have known yourself as this or that – a name, a form, a society, a nation… Religion requires that you lose all of your identity. (…) A religious person is not a person at all, but only a presence. He drops his personality. He cannot say who he is; he cannot define himself. But in that indefinable state of consciousness, he knows who he is. This is a paradox: those who know who they are don't know; and those who are ready to risk their whole identity and come to a point where they don't know who they are, only they are the people who become capable of knowing. (…) Very few people have that much courage. (…) Religion is not for cowards.

Politics is for cowards; politics is for the inferior. The whole political world depends on the inferiority complex. When a man feels himself to be nothing, nobody, he starts projecting himself in the world of ambition. Politics, power, prestige, status, possessions, money – these are the ways of ambition. Religion is for those who are ready to go into the nothingness of their being, who don't think that they have to be somebody. They don't want to be somebody; they don't project – all that they want is to know who they are. They simply want to enter into the innermost shrine of their being and see what is there. (…) The ambitious person runs out, afraid to encounter nothingness; the religious person rushes in to know "What is this nothingness that I am?"

Religion is in the hands of irreligious people. (…) They have a motivation. (…) They want to exploit God, in some way or other. (…) They are seeking support of God, so that they can succeed in their ambition.

There is an outer sky and there is an inner sky. The worldly person moves out; the religious person moves in. To move out is very easy, because millions are moving there. You can become part of the crowd; you need not have any individual courage of your own. You can simply ride on the mob psychology. All the people are doing something; you can become part of it. Man is an imitator. If anything proves that man comes from the monkey, it is his tremendous capacity to imitate. But to go in, you are alone. Absolutely alone. Nobody can be there with you, not even a friend. Great courage is needed for this internal journey – the courage to be alone. Only those who are ready to be alone will be able to know what God is, because God is found in your innermost aloneness. God is the innermost center of your aloneness.

To try to be somebody, to try to be special, is the way of ambition and the way of the ego. And the ego never meets God.

Religion is basically asocial – not anti-social, but asocial. It takes you beyond society. You are caught up by the society; you are conditioned by the society. The society is your prison; it does not allow you to move out of its boundaries. It gives you enough rope so that you can have a certain feeling of freedom, but you are not free. No society allows freedom. No society exists for freedom. The name of freedom is being exploited, but no society is free. To have a free society will mean to have no society at all.

Religion has something to do with the feeling part of your being, not with the thinking part of your being. (…) The knowing is intuitive.

The Master is a climate, an atmosphere, a silence in which you suddenly become aware of your own potential. (…) in the presence of the Master, some chord in your heart starts responding, as if somebody is playing music and in the very hearing of it, a dance arises in you. Your whole body wants to dance. You are in the grip of the music; it has touched and moved your heart. You are connected, bridged. (…) if you can find a Master and fall in love, then that is the door to the Divine, because on this earth, nothing is closer to God than a Master. And the difference between you and the Master is not of quality; the difference is only of remembrance.

Ambition fails; nobody's ambitions are ever fulfilled. The ambitious person always fails, has to fail. If the ambitious can succeed, then there will be no need for the Buddhas; then Buddhas will be irrelevant.

A Sufi won't bother to become part of a king's court; he will avoid. In every way he will escape, even if the king is after him, because the court is the most mischievous place to be, the ugliest place to be. It is hell.

When a man meets a Master, all other relationships are dissolved. (…) Then all relationships are dissolved into one relationship, and that is with the Master. (…) And to be at the feet of the Master is the greatest joy there is. It is heaven. In that love, in that intimacy, in that relatedness, all that has always been missing is no more missing – one has come home.

Knowledge is a kind of shock-absorber. It does not allow you to be shaken and shocked. It goes on protecting you. (…) I speak against knowledge (…) so that life can shock you into awareness. (…) The more knowledge there is, the more your self-awakening will be delayed. Become unknowledgeable.

Belief cannot become knowing; it will be a pretension. Their whole life, believers think they know, and they will never know. The foundation has been laid in untruth.

That is the state of a knowledgeable man's mind: thoughts, scriptures, great theories, dogmas, doctrines float like clouds, and he cannot see the pure sky. Let these clouds disappear. They are of your own making; they are there because you are clinging to them. They are there because you go on holding onto them. Loosen your grip; let them go; then there is a pristine clarity of the sky, the absolute infinity of the sky. That is freedom. That is consciousness. That is true knowing.

The only way to know the witness is to drop all content and become utterly empty. When there is nothing to see, your capacity to see turns upon itself. That's what Jesus calls conversion. When there is nothing to be seen, one starts seeing oneself. When there is nothing to hinder, the consciousness is pure, and in that purity, it becomes self-conscious.

With the intelligent man, there is a problem, (…) because the intelligence goes on keeping him hesitant, goes on keeping him in a state of paralysis. (…) He goes on thinking, and there is no end to it. (…) But if he takes the jump, then there is great beauty in his jump. He will know, and he will be able to express it too. He will be able to spread it too.

I am against the ritual when there is no heart in it. (…) I am against rituals because they have killed the spirit of religion in the world. (…) I am not against rules, but the rules should arise out of your understanding. They should not be imposed from the outside. I am not against discipline, but discipline should not be slavery. All true discipline is self-discipline. And self-discipline is never against freedom; in fact, it is the ladder to freedom. Only disciplined people become free, but their discipline is not obedience to others; their discipline is obedience to their own inner voice. And they are ready to risk anything for it. Let your own awareness decide your life-style, life-pattern. Don't allow anybody else to decide it, because it will remain superficial; it will be hypocrisy.

Energy is understanding. (…) When energy is occupied, focused on an object, it remains ignorance; it remains unconsciousness. When energy is unoccupied, it becomes understanding, awareness. (…) Energy accumulates if you don't go wasting it on objects. (…) If you put your energy into objects, you will live a life of non-understanding, unawareness. Don't put energy into objects. Let energy fall into your being. Let it accumulate. Let your life become a great reservoir. Let your energy just be there, without occupation. And at a certain point, (…) energy becomes luminous, turns into awareness, becomes understanding. (…) It is energy that becomes understanding. So when you are depleted of energy, you start losing your understanding. When you are tired, your intelligence is less. (…) Energy is understanding. Be conscious of it and use your energy very consciously; use your energy in such a way that you don't simply go on wasting it.

Ego is a false entity. (…) Ego is just the belief in your specialness, in your personality, a belief in yourself – and the belief is utterly false, not based in truth at all. I am not; you are not – only God is. Falseness consists of many and multiplicity. Many are appearances; many are false – only one is. Truth consists of one.

Religion is a radical change of vision. (…) it is a change of the very being itself. (…) radical means the roots. (…) You don't grow from irreligion into religion; it is not a growth at all. (…) Religion is a death and a rebirth. (…) Unless you renounce the world, you will not find God. (…) All calculated steps are cunning, and you cannot reach God by your cunningness. (…) Religion is not a change of outlook, but a revolution in insight. (…) Religion is not philosophical; religion is absolutely non-philosophical – your philosophies have no meaning. Philosophy is a useless passion, (…) an exercise in futility. (…) Religion is existential; (…) it is experiencing God; (…) its approach is direct.

The religious person moves alone. (…) Hence the path is straight and narrow. (…) The path to God is love. (…) It is intuitive; it is of the heart.

Religion is renunciation of all that which belongs to the ego. It is not really renunciation of the world; it is renunciation of the world that the ego creates. (…) Religion is renunciation of the false, that really does not exist at all – of the ego, of knowledge, of prejudices, of expectations, of desires. (…) these are your creations, your illusions. (…) You can renounce only that which you have dreamed; you can renounce only the illusory.

The real Master never makes you dependent on him. And if any Master creates dependency in people, he is not a true Master. He is a kind of exploiter; he is trying to dominate you in the name of religion. He is trying to enslave you; he is a jailor – he cannot give you freedom. He will depend on you. Whosoever wants you to be dependent on him, depends on you, remember. The master is a slave of his own slave; the man who possesses things is possessed by those things. Only one who does not need you, who is not dependent on you, can help you to be independent – and that is the function of a Master.

Religion is innocence; it is trust; it is faith. It is trust in the Whole and the goodness of the Whole. It is a let-go; it is a surrender.

The Sufi's whole effort is not to move – not to move in desire, because that is real movement. First desire moves or you move in desire, and then other movements follow. The Sufi sits; deep inside, he is always sitting. Even while walking, he is not going anywhere. He is doing God's work, but in his own being, he is just meditating. There is no desire for any movement. There is no effort to become anything; that is the meaning of sitting: no becoming; he is being. (…) He is not trying anything; he is simply relaxing in his being – that is sitting. It is a special state. And whenever you become a really religious person, you will find it. (…) Even walking, he does not walk. He remains still. Even talking, he does not talk – he remains silent. This is the paradox of the religious man. Eating, he does not eat; sleeping, he does not sleep. These things go on only on the surface, on the periphery. In the center, nothing ever happens; in the center, it is always the same. (…) And a Sufi is welcome to all. His heart is always in a state of welcome. He knows nothing else; he knows only welcoming, because he knows only God comes. Forms may be millions, but it is always God who comes to you, (…) because there is nothing else. Hence the Sufi remains always in a state of welcome.

Whatsoever you talk about creates you; it either poisons you or nourishes you. All your talk is poisoning.

If there is anything worth seeing, it is God. And those who have not seen God, they are all blind. If there is anything worth hearing, it is a Buddha, or a Lao Tzu – and those who have not heard a Buddha, they are deaf. And if there is any life, it is to live moment-to-moment in trust, in love, in joy, in celebration, in prayer, in thankfulness. To live means to live in God – consciously, totally. And those who are not living that way, they are dead.

One has to wait for wisdom; one cannot ask for it. If you ask, you will get only knowledge. Wait, and wait patiently. Wisdom comes only when you are ripe. Wisdom comes of its own accord. God gives you only that much which you can contain and absorb, never more.

People are religious either out of greed or out of fear, and then they are not truly religious.

The man of God, the Sufi, the man of inner purity, lives love in two dimensions. One is the private dimension, utterly private, personal, intimate, in seclusion. You don't want it to be public. To make it public will be profane, will be sacrilegious, will be a crime. In meditation, in prayer, the Sufi contacts God in absolute privacy. (…) Pray to God, meditate on Him, in secrecy, in privacy – alone. And the other dimension is of service, of loving His creatures. (…) Pour your love openly to this world, and pour your love in privacy to Him – and you become a Sufi. And the function of the Master is to give you these two dimensions of love. (…) The ultimate crescendo of these two loves is freedom – freedom from misery, freedom from mind, freedom from body, freedom from coming back again into the world – freedom from all kinds of imprisonments. That freedom is the goal. (…) Love always gives freedom.

Mahavir has defined religion as the nature of things. Nothing can be done. Fire is hot and water is cool. Don't try to impose your will on the nature of things. That is what the stupid man goes on doing – and that is how he creates misery for himself, that is how he creates hell. The wise man is one who relaxes with the nature of things, who follows the nature of things. And when you follow the nature of things, no shadow is cast. There is no enemy; you befriend all things, because you see their necessity. (…) This is the meaning of surrender.

Two things are needed that make a person a Master, a bodhisattva. First, that he should go to the peak, to the sunlit peaks of consciousness; and second, that he should be able to find his way back to the dark valleys – because people are living there.

Life is non-purposive. It is not going anywhere; it has no goal. The journey is the goal itself.

Truth is one, but interpretations are many and can be millions. Truth is one, but the people who see truth are different; their eyes give different angles. (…) Truth is one and religiousness is one, but the moment it descends on earth, it takes a form. That form is going to be different.

Satsang means always choosing the company of the superior. The mind will help you to choose the company of the inferior. Be alert and avoid this, because with the inferior, you will become inferior. More and more, the ray of consciousness will be lost in darkness. Always choose the superior; move towards the superior. But your ego will feel hurt. The ego has to be left. Satsang means living against the ego, always seeking the superior. (…) Remember this, (…) always seek the superior. Then, by and by, one step, another step, and you will be able to encounter Jesus. And only if you can encounter Jesus will you be able to encounter God.

Truth is realized through three states: assimilation, independence and creativity. (…) From the camel to the lion, it is evolution. From the lion to the child, it is revolution. A Master is needed at that stage.

Truth reflects only in a meditative consciousness, not in a speculative consciousness, never. The moment you think, you go astray.

Enlightened people can be seen only against the darkness. (…) You can count your enlightened people on fingers, (…) because the greater mass of people have remained in immense darkness.

Listening to me, you are under an operation. It is not a teaching; it is penetrating into your being.

Whenever truth happens, it has to be communicated. It is its intrinsic necessity. Just as when a flower blooms, the fragrance is spread; in the spreading of the fragrance is the beginning of a tradition. (…) My whole effort here will be this: to create the tradition as clearly as possible, so nobody can confuse you easily, so you don't get confused easily.

The heart is an adventurer, the explorer of mysteries, the discoverer of all that is hidden. The heart is always on a pilgrimage. (…) it has an innermost discontent, a spiritual discontent. It never settles anywhere. (…) The heart is satisfied only when it has come to the Ultimate. (…) The mundane cannot satisfy it.

When you trust, your unconscious starts revealing many things to you. It reveals itself only to the trusting mind, only to the trusting being, only to the trusting consciousness. Religion is the fragrance of this trust.

Man is rooted in existence. Saying 'no' is poisoning your own system.

Life is inexplicable; life is a mystery – so, whenever one is alive, one is mysterious.

You cannot understand your own inner guide; hence the Master on the outside is needed.

On the inner journey, if you trust, something or other will always happen and will help your growth. You will be provided for. Whatsoever is needed at a particular time will be given to you, never before.

Both the inner and the outer are created by imagination. In reality, there is nothing inner and nothing outer; it is all one. (…) let me say it in a paradoxical way: the inner is realized only when both the inner and the outer disappear. (…) The Ultimate is a mystery and it remains a mystery, and there is no way to demystify it.

Whenever somebody has arrived to truth, he speaks a simple language. (…) Whenever somebody pretends that he has known truth, he creates a big jargon. That jargon functions like a cloud. You cannot find out what really is the matter, what is being said.

Man is always in crisis; man is crisis, constant. It is not accidental; it is essential. Man's very being consists of crisis; hence the anxiety, the tension, the anguish. (…) Your being has an intrinsic discontent; I call it divine discontent.

You have to go on moving. The movement creates problems, because the movement means you have to go on dying to that which you know; you have to go on dying to the past. (…) Man is constantly dying and constantly being born; each moment is a death and a birth. In man, death and birth are complementary. (…) It is the same life energy; it is the same breath – death is exhalation; birth is inhalation. (…) Man has to go on leaving the past; man has to go on searching; man has to nourish his search. But man has invented many, many things to avoid it; man has invented many philosophies. Philosophy is a distraction – it never poses the real problem before you; it creates new problems to avoid the problem. (…) The real problem is only one: how to go on continuously dying to the past? (…) Philosophy distracts; theology deceives.

Real religion has only one single purpose, one single question: 'Who am I?' Drop all other questions. Put your total energy into one question: 'Who am I?' (…) Don't dissipate your energy – (…) go into the mystery that you are; penetrate that mystery. Let that become your only work in life. Knowing it, all is known. Being it, you have arrived.

The society is not interested in the child, in the individual; the society is interested in its own structure persisting – (…) it is all for the collective. (…) The society has made you into a divided house, divided against itself. (…) Drop the division; the division is the whole problem.

Autobiographies are a species of fiction. Autobiographies should be counted as fiction, nothing else.

Lies have to be repeated again and again, otherwise you will forget them. That's why it is said that if you want to lie, you need a good memory. (…) Lies have to be repeated; only then can they live – otherwise they disappear.

Once your watching has become total, the past disappears. And the disappearance of the past is satori.

Consciousness is original; mind is always repetitive and unoriginal.

A transformation happens through watching your mind. (…) But that is not renunciation; that is not renouncing anything. Something simply withers away; something becomes utterly stupid and drops. Something simply falls; you cannot hold it anymore because it is so stupid.

My sannyasins have to remain in the world as they are. All that I teach is: become more alert, aware, watchful. (…) Watching disconnects you from the mind; watching puts the mind off. And once you have risen above the mind like a Himalayan peak, you are the master. That is the goal of a sannyasin.

The moment you do something, you have lost your watchfulness. Doing means you become engaged; doing means you become cooperative. And there are two types of cooperation: you can either be for, or you can be against. Both are cooperative; in both ways, you become entangled.

The phony is appreciated by the society. The phony becomes the saint; the phony becomes the great leader; the phony becomes the mahatma. And everybody starts following the phony. The phony is your ideal. That's why you are unable to know yourself.

Be the truth that you are, and you will be liberated; you will be liberated from all illusions, from all mirages. Each moment, be the truth that you are.

Need arises out of your insensitivity, out of your unintelligence. If you are intelligent, then life is enough.

To be a disciple needs guts. To be a disciple means one is courageous enough to dissolve oneself. It is no ordinary matter. And unless you are capable of becoming a disciple, you will never become a Master.

The Master leaves of his own accord. He starts dropping out of your existence; he starts disappearing more and more and more, because now you are ready to go on your own.

All are sleep-walkers, somnambulists, and so are you. (…) Man is a machine. Man as he is is utterly unconscious. He is nothing but his habits, the sum total of his habits. Man is a robot. Man is not yet man – unless consciousness enters into your being, you will remain a machine.

People have expectations; people live through expectations. (…) Masters don't fit with any kind of expectation.

Truth is a constant remembering. Truth is not forgetting for a single moment that God is; only God is.

All the great scriptures of the world are songs of the Divine. But you will understand them only if you have understood silence. Not by going into the scriptures will you understand them, but by going into your own silence.

The very desire to be free keeps one unfree. Every desire is a chain, a bondage, an imprisonment. No desire can ever be fulfilled. By dropping the desire, its fulfillment happens. (…) Transformation is possible only by relaxing into that which is. Unconditionally accepting yourself brings transformation. (…) By repressing anything, you will create a wound in your being. (…) parts of your being become separate from you – you have separated them on your own. And the more fragmentary you are, the more miserable you will be. The first step towards bliss is to be one.

Nothing that is experienced as a fact has to be denied reality. In order to accomplish that, consciousness must first disidentify from all fixed conceptual selves with which it has identified itself, because if it holds to being some fixed and enduring conceptual self, there will be no tolerance for those experiential realities which are in contradiction with this fixed, conceptual, official self. If you have a certain idea of how you should be, then you cannot accept the experiential truths of your being. (…) It is the ideal that creates the problem. If you don't have any ideals, then there is no problem at all. (…) But anything that you throw into your unconsciousness will go on functioning from there; it will go on creating problems for you. It is like a disease that you have pushed inwards. (…) If a wound is coming to the surface, it is good, because on the surface it can be healed; there is a possibility that it might disappear – it is on the way of being healed. If you force it inwards, if you don't allow it to come to the surface, then it is going to become a cancer. Even a small disease, repressed, can become a dangerous disease. No disease should ever be repressed. But the repression is natural if you have some ideal; any ideal will do. (…) Don't carry ideals. (…) Ideals create hypocrisy in people. (…) Hypocrisy is the shadow of the ideal. (…) The bigger the ideal, the bigger the hypocrisy. (…) Sacrifice fantasies to reality, drop all ideals, and then life starts becoming integrated. All the rejected fragments start coming home; the repressed starts surfacing. For the first time, you start feeling a kind of togetherness; you are no longer falling apart. (…) My purpose here, my function here, is to take all ideals away from you. (…) Ideals are functioning as blocks; the more idealistic a person is, the more blocked he is. (…) My effort here is to send your roots deep into the soil of truth.

Self-communion is the base of all joy. (…) Only communion with psychological pain opens the door for its liberation and transcendence. (…) All that is painful has to be accepted; a dialogue has to be created with it. It is you. There is no other way to go beyond it; the only way is to absorb it. (…) Only full acceptance is its ending. (…) There must be no sense of avoidance, resistance, condemnation, justification, distortion or attachment in regard to what arises, but only a choiceless awareness, and self-communion is established. A choiceless awareness – that is the ultimate key to open the innermost mystery of your being.

The presence of Jesus makes people feel bankrupt. (…) Jesus is a kind of disturbance; his presence cannot be ignored. (…) Rather than rising higher, people destroy Buddha, they destroy Jesus, so that they can again fall asleep and dream their so-called sweet dreams.

In love, sometimes sex will be a part. In prayer, sex will disappear completely. Love is the bridge between sex and prayer. Don't get stuck on the bridge; go beyond sex – and all going beyond is always going through. Don't reject; anything rejected remains hanging around you like a loadstone.

The claim of tradition is basically anti-truth. (…) Truth cannot be transferred. (…) It arises in each individual's own being; it is a flowering of your own heart. (…) No true religion can ever be a tradition; every true religion is bound to be a revolution, a rebellion. (…) Truth cannot be caused.

Be aware of the being; that is growth. Growing inwards is growth; reaching inwards is growth.

To be an ego is to fall from your reality – the original sin. (…) Identification is the fall. (…) Ego-self arises out of identification; Self arises out of disidentification. And this is the whole art of religion. (…) The real Self is universal.

Move into consciousness. (…) Just go on cutting yourself off from the content. Slowly, slowly, the bridge is broken. The day you recognize the fact that you are never the content, but always the consciousness, you have arrived home. (…) Contemplation means the process of cutting yourself off from the mind, from the content. (…) Through disidentification, cutting yourself off from the mind and its contents, you become Christ. You are no longer outgoing; the inner journey has started. You have turned towards the source; you are coming home.

You will not reach to God as virtuous, because that is the ego.

Don't become too attached to things here. Whether seven days or seventy years, it doesn't matter: soon you will be gone, and all that you have accumulated will be lost. You have come empty-handed; you will go empty-handed. If you can live empty-handed, if you can live in awareness, God is all yours.

Religion is not an accidental phenomenon. It is not going to disappear from the world; no communism, no fascism can make it disappear. Religion is going to remain, because it is very essential.

The first step has to be that of self-knowledge. (…) Truth liberates; substitutes for truth create prisons. The ego is the greatest prison that man has yet invented; you are all feeling suffocated, crushed. (…) Your ego is a manufactured phenomenon. (…) "I am this", "I am that" – you are bringing more and more bricks to make the prison called ego. And this is what we go on doing our whole life.

That's what meditation is all about – just sitting silently, doing nothing. Thoughts arise; you watch. Desires arise; you watch. You remain the watcher. You don't become the victim of the desires and the thoughts that are arising; you remain the watcher. You remain the context of all contexts; you remain the space before which everything appears.

If you really want to search for the real self, don't get attached to any commitment, to any program, to any idea. Remain unattached, flexible, fluid. (…) Remain in a state of meltedness; don't become committed to any form or name. (…) Never become crystallized; if you become crystallized in something, you are encaged. Remain free; remain freedom. All identity creates fixation, and every fixation, every identification, is a liability. The more fixed one's identity, the less the experience of which one is capable. The point is not to be positional. I am not saying to become unthinking. Remain intelligent, capable of thinking, but never get identified with any thought. Use the thought as a tool, as an instrument; remember that you are the master. Not to be attached to whatever position one has at any particular moment is the beginning of self-knowledge. One is; one experiences aliveness to the extent to which one can transcend particular positions and assume other viewpoints. That's what I mean by remaining fluid, flowing. One should remain available to the present. Die to the past each moment, so that nothing about you remains fixed. Don't carry a character around yourself; all characters are armors, imprisonments. The real man of character is characterless – he has consciousness, but no character. (…) And only a free consciousness can know the true self.

The times of confusion and chaos are the greatest times to live in. When the society is static, there is not much to live for, to live with. When a society is secure and there is no confusion and there is no chaos, then people live a dull, drab, dragging life – comfortable, convenient, stable, but not alive. It is only in times of chaos that great things can happen, because people are loose, uprooted. (…) But it can destroy yourself too. If you are not intelligent, the confusion, the chaos will destroy you. (…) The society is disappearing; the family is disappearing – now it is very difficult. Unless you are capable of being an individual, it is going to be difficult to live. Only individuals will survive. Now people who have become too accustomed to slavery, accustomed to being commanded, accustomed to being ordered by somebody else, people who have become too much accustomed to father-figures, they will be in a state of insanity.

The false gurus, the false so-called masters, provide you with better sleeping pills. They provide you with psychological strategies to remain comfortably asleep; they give you lullabies, so that you can live a drugged life. Their methods are nothing but psychological tranquilizers, non-medicinal tranquilizers. (…) I don't provide you with any consolations. You have to be shocked; you have to be brought to consciousness. (…) The unreal has become a thick foliage around you. (…) Only if you are shocked, only if somebody is there who can destroy you, who can destroy you as you are, only then will your real being come out.

I cannot be supported by the society. It is a sheer miracle that I am existing; it is very illogical. I should not be here at all.

The real man lives his life without any guilt. Sex appears one day and disappears one day. (…) Sex has existence only from the fourteenth to the forty-second year, if things go naturally. But they don't go naturally. (…) Guilt is created; sex energy becomes repressed, goes underneath into the unconscious. Now even at the age of eighty-two, it will remain. You will remain sex-obsessed; it can't leave you now. (…) The more you talk about celibacy, the more sex-obsessed you will become. If you accept sex as a natural phenomenon, you need not talk about celibacy; it comes in its own time. Just as youth turns into old age, sex turns into celibacy. Celibacy is sex truly lived; it is the fragrance of sex lived truly. Celibacy is sexuality having become mature. Otherwise, hypocrisy continues.

Mind is the original fall – the fall from the state of being. Mind is the original sin. To be in the mind is to be in the world; not to be in the mind is to be in God. (…) Meditate over three words: being, doing, having. From being to having, and doing is the process of coming from being to having. Being is God; having is the world; doing is the process of falling from being to having. (…) The mind is a doer. Watch your own mind, and you will understand. (…) Doing is the process by which the mind is created; it is condensed doing. Hence, meditation means a state of non-doing. (…) From being to doing to having – this is how Adam-consciousness arrives in the world. To move backwards, from having to doing, from doing to being – this is what Christ-consciousness means. (…) Sufis have a tremendously significant message for the world. They say that the perfect man is one who is capable of moving from being to doing to having (descending) to doing to being (ascending), and so on. When the circle is perfect, then the man is perfect. One should be capable of doing. I am not saying that you should become incapable of doing – that will not be of any value; that will be simply impotence. You should be capable of doing, but you should not be engrossed by it. You should not become involved in it; you should not become possessed by it – you should remain the master. And I am not saying that all that you have has to be dropped; I am not saying to renounce all that you have. Use it, but don't be used by it; that's all. Then, the perfect man is born. I call that perfect man a sannyasin; he will be both Adam plus Christ. (…) Man needs to become a totality, a wholeness. And my definition of being holy is nothing but to be whole – to be capable to come into the world, and yet to remain above it, beyond it; to be capable to use the mind, but yet to remain centered in your being. Then, the mind is an instrument of immense value.

Remember non-identification; remain a witness. Always remember to remain a witness. (…) Once you become identified with any stuff of the mind, you are trapped in a prison. Then you can go on changing and re-arranging the stuff again and again, but nothing will happen. That's what people go on doing: improving upon themselves, creating a beautiful character – but the basic thing has not yet been done. They are simply rearranging the stuff of the mind; (…) it remains the same stuff. The sinner and the so-called saint are not very different; both are different arrangements of the same mind. The real sage is one who has become aware that he is not the mind at all. The idea of sin arises in him, and he remains aloof; and the idea of being a saint arises in him, and he remains aloof. He gets identified with nothing – anger or compassion, hate or love, good or bad. He remains non-judgmental; he does not condemn anything in the mind; he does not praise anything in the mind. If you are just a witness, what is the point of condemning or praising anything? Condemnation and praise are just futile. He remains cool and collected and centered. The mind goes on raving around him, just from past momentum. (…) It goes on revolving and revolving for a few months, even for a few years. But if you can remain a silent watcher, a watcher on the hills, then slowly, slowly, the momentum is lost and the mind comes to a stop. The day the mind stops, you have arrived. (…) Once the mind stops, the whole energy that has remained involved with it is released. And that energy is tremendous; it starts falling on you. It is a great benediction; it is grace.

Believers and disbelievers, both are fanatics. (…) This is real revolution: jumping from the mind to the being. (…) If doing is the process of falling from being to having, then non-doing will be the process of coming back home.

Non-doing is not inactivity; it is not inaction. Action is there, because action is life. If action completely disappears, you will be dead. (…) One has to become a non-doer. (…) The non-doer is one who has relaxed with the river, who is floating with the river, flowing with the river, one who has become part of the river, one who has no individual destiny. That is the meaning of non-doing. Now the destiny of the total is his destiny. (…) Action continues, but the actor disappears; a non-doer is acting as a vehicle of the Divine, of the Whole. He lives the same life, but now he has a totally different quality; there is a different flavor to it.

The society cannot allow much freedom to people, much fire to people. It needs dead people, dull people, unintelligent people, so they can go on and on working for others' interests – for the priest, for the politician, they go on working. It needs millions of slaves. It is really a miracle that, once in a while, a Buddha, a Jesus, a Sanai, escapes from the clutches of the society and becomes independent. (…) only when you have become completely indifferent to what people say about you will you be able to face God; your energy is available to move God-wards. Otherwise you remain facing people – your eyes and your ears are outgoing; they are not ingoing.

Children are childish, but your so-called old people are just as childish as children, sometimes even more so. Maturity is very rare; people remain immature. If you are interested only in toys – possessing this, possessing that, becoming famous, reaching some political power, prestige, having money – if you are interested in these things, you remain part of this stupid world of futile fruitless pursuits. But those pursuits keep you engaged; they keep you occupied. They are intoxicants. (…) All that is needed is the understanding that whatsoever you have been doing up to now, and whatsoever you are doing now, is futile. Let this sink into your heart as deeply as possible, that whatsoever you are doing is futile. (…) The only real thing in the world is how much being you have got. Having is the fallen state; being is Christ risen, resurrected. (…) You can have only one world, this or that: either the world of dreams, or the world of waking. And people have chosen the world of dreams. (…) The world of waking will come only when the world of dreams has completely gone away, totally gone away. Even if a slight thin layer of dreams is there, it is not possible to see the real.

It is the essential truth of every seeker's life: every seeker has to die on the cross, and after three days of waiting… the resurrection. (…) Only by dying as Adam do you unlock the door to Christ-consciousness in you; only by dying as a mind do you unlock the door of being.

Only by thinking for yourself, only by looking into things for your own self, will you be able, slowly, slowly, to awaken. Otherwise, this dream is going to continue. (…) People will help you to remain mediocre, because that is how they can go on exploiting you. If you can find somebody who is ready to help you to sharpen your intelligence, then be with that person; you have found a friend. It is very difficult to find a friend in this world; this world is very unfriendly. Everybody is interested in his own exploiting – and people who want to exploit you cannot want you to become intelligent. My effort here is to sharpen your intelligence as much as possible.

Only one thing has to be remembered: be authentic; be sincere to yourself. Declare your truth, whatsoever the cost. Even if life is risked, risk it, because truth is far more valuable than anything, because truth is true life. Don't compromise. Risk all – be authentic! (…) Melt yourself down in this search, and let the ego melt. (…) Be open, and God starts pouring into you like wine from every nook and corner of existence; (…) then life is a celebration.

I am not against life. I am not teaching you any suicide. I am against renouncing the world. I would like you to live in the world, to live more totally, to live more intensely. But then, labels and names will be needed. Then what has to be done? Don't get identified with them, that's all.

The ego exists through goals; what name you give to the goal does not matter. You can call it money, you can call it power, you can call it prestige, or you can call it infinity, vastness, God – it is the same ego trip. Now it has become even more subtle and more poisonous, because the more subtle the ego is, the more dangerous it is. (…) Sannyas means dropping all goals; sannyas means living life in utter ordinariness. (…) Living life in its pure ordinariness is sannyas.

Let love move through the process of meditation. (…) Make your motives conscious; bring them to light, and they will disappear. (…) the only way to transform your love is to bring all the motivations from the unconscious into the conscious. Slowly, slowly, those motives will die. And when love is unmotivated, then love is the greatest thing that can ever happen to anybody. Then love is something of the Ultimate, of the beyond.

Everybody is brought up with the idea of raging against existence, because that is the only way to create the ego – to fight against existence. Only through fighting with existence is the ego created, because in fighting you become separate; in fighting you start swimming upstream. Then, the stream and you are enemies: you have to conquer the stream, and any idea of conquering is very fundamental in creating ego. (…) Man becomes dignified only when man is not. When man disappears as man, and allows existence to flow through him, then there is dignity. (…) When you are not, there is splendor. If you stop fighting, you will disappear – automatically, you will disappear.

Love is your being; love represents the innermost core of existence itself.

There is something like the insecurity of security. Whatsoever you think is secure, is not; deep down, there is an undercurrent of insecurity. (…) People are accumulating rubbish. Money, knowledge, virtue – people are accumulating all kinds of rubbish. They think it is their security; they think it is going to save them. In fact, they will be drowned in it; they will be drowned because of it. (…)

Carrying such unnecessary luggage, they will always remain in the dark valleys of life. (…) All is insecure. You only pretend that things are secure. Your security is just a camouflage; behind it all is insecurity. Nothing is secure; all our security is superficial, a façade; behind it is insecurity. (…) When you drop the fear of insecurity, insecurity disappears; it exists in the fear of it. (…) Throw away the fear of insecurity; throw away the desire to be secure, and you are secure. (…) All security is in God, with God, with the Whole. If you exist separately as a self, you are insecure. If you forget about yourself, if you merge into the Whole, you are secure. In that union is security. (…) this is the basic evil: to search for security, the selling or trading of aliveness for survival. (…) the obsession with security cripples you, paralyzes you. (…) you will not be able to live at all; you will at the most survive. (…) to trade aliveness for survival is the fundamental evil.

The best way to waste your energy, your time, your life, is to go on thinking of the past and the future. (…) You are constantly forgetting to live here-now, and that is the only life there is. You go on rushing towards the past or towards the future, which are both meaningless; this is a simple leakage of energy. And then, you are impotent in the present; empty, hollow. You cannot connect with the present, and the present is the only door to the Divine.

You will have to create a different kind of space. A different space is needed; that space is called trust, surrender, let-go, faith, love, or whatever you want to call it. Once that space is created, you start moving on a totally different plane. You enter a new dimension: deathless is that dimension; fearless is that dimension. And then you live totally, boldly. (…) The religious person is one who creates space for God to enter him.

Intelligence is just an openness of being, a capacity to see without prejudice. (…) That's why it is so utterly different from intellectuality.

God cannot be conquered; you can only allow yourself to be conquered by God.

Renounce respectability; it is a bullshit. It doesn't matter whether people respect you or not. All that matters in the ultimate sense is whether you respect yourself or not. And you can respect yourself only if you have lived totally, passionately. And if you respect yourself, and you are courageous enough to live life in all its dimensions, God is happy with you. And when you enter into His presence, you will enter whole; you will enter healthy; you will enter as a total, orgasmic, organic unity.

My sole concern is religion; my major concern is religion. But I will comment on other things too, because I take life in its totality. (…) And a part of it is concerned with politics; you have to become aware of that too.

The more knowledgeable you become, the less wonder is felt. (…) Your inner space becomes so full of knowledge that wonder disappears; wonder has no space left to abide in you. (…) the moment wonder dies in you, religion dies in you, because religion consists of wonder and awe. Knowledge demystifies life and existence; and religion exists only when life is a mystery.

God will not be yours, as long as you cling to the soul and life, (…) to the idea of separation. (…) God is union, the union with existence – unio mystica.

The sage is nonexistential; he does not exist as a separate entity.

The doorway of the friend is closed because of our beliefs and disbeliefs.

When you were born, you were born tabula rasa – clean, pure, just a space. You were born an empty sky. And then clouds gathered, clouds and clouds, and all the purity and all the openness and all the space was lost. (…) Sannyas means to create that space again.

Christianity creates guilt in people, tremendous guilt. And if you are guilty, you cannot love yourself – you will hate yourself; you would like to destroy yourself. (…) Out of guilt, only destruction can arise, only suicide. (…) The whole strategy of the so-called religions consists of making you feel unworthy. Once you are unworthy, shaken, you lose confidence in yourself, you lose power, you become weak, you become fearful. And all kinds of exploitations become possible.

A prayer that comes out of fear is false. Prayer is true only when it is a fragrance of love.

I teach you self-love. (…) The person who loves himself cannot carry the ugly burden of the ego. (…) He loves himself so much that he cannot carry this poison inside him. (…) Self-love is not selfishness; self-love is unselfishness. In self-love, the self disappears; only love remains. And then you have created the context. Now many, many miracles are going to happen to you; now nothing is impossible for you, because love is the magic.

I have no views about caring, compassion, and service to the community. My whole effort is to transform the individual; I am utterly focused on the individual. And if the individual becomes luminous, then these things come naturally – compassion, caring, service.

Please don't control, because all control means control by the ego. Remain relaxed; remain natural.

All contradictions are apparent. If you meditate a little bit, you will see that there is no contradiction.

It seems so impossible to be contented the way we are, because the mind can always imagine better things. (…) You can always imagine, and your imagination makes you discontented with yourself as you are.

Growth has nothing to do with ambition, comparison, competition. Growth has something to do with energy; growth is an energy phenomenon. When energy is no longer wasted in competition and conflict, you become a reservoir; you accumulate much energy. Out of that energy comes creativity.

In my philosophy of life, only two things are valuable: one is meditation; the other is love.

The society teaches you doing as a way of having more, and having more as a way of becoming really rich, really contented. The truth is just the opposite: the more you have, the more you feel your inner poverty, in contrast.

The more learned a person is, the more confused he is. If you read the Vedas and the Koran and the Bible and the Dhammapada, not only will the information be of no help to you, but it will create more confusion in you. (…) You will not be able to understand the truth, because you don't know what the truth is. (…) Who is going to interpret? You cannot understand more than you know; you can understand only that much which you know on your own. (…) The real process is first to know within, and then go into the Vedas and the Gita and the Koran, and they will all become witnesses to your experience; they will authenticate your experience.

The real Master does not impart information; he imparts being.

The ambitious person cannot turn in; it is impossible. The competitive person cannot turn in – he is always looking at the other; he is always at war. How can he be meditative?

Non-identification is what is meant by witnessing.

One should be balanced. My sannyasins have to be extrovert introverts, introvert extroverts – both together.

The person who is negative about himself cannot be positive about anybody else either, because the faults that he finds in himself, he will find in others; in fact, he will magnify them in others. (…) Accept yourself; otherwise you will become a hypocrite.

Knowledge can never become a bridge; it is always a wall. (…) Love wells up in the heart. And love is another name for understanding. (…) When the heart is awake, it starts flowing in all directions. It loves the Whole – it simply loves; it is love. (…) Religion is a celebration. You cannot be indoctrinated in religion, because religion is not a doctrine at all. It is a very mad love affair.

A person can wake up in death only if he has tried hard to wake up in life, if his whole life has been a consistent effort to find a center in his being, a persistent effort to know "who am I?"

Only the head can be dominated; only heads can be reduced to slaves. The heart is always the king, the master.

You want to satisfy everybody – your father, your friends, your priests, your politicians. You are trying to satisfy everybody, and in satisfying everybody, you are destroying your own soul. (…) You have been listening to good advice from every nook and corner. Everybody is giving you rotten traditional ideas. Everybody is conditioning you, hypnotizing you. And because the crowd is big and you are alone, unless you bring your energies together, you will not be able to get rid of this prison, the prison of the crowd. Unless you sharpen your intelligence a little more, unless you start meditating a little more, you will not be able to break the chains that the society goes putting on you. And they go on telling you it is just for your welfare. They go on saying, "we are serving you", but they are destroying you. And the strangest thing is that you also think that they are well-wishers – they think they are well-wishers, and you think they are well-wishers. (…) The really religious person is one who gets out of entanglement of the mass psychology, of the mass hypnosis. The mass conditions you – rebel against it. Go out of this mass conditioning; become an individual. Then only can you remember from where you come, because only then will you know who you are.

Obedience has been one of the greatest calamities that has befallen humanity. One should be capable of disobeying. (…) In fact, only the person who is capable of disobeying carries value. The person who cannot say 'no', his 'yes' is always impotent. Only the person who can say 'no', his 'yes' has power, meaning, significance. He says 'yes' only when he means it. And one should be alert enough to say 'no' to all that takes you deeper and deeper into the mire of darkness, of blindness, of superstitiousness. And one should be capable of saying 'yes' to anything that takes you towards the light, towards love, towards life.

You remain a beggar; existence would like you to be an emperor.

Playing with toys – money, power, prestige; all toys. And all is vain, because death will take away everything. And you know it! And still you go on clinging.

No sexual contact can ever be satisfying, fulfilling. It brings more and more frustration.

People are living in imagination, not in reality. If you live in reality, God is everywhere. (…) Don't live in thoughts! Live in silence – and only the heart knows how to be still, because in the heart, there are no thoughts. Thoughts cannot penetrate into that innermost shrine. No noise ever penetrates there; it is absolute silence; it is virgin silence. Move into the heart, (…) and your whole life will become full of light, full of life, full of love, full of energy. (…) Until you start feeling God everywhere, you are asleep.

One has to give up one's fears if one wants to live in love, because it is the same energy that becomes fear and that becomes love. Drop the fears, and the same energy that was contained in the fear is released and becomes a flower of love.

I have nothing to offer to you – only nothing. But that is the greatest thing that can be given as a gift.

You cannot teach religion; you can only create the context.

The fish in the sea is not thirsty.

In this small life span, seventy or eighty years, how are you going to deal with the past which is so huge, immense – millions of years? There is no need to struggle, no need to fight. The wise way is to slip out of it. (…) Rebellion consists of the present, and only the present. It has no concern with the past; it has no concern with the future.

The real seeker wants the Master to go into his innermost core and stir the sleeping soul.

The animal is happy because there is no consciousness. Consciousness first brings pain, because suddenly you become aware of a thousand and one problems facing you. You have to encounter them; you have to solve them or dissolve them. All peace disappears. But human consciousness is still worthwhile. I agree with Socrates who said, "I would like to be a discontented Socrates rather than a contented pig." (…) To know discontent, one needs consciousness.

Man is in a kind of drunkenness, awake and yet not awake. Man sees a little bit, and yet everything seems to be dark, just shadows moving in the dark are felt. But nothing is absolutely clear; there is no clarity, no transparency, no light. This is the state of man. And we cannot go back, because there is no possibility of going back. Man tries hard to go back, through sex, through food, through alcohol, through drugs; man tries somehow to drown this little bit of consciousness that has arisen in him. But it comes back again and again, because whatsoever has been learnt has been learnt forever – it cannot be unlearnt. It has happened in your being; now there is no way to discard it. You have to live with it. The only possibility is to move ahead, to grow more into awareness.

You are dreaming, desiring, thinking, but you know nothing. And the less you know, the more you believe in your dreams – because one has to keep oneself occupied. The less you know, the more you desire – just to avoid your inner ignorance and emptiness. You rush in all directions; you go on rushing – you don't give yourself a little rest, because the rest seems too explosive, dangerous.

Finding at least one or two hours out of the hustle and bustle of life, sitting silently, doing nothing, you may start moving inwards; you may start remembering something, the origins – because deep down the memory of where you come from is still there. You may have forgotten it, but it is there – maybe covered with rubbish, all kinds of rubbish, but that rubbish can be removed. That's what meditation is all about: removing the rubbish – of thoughts, memories, dreams, desires, imaginations. And if you can remove all this rubbish that your head has gathered, your heart will start remembering. And once the source is remembered, the goal is known; (…) the source is the goal. We have to reach the same place from where we come.

Mad people have their own logic. Blind people have their own logic. People who are fast asleep have their own logic – logic that supports their sleep. (…) You can go on supporting your illusions, very logically.

Only mediocre, stupid people can follow the masses, can fulfill their expectations. A man who has any courage, a man who has any guts, is bound to be a rebel.

In this world, you will find two types of people: one who is just boringly religious, flat; another who is just worldly, but depressed. The pseudo-religious at least hopes that something great is going to happen after death, but the worldly man does not even have that hope – he is very depressed. You can see this – one in India; the other in the West.

Those who have only known the known have known nothing; those who have only seen the seeable have not seen anything. Unless you become capable of seeing the unseen and hearing the unheard, you have not come to your full potential yet. God gives you a great gift of potential. The only way to return the gift in gratitude and thankfulness is to make the potential actual. Be what your seed is carrying within you. Become it; be it.

Society makes you unworthy, because that is the only way to exploit you – to make you feel unworthy. Then you will try hard to become worthy, because that is the only way to gain self-respect. And to become worthy, you will follow the dictates of the society. Society creates fear in you, and then you are ready to yield, to bow down to any kind of nonsense.

The world is still intoxicating you – and you cannot be a sannyasin unless you are utterly frustrated with the world. (…) A sannyasin is a person who lives in the world, but lives meditatively, and meditation creates a distance. Then you can go on doing all kinds of things, but you don't become identified with them. (…) I teach transcendence, not escapism. (…) To live in awareness is the way of the sannyasin.

The world only promises; it never delivers the goods. That's its illusoriness; that's why in the East, we call it maya. (…) Sannyas is seeing the reality of the world, that it never fulfills, that it cannot fulfill, that it is beyond its capacity to fulfill… then, one turns in. One has been a beggar begging from this door to that door; when one turns in, begging disappears – one becomes an emperor. Then all is yours.

Each society has created its own ideas of good and bad, and they go on changing. They are utilitarian, remember. (…) There are ideas and ideas, but all ideas are human.

Religion does not think that life needs any answers. Life needs to be lived in its totality; (…) that is the only way to know it.

Existence remains alive through the tension of the polar opposites: the negative and the positive, man and woman, birth and death, darkness and light, love and hate, religion and science. These are polar opposites. Life needs them; without them, life will be a stagnant pool; it will not be a dialectical process anymore. Life is dialectics; it moves through thesis and antithesis, and again the synthesis becomes a thesis and creates an antithesis. That's how life goes on progressing.

The average mental age of human beings is only twelve years.

All meditation is nothing but an effort to know the witness. (…) When all thoughts disappear, and all desires are gone, and when there is nothing to witness, then you become aware of the witness. Then witnessing turns upon itself. Having nothing else to see, it starts seeing itself. If something remains there as an object, it remains focused on the object. Meditation is a process of taking all objects away from you; all contents of the mind are to be taken away. Slowly, slowly, one day… sudden emptiness.

What is important? It depends on you. If you ask me, to me, it is all the same. You can say that everything is important, or you can say that nothing is important. Both mean the same. Everything is ordinary, or everything is extraordinary. (…) Whichever attracts you more, that can become your path: 'no' can become your path; 'yes' can become your path. Kabir's path is that of 'yes'; Buddha's path is that of 'no'. But, really, 'yes' and 'no' are not significant. What is significant is totality. If you say 'yes' with your total being, it is totality that liberates. If you say 'no' with totality, it is totality that liberates. But it all depends on you. (…) It depends on you what is important. How can I say what is important? To me, nothing is, and everything is.

Once God is understood as significance, your life starts changing. (…) Then you start moving in a totally different way, in an altogether different dimension. If God is significance, then you have to create meaning in your life, because only meaning can meet the meaning. You have to create significance in your life, because only significance can meet the significance. You have to become more aware, more loving, more sensitive.

Religion can only be expressed through poetry, through music, through dance. Any other way of expressing religion falls short, is inadequate. The mysterious has to be indicated only by something mysterious. God cannot be approached through the mind of calculation, mathematics. It is not possible to approach God through prose. The door opens only when you approach Him through poetry.

The sane person moves in solitude; and the insane person searches for the crowd. And your religions are nothing but crowds.

A really religious person has no morality imposed upon himself. His morality arises out of his consciousness. He is not trying to do the right; he is not trying to avoid the wrong – he simply remains conscious, and acts out of his consciousness, and whatsoever he does is right. In fact, it is impossible to do anything wrong consciously.

Religion is based not in morality, but in meditation. Religion is rooted not in character, but in consciousness. A really religious person has no character at all – he is characterless. (…) he does not function out of his past; he acts moment-to-moment; he acts spontaneously. He has no ready-made formula; he has no routine. He does not act out of habits. (…) Creating consciousness, not habits, is religiousness.

Unless your heart responds, the head cannot become a bridge to God. (…) The ways of the head are controllable, manipulatable. Hence the society is interested in your head, not in your heart. The society wants you to understand that there is no heart, but only the head. (…) By heart is not meant the physical part, but hidden behind the physical, is the real heart. Don't be finished with the physical. (…) Corresponding to each physical phenomenon in you, there is a spiritual phenomenon.

I don't teach you the middle way; I teach you the total way. And then a balance comes of its own accord, and that balance has tremendous beauty and grace. (…) Nothing remains; everything passes by. The only thing that always abides is your witnessing. That witnessing brings balance, because you remain unidentified. Witnessing is balance.

What is needed is consciousness, not conscience. Conscience is a pseudo-thing, artificial, arbitrary. Conscience is created in you by the society. It is a subtle method of slavery. (…) The need is to drop the conscience and to develop consciousness. Drop all that you have been taught by others, and start searching and living on your own.

It is impossible to have beliefs and still live in peace. The belief is the root cause of all conflict. Only a world of agnostic seekers can be one. Believers cannot allow the world to be one. (…) Differing beliefs divide people. Belief is the way of division. (…) Beliefs have nothing to do with nature; beliefs are man-made. All beliefs are basically political, tactics, strategy, to manipulate the crowds, to control the crowds. (…) A real man does not believe; either he knows, or he doesn't know.

Religion has to be found by your own heart.

Knowledge is always old, and life is always fresh. Knowledge and life never meet.

Man can be natural and honest, but then beliefs have to be dropped – all kinds of beliefs have to be dropped. And dropping the beliefs, your energy is freed, and that same energy becomes enquiry, and that same energy can take you to the ultimate truth.

Thinking is a lower activity; seeing is a higher activity.

One fundamental law has to be understood: nothing can go backwards. At the most, you can pretend; at the most, you can deceive – but nothing can go backwards. (…) The only way is to grow towards the Divine; the only way is forwards. The only way is to become that which is your potential; the only way is to transform the potential into the actual. Man is potential God; and unless he becomes actual God, there is no possibility of contentment.

The true way is that of understanding your mind, not of dropping it. The true way is: sitting silently and watching the mind; (…) just be a witness to your mind. And, slowly, slowly, by witnessing it, you will understand what games it has been playing with you. You stop it from one door, it comes from another; you stop it from that door, it makes a third door – and it goes on and on, ad nauseam. (…) Mind jumps to such new faces, takes such new masks! (…) Watch. Don't renounce the world, and don't try to drop the mind. Just become more alert. In alertness, suddenly mind disappears, and with the mind disappears the whole world. And when there is no mind and no world, God is.

Man has been conditioned down the centuries for goals, destinations, purposes. (…) Because of these ideologies, you cannot allow yourself to relax in the moment. They go on goading you – you have to attain something; you have to achieve something. Your whole education system is a strategy of poisoning your consciousness; it is a strategy of driving you crazy after goals; it is a strategy of creating ambition in you. And ambition is neurosis. But this has been done for so long that it has become part and parcel of the human mind. That is why you go on thinking in terms of goal or destination. It is not you; it is the society that goes on thinking in you, through you, (…) and you are identified with them. You don't know that you are separate. (…) Mind is a social phenomenon; (…) it is social exploitation. It is society that makes a mind in you, and through that mind controls you, keeps you imprisoned, chained, reduces you to a slave. (…) Learn to be a witness to all that goes on in the mind. (…) those thoughts are the content of the consciousness, but they are not consciousness itself. And this is what meditation is all about: creating a distance between you and your mind.

Mind can only live in memories or projections, because mind can only exist in the past or in the future. Mind cannot exist here-now. (…) Mind has no present tense at all; either it is past, or it is future. It is always in the non-existential.

Existence utterly is; existence is transcendental – neither purpose nor no purpose; neither meaning nor no meaning. It is not going anywhere. There is no goal to life, and if you have a goal, then you are going against life, and you will suffer.

People are simply wasting away. Their lives could have become great oases, but they remain dry deserts.

We are always in the middle of life. Life has been there before you ever entered the stream, and life will be there when you are gone. You will know only a few glimpses in the middle. (…) There is no beginning, no end; life is an eternal continuum. Hence you cannot ever complete things. (…) But your attitude towards life still remains goal-oriented. (…) Once the goal grips you, you are in the hands of the mind. (…) Who is this devil who tempts Jesus in the desert? It is the mind. The devil is an ancient metaphor for the mind.

Intelligence is not intellect – intellect is part of the mind; intelligence is part of the heart. (…) What comes from outside, creates intellect; what comes from within, is intelligence. (…) Life's challenges are meant to provoke your intelligence into activity, to bring your intelligence above your intellect. Only new situations which your intellect cannot cope with, only such spaces which your knowledge has not heard about, can help to bring your intelligence to the surface. All that is needed is intelligence, understanding, awareness, and you will know you have come home. And great gratitude will arise in your being, and great thankfulness. That gratitude, that thankfulness, is prayer.

The West is too much interested in speed, too much in action. And the action is futile, because it is simply the occupation of a neurotic mind. The East is not interested in action at all; that is again another kind of neurosis, the opposite kind. People talk about renouncing the world, but they are just philosophizing about their laziness.

People keep themselves occupied the whole day, and then they fall asleep and become occupied in their dreams. Twenty-four hours a day, it is a constant occupation. Meditation means giving a few minutes to non-occupation.

Death will reveal to you your true identity. Death will take away all your masks and will reveal your original face. Death will for the first time make it possible for you to encounter your innermost, interiormost subjectivity as it is, without camouflage, without a pretense, without any pseudo-personality. Hence, everybody is afraid of death, and everybody is attracted. (…) Death is also a beginning. Each end is always a beginning, because nothing ever ends totally; nothing can ever end. Everything continues; only forms change. Your form will die, but you have something formless in you too. Your body will not be there, but you have something in you, within your body, which is not part of your body. Your earthly part will drop into the earth, dust unto dust, but you have something of the sky in you, something of the beyond, which will take a new journey, a new pilgrimage. Death creates fear if you think of the ego; and death appeals to you, attracts you, if you think of your true Self. So vaguely one remains attracted towards death – if you become clearly aware of it, it can become a transforming understanding; it can become a mutant force. (…) The meditator has to overcome fear. The meditator has to fall in love with death; the meditator has to invite death – the meditator has not to wait for it; he has to call it, because death is a friend to the meditator.

The mystic experience, the experience of unity with existence, is not as rare as people think, and the mystic experience has nothing to do with religion as such. It happens in many spaces which are not thought to be religious at all. (…) Remain available to the dimension of the mysterious.

To become means to become false; to become means to become that which you are not. To be is already the case. Man has not to become anything other than he is; he has to relax into his being and know the truth. (…) All becoming is the world; not to be a part of becoming is to be a sannyasin.

Man is the only conscious being, and consciousness has two possibilities: either it can become God-consciousness, then it is a benediction; or it can become self-consciousness, then it is a curse.

You have to learn to become egoless; you have to learn to melt into existence; you have to learn the path of surrender. (…) And slowly, slowly, you become a host. The day you are a host, the Guest comes. (…) without merging with God, you are going to remain discontented. Contentment, real contentment, has only one meaning – that is the meeting with the Guest.

Your sleep is not much of a rest. To know God is to know ultimate rest.

Being with God means only one thing: dissolving in Him, just as rivers come from the mountains and disappear into the ocean. (…) There is great nostalgia for all the memories and a great desire not to lose one's identity, but the river cannot go back.

Greed means postponing your life for tomorrow.

This is the situation. You are not yourself. You go on doing things – getting married, giving birth to children, bringing up children – and you are not yourself. You will do all the functions of your life and die – and you have never lived. (…) Somebody else lived in your place, and somebody else will die. (…) You are not yourself. You are not your faces. (…) Between birth and death, you have many faces which are not yours. (…) Start searching for who you are; begin the search for your original face.

Get out of the interference of others. (…) Get out of others' expectations. Don't go on fulfilling others' expectations; that is a very subtle slavery. (…) Everybody is making demands on you; nobody leaves you alone. (…) And the others who are expecting are not aware of what they are doing to you; they are simply expecting things which were expected from them. (…) Get out of all this bondage. This is what sannyas is all about: a declaration of freedom, a declaration to be oneself whatsoever the cost and whatsoever the consequences. (…) You are not here to fulfill others' expectations; you are here to live your authentic life.

A person who loves himself deeply becomes so blissful that his whole life becomes a prayer, a service, compassion. Only a blissful person can have compassion, and only a blissful person can have love.

Freedom simply means that you start living intelligently on your own – neither according to other people, neither against them. If you are against other people, you can never be free. Don't be against anybody, and don't be for anybody – simply live out of your own intelligence.

Don't get distracted by mosquitoes. (…) They are doing their thing; that much has to be accepted. They are not particularly against you; they are not particularly trying to disturb you. (…) Shake them off, throw them away – attentively, fully alert, but with no irritation. Irritation will disturb the meditation. (…) The real problem never comes from the outside; the real problem always comes from inner irritation.

Security is the greatest illusion there is. The more alive you are, the more insecure you are.

To write an autobiography seems to be almost impossible, because you always go on arranging your memories. When you look back, it is not the real past that you are looking at. It is no longer there – just your chosen memory of it. (…) All autobiographies are fiction.

Man without God is a corpse; man with God is a celebration. Minus God or plus God; these are the only two ways to live. Minus God, you are a negative, black hole. Minus God, you only pretend to live; you cannot live. (…) You go through all the empty motions, gestures; you act as if you are alive – but deep down, you know that you are not alive; life has not yet happened to you. Birth has happened, but not life. Life happens only when God has happened; then a man is twice-born. (…) Then a man really becomes a Brahmin – one who has known Brahma, one who has become one with God.

The devotee knows a totally different kind of restlessness than you have known. (…) his restlessness is not on the surface. On the surface, Kabir will be found utterly calm and quiet, but his heart is burning; his heart is on fire – deep down, he is carrying a storm: "I don't care about food, and I don't care about sleep. My whole concern is You; my whole concentration is You. Day in, day out, I only think about You. I simply wait at the door; I wait for You. The wind comes and knocks on the door; I rush to the door to open – maybe He has come? Dry leaves move on the street with the wind, I rush – maybe these are the sounds of His footsteps?"

Once the politician has got the means to influence your sleeping mind, he cannot leave you alone. At least right now, you are free to dream; soon the danger is that you will not even be free to dream. The government will go on influencing your dreams; it will allow you only to dream certain dreams; it will create dreams in you. (…) And if your unconscious becomes available to the politicians, man is utterly destroyed. (…) these new techniques in behaviorist psychology can destroy you in your psychology. (…) Right now at least, you have some privacy. Politicians are not even willing to give you that much privacy; they want to interfere; they want to poke into your dreams. But up to now, it has not happened much; they have succeeded in experimentation, but it has not been used on a wide scale. (1979)

The person who does not believe in anything can simply move beyond thoughts; the person who believes clings to thinking. (…) The man who cannot believe is in a better situation. (…) Belief becomes a disturbance.

The false ego which you have created by not looking in, by continuously looking out, is the root cause of fear. You will be afraid of all those spaces in which you have to look.

Man had always lived with nature. To live with nature is to live with God in an indirect way, because nature reflects God in a thousand and one ways. (…) man has remained constantly aware of some invisible, mysterious force behind it all. That force was called God. (…) Still when you go deep into the Himalayas, you again start feeling a kind of reverence, awe, wonder. Again, you start feeling something that was very easily available to the primitive man. The civilized man has lost something, because now we live in the man-made world where it is almost impossible to find a signature of God. How can you find God on asphalt roads? (…) How can you find God in machines, in technology? (…) even the greatest machine cannot give you the sense of the mysterious, of the miraculous. Even facing the greatest machine, you cannot feel awe; you cannot feel reverence; you cannot feel like falling on your knees and praying. And if you cannot feel like falling on your knees and praying once in a while, how can God remain a part of your being?

It takes time to recognize the fact that "I am no more". Sometimes it can take years to understand that the ego has been left somewhere on the path long before.

Choose your path, love or meditation, and go totally with it. If meditation is your path, awareness is going to be your key, the master key. Go totally with it, and don't be worried about the lovers. Many times, many things will make you jealous, because those who follow the path of love, they will dance, they will sing, they will laugh, they will celebrate. A thousand and one flowers will bloom on their path – their eyes will sparkle, will become candles; their lives will become more and more juicy. On the path of awareness, those things don't happen at all. A totally different kind of beauty happens – the beauty of the desert, the silence of the desert.

Out of fear arises pseudoness; out of fear arises pretension. Hence people go on pretending. One needs to be fearless to be authentic. (…) People are starving their reality and feeding their unreality.

You can die consciously only if you expose yourself totally, so that all that the unconscious is carrying is poured out, all that the unconscious is repressing is released, so that the unconscious becomes empty and there is nothing to hide. Remember, a person who has any repression cannot die consciously; repression creates unconsciousness. The more repressed you are, the bigger an unconscious you have. (…) The unconscious is the part of the mind that you don't want to see, the part of the mind that you bypass, the part of your house where you never go. You go on throwing all kinds of things in it, and you never go into it. The unconscious is not a natural phenomenon. The more man becomes civilized, the more the unconscious becomes bigger. (…) When you don't repress anything, you cannot create dreams. A dream is the boiling unconscious. The whole day you go on repressing, and in the night, when you fall asleep, the repressor falls asleep, and all that is repressed starts surfacing. That's what your dreaming is – the surfacing of the repressed past. (…) Primitives don't dream; the primitive man has no unconscious. In a primitive society, once in a while somebody dreams, only once in a while, and the person who dreams has a totally different kind of dream than you. His dream is not the dream that Freud, Jung and Adler study. His dream is intuitive; his dream is a prediction of the future; his dream is a foreshadowing of something that is going to happen. So in a primitive society, the dreamer becomes the seer; he becomes the shaman. He becomes the most important person; he becomes the religious head of the commune, because his dreams become predictions, his dreams always prove true. (…) The unconscious is a creation of civilization – the more civilized you are, the more unconscious you are. If you become absolutely civilized, you will be robots; you will be absolutely unconscious. That's what's happening; that calamity is happening all over the world.

If you can live consciously for a few years, that will be enough to die consciously; then one becomes capable of dying consciously. And to die consciously is to be resurrected into a totally different dimension, the dimension of the Divine. I would like all of my sannyasins to live and to die so deeply that they are never born again, so that they can disappear into the cosmos, become part of the Whole.

There are two kinds of foolish people in the world: one, who would not like to use the boat, who would like to walk on the water; and the other, who will use the boat, and when they have reached to the other shore, they will not leave the boat. Just out of gratitude, they will carry the boat on their heads for the rest of their whole lives.

Trust is through knowing, not through believing.

All doors bring you to God. What is needed is sincerity, and intensity, and totality.

Relationship is the need of those who cannot be alone.

There is a hierarchy of needs: body, mind, soul, God. You cannot bypass any step. If you bypass any step, you will have to come back to it again. Life has an intrinsic logic in it. Each step has its own place, and you cannot miss a single step. Otherwise, the chain will be broken, and your life will become discontinuous; your life will become a chaos.

God is not to be worshipped, but realized. There is no need to make temples for God; you are the temple. God has already chosen His abode. You have to learn how to look within.

Go on dying always to the plane you find yourself to be in, so that you can move to the higher. You have to leave the lower step; only then can you reach the higher step. If you cling to the lower, you cannot reach the higher.

Look at your life: there is a daily sense of failure; every day, you know that again you are going to fail. The morning comes and you know, another day of dragging; and the evening comes, and tired you go to sleep. One day is finished, and your hands are still empty, and your heart is still empty. Nothing has been achieved, and one day is lost. And you know that tomorrow it is going to be repeated again, because it has been so in the past, not only in this life, but in many, many lives. Days come and go, years come and go, lives come and go, and you remain as empty as ever – no fulfillment, no contentment.

Those who are too much obsessed with analysis, they are blind; they will not be able to understand that which resides in you.

Receptivity is a state of no-mind. When you are utterly empty of all thought, when consciousness has no content, when the mirror reflects nothing – this is receptivity. Receptivity is the door to the Divine. Drop the mind and be.

That's how we go on missing life: the past becomes a barrier, encloses you, traps you into something that is no more. You become encapsulated in the dead. And the more you become experienced, grown-up, the more the shell of the dead experiences goes on becoming thicker and thicker around you. You become more and more closed. (…) Then you exist, but you exist alienated; you exist uprooted. Then you don't have a communion with life.

The real enquirer is not satisfied with any concept of God. How can a concept be of any help? When you are thirsty, you cannot be satisfied by the formula H_2O; the formula H_2O cannot quench your thirst. (…) Philosophy talks about water; religion drinks.

The god of the crowds is an ugly concept – it shows much about your weaknesses, but nothing about the truth of existence.

Those who are really with me are on the way of disappearing, evaporating. Just as in the early morning sun, the dewdrops start disappearing, that is the way of the disciple to disappear when he is in a close love relationship with the Master. (…) Sannyas is the will to die, so that God can live. (…) I teach you crucifixion, because resurrection follows; it inevitably follows.

One has to be unmotivated in the world of religion. (…) One has not to be result-oriented, and that is the most difficult thing for the modern mind to do. (…) Whatsoever we do, we always do it for something else. Everything is a means; and everything has to be used for some end. And what I am teaching here is the end in itself; it is not a means to anything else. Each moment is an end unto itself.

Go on dying to the past experiences, so that you can remain available to the present – fresh, young, utterly intelligent; and then, life has a totally different flavor.

Man is always a project, a becoming. His being consists of becoming. (…) He is always a bridge hanging between the past and the future. He is a surpassing, a continuous surpassing. Man is never content with that which he is; he is trying to go beyond, always trying to go beyond. Whatsoever he is doing, all his effort is basically how to become something more, something higher, something better. Man is a progress, a wayfarer, a pilgrim, and his life is a pilgrimage, a non-ending pilgrimage, that goes on and on. A dog is born a dog; a tree is born a tree. Man is not a given fact; man is born only with a possibility, with a potential. Man is born as a blank, as a nothingness; nothing is written. (…) Man is capable of creating himself. He has not been given a map; he has not been ordered. (…) Man is the only being who is uncommanded, with no orders. (…) This is his dignity; and this is his problem too. (…) The animals are at ease; man is a tension. (…) Man comes into existence empty; and then he starts groping for his being – he starts groping and creating and searching. Man is an adventure, but with the adventure is uncertainty, insecurity, failure. One can always go wrong. (…) Man's glory is his freedom; man's misery is his uncertainty, his insecurity.

Man has created god in his own image; man's god is a human god.

Individuality arises only when you become very clear-cut, when you attain an original shape of your being, when you don't care what others say, when you are ready to sacrifice your whole life for your freedom, when freedom becomes your ultimate value, and nothing else matters. And only individuals can go into utter dissolution, utter disappearance. First, you have to be; only then can you disappear. First, you have to detach yourself from the crowd. The mass man cannot go into dissolution, because he does not know who he is. (…) First go through the turmoil of human anguish – the joys and miseries of human love, of human life. Let yourself become ripe through it. Then only do you have the fragrance which can be offered to God, not before. (…) Out of desiring comes the state of desirelessness, the lotus of desirelessness.

Beauty is choosing one standpoint; ugliness is choosing another standpoint. Truth is not choosing any standpoint at all. Truth is not choosing. God is not any aspect of reality; God is all the aspects together without any choice. (…) Once you don't take any standpoint, you disappear. And in that disappearance is God.

The old definition of the worldly is to live in the world; and the definition of the non-worldly is not to live in the world, to get out of it. My definition is different. The worldly is one who gets into his act and becomes unconscious and forgets that it is an act. It is as if you are playing on the stage, acting some role. You are in a drama playing the role of Julius Caesar, and when the curtains fall, you come home as Julius Caesar – you forget that it is a role. Then you are in trouble. (…) And the sannyasin, the other-worldly man, is the man who goes on playing acts, who knows they are acts, who never gets hooked by any act. These are all games; these are roles; these are functions. (…) I call the man worldly who does not know how to play a game and who gets too serious about it. (…) If one lives in the world in a worldly way, one becomes dead. If one becomes an old traditional kind of sannyasin, one shrinks and becomes dead. Both are ways of death. Life is where opposites meet; life is where day and night meet. Life is in the world, and yet only for those who can remain beyond it. Be a lotus flower, in the water and yet untouched by it.

Man has created outer standards of success to deceive himself. (…) A man tries to possess things because he does not possess himself. (…) This is a way of explaining away his inner emptiness. (…) Being is missing, and you are trying to replace it by having – but it cannot be replaced by any having. Having and being – this is the whole struggle of the human mind. (…) So the first thing I would like to tell you is that there are no outer standards of success. They are efforts to cover up your inner emptiness, efforts to deceive yourself and to make you feel that you have not failed. There is only one success, absolutely only one – and that is to be. (…) Once the illusion of outer success goes, you will be in a deep crisis. (…) Now, you will have to take a very decisive step, a very radical step: you will have to learn the ways of inner success. The outer will never appeal to you anymore; so don't go on making efforts in the outer – direct your energies towards the inner. Now, only that can have any meaning.

Each age creates its own myth to live by. (…) The belief in the myth of change is the most dangerous kind of belief. Man has suffered much from it, much more than from any other kind of belief. The myth of change – that something better is possible, that man can improve upon himself, that there is some place to go to, that there is somebody to be, that there is some kind of utopia – has corrupted the human mind infinitely down the centuries. It has been a constant poisoning.

The West says, the mind has to be completely analyzed. The East says, analyzing the mind is a non-ending process; the mind has to be dropped, transcended. In solving it, you remain in it; in solving it, you create more and more problems.

In Zen, they say that if you really want to become a painter, then learn painting for years. Then, for a few years, forget all about painting; throw away the canvas and the brush. And then, one day, you will be truly painting; expertise and innocence will both be there.

The moment you take sannyas, you are part of me; you are lost.

The contents that flow in the consciousness are temporary. One moment they are there; the other moment they are gone. Don't be worried about them; don't be either in favour of them or against them. Don't try to possess them; don't hold on to them, because they are going to go. They have to go. It is the very nature of things that they cannot be permanent. (…) It's the rhythm of life – day and night, life and death, summer and winter. The wheel goes on moving. Life is a flux. Only one thing is eternally there, and that is your consciousness, that innermost watcher. (…) Witnessing is eternal.

On the path of action towards God, karma yoga, consciousness changes the content. (…) When you allow God to become your will, when you surrender your will to the feet of God and His will starts flowing through you, then it is the path of karma yoga.

With the three paths (karma, gyana, bhakti), something remains in the mind that has to be done. With transcendence, the fourth path, rajas yoga, the royal yoga, all becoming disappears. There is no goal with the fourth way. You remain just a witness. You are no longer doing anything here; you are just being here. The flame has disappeared into the infinity; one simply ceases to be. (…) The fourth way means content not affecting consciousness; consciousness not affecting content. The world is there; I am here – there is no bridge; there is no meeting. This is the path of Sufism, the path of Zen, the path of all essential religions.

Deep in you, meditation is already the case.

Life problems are not to be solved; they are in a first place to be understood. A meditative man has insight. He can see how he himself creates his problems. And then, naturally, one stops creating them. It is not that one solves them; they are no longer created.

Man is born without a definition; (…) he comes into the world as freedom. He knows he is, but he does not know who he is. The whole life's task is to know who one is.

One has to move into darkness, not knowing where one is going. But one still has to move.

One has to commit many mistakes before one can know what truth is.

Man has the characteristic of self-transcendence. You have to go beyond whatsoever you think of as yourself. Always and always, you have to leave whatsoever you think of as yourself – you have to drop it; you have to renounce it. (…) This is the task, the life task, that faces everybody.

Man must create for himself his own essence, his own soul, his own being. Man is a continual birth – by himself, to himself; through himself, for himself.

Freedom is the essence of man; existence precedes essence. Man first is; only afterwards is this or that.

Don't remain a spectator, because it is only by being a participant that one comes to know anything.

Islam is the first pillar of Sufism – surrender, peace, silence. (…) The second pillar is Iman – 1) trust, faith (not belief); 2) religion; 3) commitment, involvement, in thought and in deed – commitment in your totality. (…) The third pillar is Ihsan – 1) authenticity, sincerity; 2) inner virtue, not imposed from the outside; 3) totality, wholeness. These three pillars have to be imbibed. And they contain all that is needed for any religious person. (…) Man is imprisoned, imprisoned in his own ego. Man is the prison, and if you want to get out of the prison, this is the map: Islam, Iman, Ihsan.

Paradox is my way, so that you will never be able to cling to anything I say.

The sinner is negative mind; the saint is positive mind; the sage is no-mind.

Faqr means spiritual poverty, egolessness, simplicity, dissolving the idea of 'I'. And zikr means remembrance of God.

A spiritual seeker has to be in an intimate love relationship with a Master. It is a delicate phenomenon; it takes time. You cannot just go from one door to another; you will remain a beggar. Yes, you can collect some information, but all that information inside you will become chaotic, because each school has its own methods, and those methods are perfectly right in that school, in that particular milieu. They have been designed by Masters; there is a pattern which has to be followed. Those methods cannot be mixed with other methods. If a person goes from one teacher to another, (…) he will go neurotic.

A lover remains a virgin; all lovers are virgin.

Education is a bridge between the potentiality and the actuality. Education is to help you to become that which you are only in a seed form. And this is what I am doing here; this is a place of education – education is to bring out your inner richness. (…) Real education will bring out what is hidden in you. (…) Education is to bring you from darkness to light. (…) The so-called education that goes on in the world does not prepare you for life. It is nothing but a preparation for a cut-throat, competitive world where everybody is the enemy of everybody else. (…) My vision of education is that life should not be taken as a struggle for survival; life should be taken as a celebration.

I am teaching you rebellion. I am teaching you to be yourself. I am teaching you to be fearless; I am teaching you not to yield to the social pressure; I am teaching you not to be a conformist. I am teaching you not to hanker for comfort and convenience, because if you hanker for comfort and convenience, the society will give them to you, but at a cost. And the cost is great: you get convenience, but you lose your consciousness; you get comfort, but you lose your soul. You can have respectability, but then you are not true to yourself – you are a pseudo human being; you have betrayed God and yourself. But the society wants that you betray yourself. The society creates efficient robots; the society wants to use you as a machine; the society wants you to be obedient. The society does not need you to function as an intelligent being, because an intelligent being will behave in an intelligent way, and there may be moments when he will say, "no, I will not do this", "no, I will not follow stupid orders".

The priests, the politicians, the pundits have been substituting every real thing with something unreal. That is the most fundamental strategy of how this prison, this slavery, has been created.

Man is living in hypocrisy, in utter hypocrisy. You are not what you think you are; you are not what others say you are; you are not what you believe you are.

The more knowledgeable a person is, the more he feels uprooted. Knowledge does not lead to wisdom; knowledge leads to madness. Knowledge does not lead to enlightenment; it leads to deeper and darker unconscious realms of your being. Knowledge takes away all celebration from your life; it destroys all poetry, all song, all dance – it makes you serious. Wisdom knows how to laugh; knowledge cannot laugh. Knowledge is always serious; wisdom is always playful. Wisdom is light; knowledge is heavy. You cannot attain to wisdom through knowledge. (…) The more you know, the less you will know.

The ordinary life of humanity is a constant effort to avoid oneself. Everybody is doing it, in different ways of course. Nobody can sit silently and be alone. (…) There are only two types of people: one, who escapes from their loneliness – the majority, the ninety-nine percent; and the remaining one percent are the meditators. (…) Meditation means you are not escaping anymore. And by encountering yourself, by knowing yourself deeply, you will become a man of wisdom.

Whatsoever you have, use it gratefully. Whenever you have, use it gratefully, thankfully. And when you don't have, use that not-having gratefully also.

Freedom from is negative freedom; freedom for is positive freedom. (…) The real freedom is transcendental freedom, pure freedom. (…) One has to watch and understand the ego to attain the third freedom.

Thinking is a substitute for meditation; philosophy is a substitute for religion.

Truth has to be discovered by everybody in his own being.

Your so-called learned people, Sufis call them donkeys. (…) A donkey can carry all the scriptures, and yet the donkey will remain unaware of what he is carrying.

Remember it always: you have to be worthy to get something better. (…) The disciple is one who prepares himself to receive more.

Borrowed, learned from others, from scriptures, from traditions, your knowledge is never going to become your knowing. It will make you only more and more ridiculous. (…) Just learning words, theories, systems of thought, is not going to help you at all. Deep down, you will remain the same. (…) This is not the way of the seeker. The seeker has to begin in absolute openness, with no conclusions this way or that. The seeker has to begin without any belief or disbelief. The seeker has to begin with great trust in his intelligence, but not in any conceptions.

Always be authentic to yourself. (…) A compromising person has no soul. The more you compromise, the less soul you have. By and by, you are just nothing, just apparently alive, but deep down, dead. Beware of it. (…) If you cannot assert yourself in the way you want to be, then you are a coward; (…) then you will never have a centering; you will never have an integrated being; you will never find yourself crystallized. (…) The soul is born through sacrifices. (…) all these problems are worth facing – these are the steps of the temple of God; this is real sacrifice, austerity. And slowly, slowly, when one passes through such fire, the gold that you are carrying with you becomes pure; and only through the purity of your inner gold, one day, the golden flower blooms. (…) Freedom means, don't betray yourself, whatsoever the cost. Remain true to yourself, and you will be true to God.

The man of awareness becomes the man of the essence. Personality consists of the non-essential. (…) The non-essential is momentary; it disappears sooner or later.

If you look at the deepest core, all Masters are one.

A really intelligent person is not clever or smart; he does not try to show that he is clever or smart. When you have intelligence, what need do you have of being clever? Your very life shows your intelligence. But the clever person is trying to show that he is intelligent – only one who is not intelligent tries to show that he is intelligent; (…) only the ignorant person tries to show his intelligence.

Religion is the quest for truth. (…) Religion is a quest; philosophy is only a curiosity.

Intelligence comes only when you discover yourself; intelligence is the shadow of that discovery. (…) Suddenly you are rooted in existence; suddenly you are beyond time.

Mysticism is the declaration that life is essentially unknowable. (…) That unknowable can be experienced, but not known.

First you have to go through an extinguishing; and then that very extinguishing becomes enlightenment.

The enlightened person is one who has lived through all kinds of states; he is fully aware of all possible human states. He has passed through all the agonies that you are passing. He has been as deceptive as you are; he has been lying to the world as much as you do; he has been as much of a pretender, as much of a hypocrite as you are. He has lived all possible human existences; he knows all. He has arrived. Nothing is unknown to him.

One can become obsessive about anything. Anything that may be intelligent within boundaries may become neurotic if you stretch it too far, if you move towards one extreme or the other.

I am not teaching you to fight with your conditionings. Become more intelligent about them. Understand them. (…) In your very understanding, you are free. Understanding is freedom, and that freedom I call rebellion. The real rebel is not a fighter; he is a man of understanding. (…) You have just to be a witness. And the witnessing is your original face; the one who witnesses is your real consciousness. That which is witnessed is conditioning; the one who witnesses is the divine source in your being.

When a soul enters into a woman's womb, it can enter only if the womb is suitable for it, if the womb is somehow harmonious with the rhythm of the soul. (…) the womb attracts only something harmonious to it, and the soul – a higher soul – can enter only in a higher womb.

Desire always leads you into tense states of mind. Desire is tension; non-desire is relaxation.

There is an inner music which is continuously flowing in you. That inner music Sufis call sama. Once it is heard, all outer music just becomes noise and nothing else.

The moment a person becomes a disciple, he has chosen suicide. He has chosen to destroy himself, because he has known that to be is to be in misery, that to be is to be in hell. Now he wants to learn the ways not to be.

The struggle is between the mind and the heart, between the outgoing energy and the ingoing energy, between exhalation and inhalation.

Prayer created by fear remains political, a strategy of the mind to persuade God – it is a kind of bribery. Real prayer arises out of understanding, out of love.

Industrialization and the growth of technology have not made man automatic, have not made man a machine. Man has always been a machine. Industrialization has only revealed the truth. Man has always lived in slavery; (…) freedom was always an illusion, a very consoling illusion. (…) Freedom exists only when you are utterly conscious. (…) Freedom is in Buddhahood – nobody else is free; nobody else can be free.

This world is nothing but games; this world is nothing but our projections.

I am against all kinds of imitation, because I respect the individual.

My own observation is this: that out of a hundred loves, ninety-nine are narcissistic. (…) it is mutual ego-satisfaction. The real love knows nothing of the ego. The real love starts first as self-love.

The word 'alienation' comes from a Latin root, alienare, which means 'to make strange or to separate what once was united'. The person who thinks "I am" certainly will have to draw lines around himself to make it clear who he is. (…) He will have to go on defining himself. He will have to eliminate millions of things; then a tiny space will be left of which he will think "I am". This is alienation – to think oneself separate from existence. (…) Alienation is bound to create some kind of neurosis, schizophrenia, some kind of great paranoia, because if you are a small identity, then you are against this whole vast world.

One who has arrived becomes poetry.

If problems are manageable and you can co-exist with the problems, you remain sane. When you see, it is too much, you go insane; madness is the last resort. Insanity is a built-in process of avoiding problems, realities, anxieties, stress situations.

Remember again and again who you are, and don't be identified with that which has been added to you. Don't be identified with the persona, with the mask, with the idea implanted in you about yourself. (…) Continuously keep reminding yourself, "who am I?" (…) Remember who you are; that is your original face.

Sufis say, if you can keep something a secret, it goes deeper in you. Everything moves; if you don't allow it to move outwards, it will automatically move inwards. (…) Don't go anywhere; don't talk. Move into privacy, into secrecy, into your innermost chamber. Let the secret go deeper and deeper into the soil of your heart; let it reach to the very core. Only when it reaches to the core, one becomes aflame.

You go on projecting and transferring your own ideas upon others.

On the periphery, we exist as many. Your personality is different from the personality of your neighbour. Your individuality is different from anyone else. But your innermost center is not different – your innermost center is the innermost center of all. When you reach the innermost, you reach the one.

The patient has become maladjusted; he needs adjustment, and the psychiatrist helps him to be adjusted again. But adjusted to whom? Adjusted to this world, this society, which is absolutely ill. What you call the normal human being is nothing but normal pathology or normal madness, normal insanity. The normal man is insane, but insane within the accepted boundaries of the society, of the culture. (…) And the psychiatrist exists on the boundary to help this man back, back to the crowd.

Great philosophies have tumbled down and gone to dust: go to Rome; see what has happened! Go to Athens; see what has happened! (…) The great systems in the end come to dust; all thoughts finally prove to be useless, because thought is just a man-created thing. Only in no-thought do you come to know the Divine. Thought cannot be of the eternal. No philosophy, no system can be eternal, because thought is of time.

Once you come to realize who you are, all diseases disappear. They exist basically because you have been hiding self-knowledge; you have been avoiding yourself; you have been avoiding the basic encounter because you don't want to look at yourself. Unless you are ready to encounter yourself, you cannot become a disciple, because a Master can do nothing if you are not ready to face yourself. He can only help you to face yourself.

Why are you so afraid? … Because something has gone wrong somewhere in the past. A child is born and he is not accepted as he is. Many things have to be changed, forced; he has to be disciplined. He has many parts which the society and his parents cannot accept, so those parts have to be denied, repressed; only a few parts can be accepted and appreciated. So the child has to work it out. He has to deny many fragments of his being which cannot be allowed manifestation. He has to deny them so much that he himself becomes unaware of them. This is what repression is, and the whole society exists on repression. Unless a child is accepted totally as he is, this fear is bound to remain. But no society has yet existed which accepts a child totally – and it seems that no society will ever exist which will accept a child totally, because it is almost impossible. So repression is bound to be there, more or less. And everybody has to face, some day, this problem of facing oneself. You become disciples the very day you forget about what is good, what is bad; you forget about what is accepted, what is not accepted. You only become a disciple the day you are ready to expose your whole being to yourself.

The Master is just a midwife. He helps you to pass through a new birth, to be reborn.

Energy has to move, energy cannot be static; if you close one outlet, it starts finding another. When both eyes are closed, the energy that was moving through these two eyes starts turning – a conversion happens; that energy is now returning towards source. That energy hits the third eye in you. (…) Only through that third eye is a Buddha seen; only through that eye is a Jesus realized. If you don't have that third eye, Jesus will be there, but you will miss him.

Only the body is born out of the body. The inner self is not born out of the body – it is born of the Holy Ghost; it is of the Divine. But first, you have to attain the eyes to see; you have to attain the ears to hear.

In the old days, you were needed. (…) But now, nobody needs you. You can be disposed of easily; you are nothing. Technology has created comfort and made you disposable. (…) Technology has made you better houses, but not better men, because better men need some other dimension – and that dimension is not of mechanics. That dimension is of awareness, not of mechanicalness.

The last will be the first in my kingdom. (…) Jesus was saying that the humblest will be the most significant; the poorest will be the richest; and one who is not recognized at all here will be recognized there – all upside down. It has to be so.

Whatsoever you call life is a slow poison, because finally it comes to death. It kills you; it never does anything else. (…) The kingdom of this world belongs to death, but the kingdom of heaven belongs to eternal life.

That which is not known to us can be explained only in terms of like. Hence all myth. Mythology means trying to explain things which you don't know, and cannot know in this state of mind, through something which you know. Trying to explain the unknown in terms of the known is myth – bringing some understanding to you where you are. (…) This is the most difficult thing in the world – parables, myths, stories; trying to explain something which cannot be explained through some symbols which you know.

The kingdom of heaven cannot be explained directly, immediately. It is impossible. Unless you enter it, there is no way to say anything about it. Whatsoever is said, will be wrong. The truth cannot be said.

When you are not, God is there; when there is emptiness in your hand, then God is there. When you are no more, then God is there. (…) The seed has died, and now the tree has sprouted. (…) You are the kingdom of heaven; you are like a mustard seed. Be ready to die; prepare for your death! (…) The seed has to die and trust in the unknown. (…) Get ready to die, because that is the only way to be reborn.

Unless you have become enlightened, illusions are necessary to live.

To become divine is difficult, arduous; a long hard path; (…)a long process - one needs the courage to wait; one needs not to be tempted by the shortcut. In life, there are no shortcuts; only illusions are shortcuts. Life is arduous, because only through arduous struggle does growth come to you – it never comes easily. You cannot get it cheaply; anything that is cheap cannot help you to grow. (…) Mind finds shortcuts, and illusions are shortcuts – maya is the easiest and the cheapest thing to achieve. Reality is hard, arduous; one has to suffer and pass through fires. The more you pass through fires, the more seasoned you become. Your divinity cannot be purchased in a market; you cannot bargain for it – you have to pay with your whole life. When your whole life is at stake, only then does it happen.

You fight with others because this is an easy way. You think you are good, the other is bad, and the fight is outward. If you look at yourself, then the fight becomes inward. And through that inner conflict – and it is a technique, remember; it is one of the greatest techniques that has been used through the centuries – if there is inner conflict, then you become integrated. If there is inner conflict, then beyond the conflicting parties, a new center of witnessing arises. If there is inner conflict, then energies are involved – your total being is in turmoil; chaos is created; and out of that chaos, a new being is born. (…) New birth needs chaos. (…) Through conflict, growth is achieved; through struggle, centering happens; through war, peace flowers.

People come to me and I can see the way they come, the problems they bring: they want consolation. (…) If you come to a true Master, this is the criterion: whatsoever peace you have, that too will be destroyed; whatsoever at-easeness you have is going to go to the dogs. He will create more turmoil, more conflict. He is not going to console you; all consolations are poisons. He will not give you a false peace. He will help you to grow, and out of that growth, some day you will flower. And that flowering will be the true peace, the true silence.

You have to pass through the chaos, because as you are, you are absolutely wrong. In this state, if somebody consoles you, he is your enemy. With him you will lose time, life, energy, and in the end, when death comes, all consolations will evaporate.

All the needs are of the body, and your consciousness only sees; your self is only a witness. (…) What belongs to the earth belongs to the earth; fulfill it, but don't get obsessed.

Fire is not just the fire you know; it is the innermost fire upon which life exists. It is only possible to bring this fire to a particular level if it is not released, and that is why all the religions which use fire are against sex. If it is released through sex, then it cannot be brought to a particular degree, because then you have an outlet. So all the outlets have to be closed completely, so there is no leakage of the fire and it reaches the one-hundred-degree point: a certain degree at which, suddenly, the transformation happens. The soul and the body are separate – the sword has worked! Then you know what is earth in you and what is heaven; then you know what has come from your father and mother, and what has come from the invisible.

Energy is always created through friction. (…) If you are not in friction, then you use only the superficial layer of energy. (…) Try it this way: (…) don't go to sleep – use the method of vigil. (…) What happens? (…) a friction is created, you become two: the one who wants to sleep, and the one who doesn't want to sleep. Now there are two parts fighting. If you stick and don't yield, suddenly you will find all sleepiness has gone and you have become as fresh as you have never been in the morning. Suddenly all sleepiness has gone, you are fresh, and even if you want to go to sleep, it will be difficult now. What happened? There were only two possibilities, and through the friction between them, energy was created.

If you yield, that will be very bad, because if you yield, the body has won and the consciousness has lost a fight. So if you try, try with with a mind determined not to yield; otherwise it is better not to try. Friction methods are dangerous: if you try, then you have to win. If you don't win, you are lost, because then you lose your confidence. Your consciousness will become weaker, and the body will become stronger. And if you lose many times, then there is less and less possibility of winning. Once you use any friction method, then make it a point to win. It is not to be lost; the battle must be won. And once you win, you achieve a different layer of energy. Now you can see that if you win, the energy that was in the other part is absorbed by you, so you become stronger. And then every fight will make you stronger, still stronger, until a moment comes when the whole energy of the body is absorbed by the self.

Those who know the innermost secret story of Jesus' life say that he was not crucified, but that he managed to be crucified – it was a drama that he arranged. (…) What happened on the cross was the last inner war, the last and greatest friction. When he was dying, but not losing trust in the Divine, when the earth was falling back to the earth, when the division was absolute, total – he was not identified at all. He allowed it. (…) that is what religion is: managing your own crucifixion. Going to the cross means going to the climax of friction – where death is.

Once you are not identified with the body, you have broken from the family; you are uprooted. (…) if you become a meditator, if you become a sannyasin, (…) then the family no longer has power over you; then you are no longer part of the family, because you are no longer part of this world.

Once you start to find yourself, all that has been before will be disrupted; there is going to be chaos. (…) The family is the basic unit of society. When you go beyond society, you go beyond the family. (…) They will pull you back; they will try to bring you back; they will make every effort to do so. (…) That is going to happen anyway. So what should you do? There are two ways: one is the old way, which is to escape from them, not to give them any opportunity – but I think that is no longer applicable. The other is to be with them, but as an actor: don't give them the opportunity to know that you are moving beyond them; be a good actor. A sannyasin must be a good actor. By being a good actor, I mean that you are not related at all, but you go on fulfilling the formalities. Deep down, you are uprooted, but you don't even give a hint that you are uprooted – because then, they will start trying to change you. Don't give them any chance. They will be happy then, because they live in formalities, they live on the outside – just the show is enough. (…) Create the conflict inside but don't create it outside. The inner conflict is more than enough; it will give you the growth, the maturity needed.

When you become religious, you become solitary; then there is no society for you – you are alone, you stand alone. And to accept that you are alone is the greatest transformation that can happen to you, because mind is afraid of being alone; mind wants somebody else to hang on to, to cling to. (…) That's why the crowd has become so important. (…) A crowd is needed in which you are no longer solitary, where you can relax. (…) But a religious man is a solitary because he is trying to reach his highest peak. He is not to lose himself in others. (…) This is the truth: that everybody is alone, and there is no possibility of any togetherness. Your consciousness is a solitary peak; (…) your mindfulness remains the innermost peak. There, in that shrine, you remain alone. Nobody enters there; nobody can enter there. In the innermost core of your being, you are alone. (…) Come to the marketplace, but bring your aloneness with you. Don't get lost there. Remain aware and alert; move into society, go into a crowd, but remain alone.

The hands are without; the eyes are without; the heart is also without, on the periphery. The innermost core is not even the heart. Hunger arises in your body, love arises in your heart – not prayer. Prayer is still deeper, deeper than the heart. Hunger is a bodily need; love is a need of the heart – God is a need of the beyond, not even of the heart. One has to transcend the mind; one has to transcend the heart too. One has to transcend all peripheries, so that only the center remains. (…) Religion arises at a deeper layer, at the deepest beyond which there is no going, at your very center, which is not even the heart. (…) Jesus is neither head-oriented nor heart-oriented; he is not oriented at all. He says, simply throw all orientations; throw all that is without and come to the innermost core where only you are, where only the being throbs, where only existence is. You can come to this, and if you come to this, then every mystery is revealed and all doors are opened. (…) So do one thing: go beyond. Neither fall a victim of logic, of intellect, nor become a victim of emotions, of sentimentality. The head is in the body, and the heart is also in the body. Go beyond both. What is beyond? There, is simple existence; you simply are. Being is without any attributes. That simple beingness is dhyan; that simple beingness is meditation.

There is a certain method of auto-hypnotizing yourself: if you think a particular thought continuously, you will be hypnotized by it; if you look at a thing continuously, you will be hypnotized by it; if you brood on something continuously, you will be hypnotized by it. (…) Once a man realizes, "I am the magician and I am the sheep", then things start changing – because then, the first spark of transformation has entered. (…) A breaking point has come – something of awareness has entered you.

Hearing something again and again, you will fall asleep – you have hypnotized yourself. Remember this, because you are doing this continuously, and this is being done by society continuously. The whole mechanism of propaganda consists of repetitions. Politicians go on repeating certain things. They go on repeating them, and they don't bother whether you listen or not. Listening is not the point, because if they just go on repeating, by and by you are convinced, persuaded; not logically, not rationally – they never argue with you – but just through repetition you are hypnotized.

Really, if you are under hypnosis, it never stops. Death doesn't make much difference: in the next life, you start again the same way, because the next life starts from where the last was discontinued; it is a continuity. So when a child is born, he is not really a child; he is very, very old, very ancient. He brings all his ancient karma with him, all the samskaras and conditioning. He starts as an old man – he already has his hypnosis.

The mind, if it is drunk, may find excuses, but all of those excuses are false. (…) The real fact is that you are not ready to recognize that the mind has become compulsive, that you are under an obsession, that you are under a hypnosis. This is what Jesus finds: everyone drunk and fast asleep. (…) The whole world is moving in a somnambulism.

If you are drunk with this world, you cannot be thirsty for the other. (…) this world and its wine can give you only temporary relief, only temporary gaps of forgetfulness. (…) When someone is drunk with this world and its wines, he is hypnotized, asleep, moves in a slumber – his whole life is a long dream. There is no search. (…) When a man is not drunk with this world, a thirst arises. And that thirst cannot be fulfilled by anything that belongs to this world. Only the unknown can fulfill it; only the invisible can fulfill it. (…) When someone is drunk with God's wine, he is totally alert, aware, fully conscious.

God means the great abyss, the ultimate abyss. (…) Meditation is nothing but coming to terms with your inner emptiness: recognizing it, not escaping; living through it, not escaping; being through it, not escaping. Then suddenly the emptiness becomes full of life.

Jesus has given a beautiful key: "Just repent, and the whole past is washed clean!" (…) If you repent totally, if it comes from the heart, when your whole being repents, your whole being throbs and you feel it in every pore, every fiber, that you have done wrong, and you have done wrong because you have been drunk, and now you repent – then suddenly there is a transformation. The past disappears and the projection of the future from the past disappears; you are thrown to here and now; you are thrown to your own being. (…) That is why Jesus completely dropped the idea of rebirth – just to give repentance totality. If there are many lives, your repentance cannot be total. You can wait, you can postpone. That's what Hindus have been doing. (…) The whole teaching of Jesus and John the Baptist depends on: "Repent!" Because time is running fast; life is running out of your hands; soon there is no more time left – you will then be lost. (…) This is going to be the last day, and tomorrow the world is going to disappear. (…) They bring the whole thing to an intensity. (…) then your total being will be focused, centered; you will be here and now. (…) If this repentance happens – this is an intensity of becoming alert – all the past is cleaned. No need to undo it – no, because it has never been a reality.

The mind says, "tomorrow" – always. Tomorrow is the shelter. Tomorrow is the shelter of all sin, and virtue arises at this moment.

Society cannot tolerate somebody who is rebellious, because he will destroy the whole structure. (…) Society cannot tolerate this, so it will punish you. But it also rationalizes: it says this is just to put you right; it punishes you for your own good. And nobody ever bothers whether that good is ever achieved or not.

The kingdom of God is like a shepherd who had one hundred sheep. One of them went astray, which was the largest. (…) It is always so – the one who goes astray is always the best. If you are a father, if you have five children, only the best child will try to resist and deny you; only the best child will assert himself. The mediocre ones will always yield to you, but the one who is not mediocre will rebel, because the very quality of his mind is rebellious. Intelligence is rebellious; the more intelligent, the more rebellious. And those who are not rebellious, who are yea-sayers, are almost dead; you may like them, but they have no life in them. They follow you not because they love you; they follow you because they are weak, they are afraid, they cannot stand alone, they cannot stand against – they are impotent.

Ninety-nine sheep can be left in the forest – there is no fear about them. They will not be lost, because they will huddle together, so they can be found any moment. The problem is not with them, but with the one, the best, who has left the fold. Whenever a sheep can leave the fold, it means power exists there, and the sheep is not afraid of the forest, not afraid of the wild animals, not afraid at all; the sheep has become fearless – only then can it leave the fold. And fearlessness is the first step of being ready.

Out of weakness, much goodness appears. It is an appearance; it is a false coin. (…) Look around: people whom you think are good are almost always those who are weak. Their goodness does not come out of their strength; it comes out of their weakness. (…) Lord Acton has said: "Power corrupts, and absolute power corrupts absolutely." But I would like to make it conditional: Power corrupts only if you are weak, and your goodness comes out of your weakness. If goodness comes out of strength, no power can corrupt. (…) A man who is good because he cannot be bad is not really good. The moment he becomes stronger, he will become bad; give him power, and power will corrupt him immediately. (…) How can goodness arise out of weakness? Goodness needs overflowing energy. (…) Goodness must come out of overflowing strength, only then is it good, because then it has life, a floodlike life. Only if you become a saint out of your strength, you will reach.

When you have something, you would like to give it. (…) You cling to something only when you don't really own it. (…) If you are clinging to it, then deep down you are afraid, and you are not the master of it. You know deep down that it does not belong to you, and that sooner or later it will be taken away from you. That is why you cannot give. So only when a person gives his love does he show that he has love; only when a person gives his whole life does he show that he is alive. There is no other way.

Sin doesn't make any distinction between your acts and your thoughts. If you think, the seed is there; whether it sprouts in the act or not is not the problem. If it becomes an act, then it will be a crime. But if you have thought it, you have already committed the sin – for the Divine, you have become a criminal; you have gone astray.

This is the point to be understood, a very difficult one: that those who go astray are always more powerful than those who remain on the path. Those who go astray are always the best. (…) This looks very absurd: a mediocre person remains sane, and a genius goes mad. Why? No energy to move astray. (…) A bloodless, anemic mind will not go astray, cannot, because it is difficult to afford that much energy; it is difficult to move to that extreme, to that abyss. But those who go astray – if they are ever found – they become Buddhas. If Nietzsche had ever gone into meditation, he would have become a Buddha. He had the energy to become mad, so he had the energy to become enlightened. It is the same energy; only the direction changes. (…) It can happen in a single moment if the energy is there. If the energy is not there, then it is difficult. The whole system of yoga is how to create energy, more energy. The whole dynamics of tantra is how to create more energy in you, so you become a floodlike phenomenon.

The whole of life is such a puzzling thing that if you can see deeper, it will be very difficult to remain sane, very difficult. One remains sane because one cannot see. If you come to see, it will be such a flood that you will not be able to tolerate it – you will go insane.

The process of growth is that first you have to attain the ego. If you don't attain to a crystallized ego, surrender is never possible. Looks paradoxical, but this is how it is. First, you have to attain a very crystallized ego, and then you have to drop it. If you don't attain to a crystallized ego, surrender can never happen to you. (...) To become a saint, you must have been a sinner first. (…) Ego is the first step to surrender. (…) The first part of life for a rightly maturing person is to attain the ego; and the second part is to renounce it – then the circle becomes complete. (…) A child only grows when he resists his parents, when he fights with the parents; when he moves away from them, against them, he attains his own individual ego. If he goes on clinging to his parents, following them, he will never be an individual in his own right. He has to go astray – this is how life is meant to be. He has to become independent, and there is pain in becoming independent. There is a fight. (…) Before individuality, you are just a crowd, the local crowd, numbers in the crowd. Then you attain individuality – you go astray; you become independent; you become an ego. And then, when you lose this ego, you become the ocean, you become the Whole.

A society exists as a crowd. You can turn it into an army immediately, with no trouble. (…) There is no individuality, because individuality is not allowed; you should not assert yourself. This is the sheeplike crowd, the sheeplike mind. (…) A conscious man has no society – he belongs to no one; he stands on his own two feet.

How can you seek God? You only know meaningless words and theories; they will not help. (…) This is the problem: ninety-nine sheep create all religions; and the real religion happens only to the one sheep who has gone astray.

First, the society has to be dropped – and that is the inner mechanics – because your ego cannot exist only with the society. If you go on dropping the society, there will come a moment when the ego will be alone, because the society has been dropped. But then, without the society, the ego cannot exist, because society helps you to exist as an ego. If you go on dropping the society, by and by the base is dropped. When there is no "thou", the "I" cannot exist. At the final stage, "I" disappears because "thou" has been dropped. When there is no "you", "I" am not. The "you" has to be dropped, then the "I" drops.

Be courageous! Move beyond the clearing; go to the wild. Life is there, and only then will you grow. There may be suffering, because there is no growth without suffering. There may be a cross, because without it there is no maturity. Society may take revenge through crucifixion – accept it, that is bound to happen.

If you go outside, you may achieve much, but you will miss the one. And that one is the very center; if you miss it, you have missed all. You may attain much, but that much will not count in the end, because unless one attains to oneself, nothing is attained. If you are a stranger to yourself, even the whole world will not fulfill you. (…) The inner emptiness cannot be filled by outer things. The inner emptiness can be filled only when you achieve yourself, when you attain to your being. (…) If you are searching outside, you will miss. Nothing will be of much help; whatsoever you do, you will be a failure.

The many is the realm of death; the one is the realm of deathlessness. The seeker has to be sought not in outside objects, but in your subjectivity; you have to turn within. A conversion is needed, a turning, an absolute about-turn, so the eyes which see outside start seeing inside. (…) Unless you are totally frustrated with the world, this cannot happen; if even a slight hope remains, you will go on moving. (…) The sooner you fail in the outside world, the better; the sooner you get totally frustrated, the better – because failure in the outside world becomes the first step towards the inner.

Who is the wise man? The one who is ready to lose all for the one. And who is the fool? He who has sold the Master and filled his house with useless things.

Whatsoever you get – eighteen-hole golf courses, three swimming pools, five hundred rooms, or donkeys, horses and cows – whatsoever you can get outside will not make you rich, because really the house remains empty, you remain empty. (…) Had it been outside, then there would have been no problem. If you had felt the emptiness outside, on the periphery, then it would have been filled by houses, cars, horses, or anything. But the emptiness is felt within; you feel meaninglessness within. (…) Every day in the morning, you wake up again to go – and nowhere to go. Every day in the morning, you get dressed, but you know, by the evening nothing is attained, nothing is achieved. Inside you go on feeling empty; there is nothing. With outside things, you can at most deceive others, not yourself.

The more things you accumulate, the more life is wasted, because they have to be purchased at the cost of life. And you cannot go back – the time that is wasted cannot be returned to you; there is no way. (…) You accumulate things just to see that you are rich in the eyes of others. We exist in the eyes of others; our identity consists of the opinion of others. Others' eyes are the mirrors; we look at our faces in others' eyes. But only the outer can be reflected.

Meditation means closing your eyes; not looking at the reflection, but looking at your own being. Otherwise, the whole day, you are engaged with others. In the night also, when you sleep, either you are unconscious when there is deep sleep, or you are again engaged with others in your dreams. Continuously living with the other is the problem: you are born into society, you live in a society, you die in a society – your whole existence consists of the social. Whatsoever those eyes reflect, they impress on you. Your identity depends on others; it is a hypnosis through others. Move into loneliness – live with the others, but don't exhaust yourself with the others. At least for one hour a day, just close your eyes – closing your eyes means, you are closed to the society; no society exists, only you. Move once a year for a few days where there is nobody, only you. Otherwise, continuously living with others will create a hypnosis in you. (…) Meditation is needed to give you a break from the eyes of others, the mirror of others. (…) Then a transformation starts; then you start looking for the inner riches, the treasury that exists within you – not for the treasuries that are spread all around.

Whatsoever you can get in this world will be snatched away from you. You cannot possess anything in the world, in reality. Your possession is just like a dream. (…) You can live in an illusion. You can live in the illusion that you possess this house, this wife, this husband, these children, but this is an illusion; sooner or later the dream will go away. (…) If you are looking for the eternal, then be like the prudent merchant: sell all that you got. Sell it and purchase the one, the one pearl of your inner being which cannot be drowned, which cannot be snatched away.

Around you exists time, the ocean of time. Within you exists eternity, timelessness.

Why does uneasiness exist? Why is man a vagabond deep down? – Because your home is missing, and you are in search of it. (…) Your home exists within you. Don't search for it outside – there you will meet the many, the multiple, what Hindus call maya. (…) You go on searching, but you never get anything, because it is a magical world: whenever you come closer to it, it disappears like a rainbow. Whenever you arrive, you find there is nothing. The rainbow was a dream, an illusion.

Remember this well: You are the goal, and you have to achieve yourself – nothing else is worthwile.

Look for the deathless and remain alert; don't waste your time with that which is not going to endure; don't waste your life for that which is going to change, which is part of the changing world. (…) If there is form, change is going to happen. (…) Things change around you, and thoughts change within you – but the self, the witnessing self, remains the same. (…) Go to the formlessness within you. (…) That is the pearl, the witnessing self. (…) Purchase one at the cost of the many. One is the pearl; the many are just false stones – they may look very valuable, but they cannot endure. (…) Endurance, nityata, eternity, is the criterion of truth.

The nature of the self is just like space: empty, infinitely empty, formless. Everything happens within it; nothing happens to it.

If you are ready to accept your failure in this world, then you are ready to enter the other world. The moment one is ready to recognize that, "The success of this world is not for me; I am not for it", immediately a conversion happens, a turning. Then, consciousness doesn't move outward; it starts moving inward. (…) Then, the heart becomes the source of your being, and the heart is innocence.

You cannot be a child again – how is it possible? Once you have tasted knowledge, you cannot fall back. You can transcend it, but you cannot go back; there is no way to go back. You can go ahead; you can go beyond it; but you cannot go behind it now – there is no way. (…) Remember this, otherwise you may start imitating a child, and that imitation will be a cunningness. Then this childhood will be a false thing. (…) A saint, a sage, becomes like a child in a totally different sense. He has transcended, he has gone beyond the mind, because he has understood the futility of it. He has understood the whole nonsense of being a successful man in this world – he has renounced the desire to succeed, the desire to impress others, the desire to be the greatest, the most important, the desire to fulfill the ego. He has come to understand the absolute futility of it. (…) The very understanding transcends – immediately, you are transformed into a different dimension. Then, there is again a childhood; that is called the second childhood. Hindus have called that stage "the twice born", dwij. Again you are born, but this is a different birth – it is through your self that you are born. (…) The second birth is a virgin birth – and then, you are innocent again. This innocence cannot be taken away, because it is the climax, the crescendo of growth; there is no further growth. If there is growth, then things will change; if you have reached the goal beyond which nothing exists, only then will things not change.

The innocence of a child is poor because there is no experience; the innocence of childhood is just like an absence of something. But the innocence of a sage is a presence of something, not an absence. He has known all the ways of the world; he has moved; he has experienced all that was to be experienced. He moved to the very opposite end: he became a sinner; he delved deep; he indulged; he experienced all that this world can give, and now he has come out of it. His innocence is very, very rich, because experience is there. You cannot destroy it now, because he has known all that can be known. You cannot motivate him anymore; all motivation has gone. If you reach this stage, your life has been a circle, complete; this is what perfection is. If you don't reach the source again, your life has been incomplete. Incompletion is suffering. That is what Buddha calls dukkha, misery. (…) A sage dies fulfilled – then there is no more birth, because then there is no need to come back to the world of experience. You die incomplete, and because of that incompleteness, you have to be born again. Your being will persist, again and again, to be complete; and unless you are complete, you will have to move again and again into birth, into death. That is what Hindus call the wheel of life and death.

Deep down, you are looking for sex – everywhere. You will not be innocent if this looking for sex remains. Then the looking will go on being concerned with the outer; it cannot become inner; you cannot move within; you cannot be meditative. (…) Sex is the basic duality, and this duality will not allow you to see the real. So unless sex disappears, the oneness, the nondual, the Brahma is not going to happen. (…) It is a very deep biological phenomenon; it is alchemical, because your whole body needs a transformation. (…) Sex goes on following you to the very end, to the last. If a man has not transcended mind, the last thing in the mind when he dies will be sex, because that was the first thing when he was born. (…) A sage transcends sex, but a sage has not repressed sex. If you repress, you are still divided. A sage has not repressed anything. Rather, on the contrary, the male and the female energy within him have become a unity; now he is neither male nor female. That is what Hindus mean when they depict Shiva ardhanarishwar – half-man, half-woman: he has become one. (…) And when you are half-man and half-woman consciously, both become one circle and both disappear. The duality has disappeared; he has become one.

The real is beyond happiness and unhappiness. (…) Hindus have called that ananda; it means "beyond the two". (…) A sage is blissful; he has passed the duality. Now there are no hills and no valleys, no ups and downs; he moves on one level.

Normally, as you are, you are a divided being: your male energy seeking female energy outside; your female energy seeking male energy outside – this is the normal human being. The whole thing has to be transformed: your male energy seeking female energy within, the man within you trying to meet the woman within you. Nature has not provided for it; nature has given you an urge to meet the woman outside, to meet the man outside. (…) The woman outside always helps the inner woman to become awake. The outer woman or the outer man is just a representative of the inner. You carry a woman within. Whenever any woman fits with that inner woman, suddenly you are in love. It is something very unconscious. (…) When your two inner energies, male and female, are meeting, something very mysterious is happening inside: you are becoming a circle; you are becoming ardhanarishwar. Every nerve of the body will vibrate with life, because this circle spreads all over the body. For a single moment, the one happens in you. Watch it! Watch the reaching of the peak, the meeting of the inner energies. Then watch, when the tide has gone, the energies separate again. If you do it a few times, you will immediately become aware that the outer woman or man is not needed. This can be done without the outer, because this is happening without the outer – the outer is just a trigger-point. That trigger-point can be created inside. And once you know what is happening, the outer can be dropped, and then you are no longer dependent on it. Then you can allow the phenomenon to happen inside, and a moment comes when this inner circle remains forever. When this circle remains continuously within you, this is the state of ardhanarishwar. Then you have entered: you have become perfect; you are not divided; you have become indivisible. Now you have a self: now you have freedom and independence; now you lack nothing; you are complete in yourself. Unless this circle happens, you will lack something, and you will depend on others to fulfill it. That is why sex looks like bondage – it is! (…) Sadness is always present with lovers, because no woman can fulfill a man. Something or other will always be lacking. (…) Unless you attain to the inner unity, you will move from one misery to another. The change may give you hope, but the whole affair is hopeless.

Self-knowledge is the most difficult thing – not because it is difficult, but because you are scared to know about yourself. A deep fear exists. Everybody is trying to escape, escape from himself. (…) if this unconscious fear is there, (…) on the one hand you will try to know yourself, and on the other hand you will create all sorts of hindrances so that you cannot know.

If you really penetrate within yourself, your image that you have created in the world will prove to be false. Your whole past will come to mean nothing, because it was like a dream. You have invested so much in it, you have lived for it, and now, to know that it has been a false phenomenon, you feel hurt: then your whole life has been wasted. (…) whatsoever you have been living has been a pseudo-life, not authentic. (…) the whole thing has been a pretense. (…) You have deceived nobody else but yourself. (…) You have been thinking that you are something unique; everybody does. That is the most ordinary thing in the world, to think oneself extraordinary, something special, "the chosen". But if you look at yourself, you will come to know that there is nothing, there is nothing to be egoistic about. Then where will the ego stand? It will tumble down, fall down to dust. (…) to support the ego, all these fictions are needed. (…) But your support doesn't make anything real – if it is a fiction, it is a fiction. If you look at yourself, immediately you will feel that you are nobody, nothing important. But then the whole earth, the base under your feet is withdrawn – you are an abyss. Better not to look at it; just continue in your dreams. They may be dreams, but they help you to live in a sane way. (…) You also create fictions about the other; you cannot look directly, you cannot see through them; your perception is not immediate. You live in a maya, in an illusion created by yourself.

Fear is there, so you do not look at yourself. In not looking, you can go on creating dreams about yourself, images about yourself. And it is very easy and cheap to create an image, but it is very difficult and hard to really be something. One always chooses the cheapest – and you have chosen the cheapest. Now, to look at it is difficult. (…) To create an image that you are unique is cheap, but to be unique is arduous, very hard. Many, many lives of struggle, striving; many lives of effort culminate into something when you become unique. But to believe that you are unique is just cheap. (…) And you have been believing in cheap things – that's why fear exists.

Rather than looking in the mirror, you will break all mirrors (…) – because it is so painful to realize that you are nobody. (…) You have never been honest, you have pretended; you have never been true, you have pretended – your whole life is a long series of pretenses. And now, because you have wasted so much life in it, just to recognize that the whole thing has been only a fiction is too much. Now you think, "Somehow I'll carry it to the very end." But even if you carry it up to the very end, it is not going to give anything. It is simply a wastage, and in the end, the whole frustration will erupt. That's why death is so difficult.

All your occupations are just ways to remain engaged outside. That's why nobody is ready to be alone, even for a single moment. (…) It is so fearful, because when you are alone, you may come across yourself. (…) When you are alone, you are with you – and the reality may erupt. So everybody tries for continuous occupation, to be occupied twenty-four hours a day. (…) Psychologists say that if a man is left unoccupied for a long period, he will go insane. But why? (…) If you are sane, then in a long fallow period, a long period where nothing is done, you will become more sane, you will grow. But why should you become insane if you are left alone for a long period? Because you are insane. Your occupation simply hides the fact. (…) A man is constantly occupied with money. What is he really doing? Focusing his mind on money, so he can avoid himself. (…) When you get the money, you immediately demand more, because the basic motivation is not the money; the basic motivation is to remain occupied. Whenever occupation is not there, you are uncomfortable; a deep unease arises in you. What to do? If there is nothing to do, you will read the same newspaper again and again – the same newspaper you have already read completely. If there is no occupation, you may do anything which is not needed at all, but you cannot remain at ease. Hence the insistence of all the Masters, that if you can sit for a few hours without doing anything, soon you will become enlightened. (…) A husband is enough occupation for a wife; a wife is enough occupation for her husband. This is mutual deception: they have agreed to deceive each other and help each other to remain occupied. (…) If I accept your fiction, then you can help my fiction; this is the mutual game that is going on. And this game is so satisfying that you don't want to break it. But a deep discontent also follows like a shadow. It is bound to be so, because the whole thing is a fiction.

Sometimes you even play the game of knowing yourself. (…) I come across many people who play the game of knowing themselves – and they don't want to know. (…) They say, "I have realized this, I have realized that", and they look at me and their eyes are begging. If I say, "Yes, you have experienced this", they are supported, they go away happy. And if I say "No", they become unhappy, they never come back to me again. (…) they have to find somebody else, some other authority. (…) If you have realized something, you have realized it – no need for any authority, because the experience in itself is self-evident. (…) you will not need anybody's recognition, a certificate. Even if the whole world says you have not realized, it makes no difference; a vote is not needed – you know it has happened. (…) And whenever you are playing tricks, deep down you know it, and nobody is needed to show it to you – but you want to hide the fact.

Unless you stop playing games and become sober about the fact that fictions have to be dropped and the hard truth has to be faced as it is, nothing is possible – because this is the door. And if nobody supports you, then you yourself support yourself. Then you stop talking with people, because they cannot understand you.

If you look into yourself, the change is certain, absolutely certain, because once the fiction is realized as a fiction, it starts dropping. To be retained, a fiction has to be retained as a fact; if it is to be carried, even an untruth has to be thought of as true. The moment you realize that this is untrue and the thing penetrates, it starts dropping – it is already out of your hands; you cannot catch it. To continue the dream, one has to believe that this is not a dream; this is reality. The moment you become aware that this is a dream, the dream is already disappearing.

What is happening in the world? Is it worth living in it? (…) You don't realize what is happening in the world, what man has done to man, what man is continuously doing to man: such violence, such foolishness, such a poisoning of every type of significance, of everything that is beautiful and true and good. (…) If you look, then it will be very difficult to decide to live in it. That's why it's better not to look, just move as if you are in a hypnosis.

People who try to transform the society are the mischief-makers; people who try to change the other are always dangerous. They are murderers in a very subtle way, but their murder is so subtle that you cannot catch it. They don't kill you directly, but they cripple you, they cut you – and "for your own good", so you cannot say anything against them. (…) do-gooders can kill you before you are due, and do-gooders are always dangerous. But you are all do-gooders in your own ways, small or big. Everybody wants to change the other, because everybody thinks the other is wrong; everybody wants to change the world. (…) The politician starts from the world, but he never reaches any goal, because (…) he creates more problems; through his efforts, he creates more misery. (…) A religious person looks from precisely the other end. He thinks, "I am wrong, that is why the world is wrong, because I contribute to the evil in it. Through me the world is wrong. Unless I change myself, there can be no change." (…) A religious man changes himself. He only changes himself, because that is the only thing that is possible. (…) whenever there is a Christ, whenever a consciousness rises as high as the consciousness of Jesus, all other consciousnesses are simultaneously affected. They also rise, they also have a glimpse – and they cannot be the same again, the same old level cannot be achieved.

Self-knowledge is not a means; self-knowledge is the end in itself. (…) All other knowledge is a means: first you have to know the know-how, and then you have to do something. But with self-knowledge, the quality is absolutely different: you know, and the very knowing changes you.

When thou castest the beam out of thine eye, then thou wilt see clearly. (…) Drop the fictions.

In Sanskrit, there is only one word for rishi and kavi, for the seer and the poet. There are not two words, because they say whenever there is a real poet, he is a seer; whenever there is a seer, he is a poet. Clarity – then life becomes poetry. (…) Meditate. (…) Just look. If you can clear your perception, if you can attain a clarity of looking, everything is achieved.

Self-knowledge happens to a clear mind, not to a mind filled with knowledge, not to a mind filled with judgments of good and bad; not to a mind filled with beauty, ugliness, but to a mind that is without words. Self-knowledge happens to a wordless mind. 'I' is always there, you only need a clarity of mind to perceive it so that it can be reflected; you need a mirrorlike mind so that the reflection becomes possible. Once this happens, then you can help your neighbor; never before.

You want to be as free as a poor man, because only a poor man can be free – he has no burden; he has nothing to protect; you cannot rob him. He is unafraid. You cannot snatch anything from him, because he has nothing; with nothing, he is at ease. (…) Nobody is his enemy, because he is not a competitor at all; he is not competing with anybody. (…) but you also want to be as secure as a rich man, as safe as an emperor. (…) Outwardly, the rich man has made all the arrangements; he is not vulnerable: he has protections against death; you cannot murder him so easily; he has an armor. (…) you would like to be free like a beggar and to be secure like an emperor – then you are mounted on two horses, and it is impossible to reach anywhere. (…) And I say to you: this is in every direction. So there are not only two horses; there are millions of horses altogether, and every moment you are living a contradiction. (…) You are a confusion, a mess, a chaos.

(…) Silence can exist only when all the contradictions are dropped. It needs arduous effort, very penetrating intelligence, understanding, maturity. (…) You have to understand it and drop it through understanding; (…) then no more horses will be added. On the contrary, old horses will be released to their freedom, (…) and you can move and reach your goal. (…) just the understanding of the problem is the solution. You understand the problem and the problem disappears.

Doubt is like an illness. (…) doubt creates anxiety because deep down, you are uneasy. (…) Unless you have trust, you cannot be at ease, because doubt means wavering, and wavering is uneasy. (…) Not even on a single point is decision possible through doubt. At the most, you can decide with the part of your mind which becomes the majority. But the minority is there to rebel; it is a constant turmoil within you. (…) You are divided; there is always conflict. (…) Trust you also want. You also want to be in faith, because faith gives you health; there is no indecisiveness; you are completely certain. (…) there is no wavering, you are unwavering; you are whole, not divided – and wholeness is health. (…) but then you become vulnerable; anybody can deceive you. If you trust you are in danger, because there are people all around you who would like to exploit you, and they can exploit you only when you trust. If you doubt, they cannot exploit. (…) So you are trying the impossible: to make a compromise, not to go to this extreme, because there neurosis comes; not to go to the other extreme, because there blindness happens. Then what to do? Then simple reasoning says, "Just compromise both, half and half – a little doubt, a little faith". But then you mount two horses, doubt and faith. (…) You will remain constantly in anxiety and anguish; you will deteriorate. In this conflict of the two horses, you will die.

This is the only possible way to grow: to live without doubt and without faith; just to live simply, spontaneously, with awareness. And this is really what trust is. This is trusting life: wheresoever it leads, without doubt, without faith, you simply move, you move innocently.

If you make a compromise, you create a division within your being – you are two; you become a crowd. Then what to do? Just understand the problem and get down from both horses – don't make any compromise. Then a totally different sort of being, a totally different quality to your consciousness happens. (…) You simply have to be fully alert. (…) You cannot cheat a fully alert man. It is impossible, because he looks through you; you are transparent; he has such consciousness that you are transparent.

Your mind sticks to its own conclusions, because if one conclusion is lost, your confidence is lost. So whatsoever the situation, you stick to your conclusions. That gives you ground for your ego and your mind to stand on. (…) Mind is just thoughts, shadows, nothing substantial in it. But it can go on playing rationalizations, and you will feel good.

It is impossible for a man to mount two horses and stretch two bows; and it is impossible for a servant to serve two masters, otherwise he will honor the one and offend the other. (…) Christians miss the whole point. They think Jesus is saying, "Choose!" Jesus can never say, "Choose!" – Jesus means choicelessness. Because if you choose, the choosing mind is strengthened, not destroyed; the mind which is choosing becomes stronger through the choice. No, it is not a question of choice. And through choice, you can never be total, because you have to deny something. (…) If you choose one, you honor the one and offend the other – and the offended part of you will take revenge; it will become rebellious. (…) your being will be divided: the dropped, the repressed, the denied part will become the unconscious; the accepted, the welcomed part will become the conscious. And then, there will be a continuous struggle between the conscious and the unconscious.

This is a deep understanding, that if you choose between contraries, you will remain divided in the contraries. A sannyasin is not against this world and for that one; a sannyasin is simply neither for nor against – he simply moves without friends and without enemies.

As you are, anxiety-ridden, divided, mounted on two horses, trying to stretch two bows together, you are schizophrenic; you are ill; you are wavering. Or, at the most, you have made a compromise, and you have become normally neurotic. (…) When you are not in anguish, bliss happens. You have created the capacity, you have opened the door, and the sunrays enter and fill you.

The whole human problem consists of choosing between the momentary and the eternal. If you choose the momentary, you are building your house on sands – it is going to fall. If you choose the eternal, then something is achieved which is going to be forever and forever. And nothing less can satisfy you; only the eternal can satisfy you.

No one ever succeeds in this world. At the most, you can go on postponing the failure, that's all. (…) how can you succeed with the momentary, that which is fleeting? (…) That which his passing moment to moment, going out of existence, how can you make a house on it, an abode on it? By the time the house is ready, the moment is gone. That's why every moment you feel frustrated – but again you start doing the same thing. It seems you are not aware; it seems you are not alert to what you are doing – it seems you have not learned anything from life. You have remained ignorant of life; you have not attained to any experience. (…) you have not learned through experience that on the momentary, the house cannot be built.

If you build your life on the momentary, you are going to be in difficulty with the Whole, because it will never adjust. It will never be harmonious; something or other will always be wrong. The Whole has to be looked to before you make your city; before you make your abode, the Whole has to be consulted and referred to. With the vision of the Whole, you should create your life and the pattern of your life; you should live with the vision of the Whole. Only then will your life be a harmony, a melody.

Shiva is the highest consciousness. Shiva is not a person; Shiva means the perfect consciousness. Perfect consciousness lives on Gourishankar, the highest mountain-top.

The sinner means one who lives constantly in sleep; the saint means one who is not asleep even in his sleep. (…) The totality of the yogi never goes to sleep. A point of witnessing always remains there; he witnesses his own sleep. In sleep you fall down; in awareness you rise high. When nothing is asleep in you, when your whole consciousness has become a light, when not a single fragment is unconscious, when your complete being is filled with light – that is what we mean by a Buddha, a Christ. No unconsciousness exists – this is the highest peak. Hence the symbolic meaning of a city built on a mountain. You are building your cities, your houses, in a valley, and ordinary sleep is not enough for you; you also seek drugs to fall more asleep; you seek methods of hypnosis to become more sleepy, more unconscious – because consciousness is pain; it is anguish.

Why does consciousness fortify you? Because the more conscious you become, the more you know you cannot die; there is no death. Death exists only in the dark valley. (…) The more conscious you are, the more you know you are the eternal, the Divine. Right now, you don't know who you are. This is the valley of ignorance, and there only death happens, nothing else; and you live trembling, shaking with fear. (…) If you move to the heights, love will be within, and eternity all around. There will be no fear – there cannot be. This is the fortification Jesus speaks about: A city being built on a high mountain and fortified, cannot fall nor can it ever be hidden. (…) Remember, the high altitude is the fortification. (…) People fall whenever they are on the heights, but those heights belong to the valley; they are not real heights. (…) Whatsoever you achieve in this world will be taken away. Knowing cannot go back; once achieved, it becomes your being, and you cannot unknow it.

This world is just a bridge. Move on. Cross it, but don't stop on it. This is no place to make a home. Nobody makes a home on the bridge. (…) It is a bridge because it is on a river, and the river is of the momentary. Time is just a momentary river – it goes on flowing and flowing. (…) This world is just a bridge, and you have made a house on it. (…) For fifty years you have been making the house, and it is always almost ready, never ready. It cannot be; that is not the nature of it.

Whenever there is a man like Jesus or Buddha, you try to escape from him in every possible way, because he is like a death to you. (…) whenever truth is asserted, you will start throwing stones at the man who asserts it – because if he is true, your whole life is false. (…) So there are only two possibilities: either you are ready to collapse completely, or you will throw stones at this man.

To gather knowledge is easy, because you need not to transform yourself.

Self-knowledge remains individual. No country can possess it; it cannot become a heritage; it is not a tradition. A man knows, and when that man dies, that knowledge disappears from the world. It has to be discovered again and again and again; you cannot make it a possession.

A man of understanding moves with understanding. Whatsoever the situation that arises, he responds with his awareness; he is neither brave nor a coward.

The very nature of desire is to remain unfulfilled. However much time is given, even many eternities, the desire will remain unfulfilled. (…) It will arise again and again, and the more you try to fulfill it, the more it will arise; you are simply feeding the desire when you think you are fulfilling it. (…) This is so with every desire. (…) Desire has no bottom; that's why it cannot be fulfilled. (…) You are dying because you have been running all the way, and faster and faster and faster, and this thing has no bottom.

When you drop the future, the past is dropped immediately. (…) It is just like making a bridge on a river. The bridge needs two banks to exist. If one bank disappears, the other bank alone cannot support the bridge – the bridge falls; everything disappears. The past and the future are the two banks, and between these two, you have made a bridge of desire. You are always going somewhere, always going. If you are not reaching, then the mind says, "Move faster!". (…) The more speed, the more lost you will be; then it will be difficult to come back home. This is why self-knowledge has become almost impossible in this age, the age of speed.

A real religious man, a Master, wants to make you stronger. And a priest is just a cunning man who knows what your weakness is.

If you do not know yourselves, then you are in poverty and you are poverty. (…) There is only one poverty: when you don't know yourself. (…) Ignorance of self is the only poverty. (…) You are emperors, sons of a living God, (…) but you are unaware of it, and you go on begging. All desires are begging.

What is meaning? Meaning means to know the fragment in relation to the Whole; meaning is a relationship of the fragment to the Whole.

A vegetative life (…) is the greatest misfortune that can happen to a man, because he will never grow in awareness and maturity; and he will not have higher layers of consciousness, because those higher layers come into existence only when they are challenged. Suffering is a challenge. When there is a problem, you are challenged. When you encounter the problem, only then do you grow. More insecurity, more growth; more security, less growth. (…) Life exists in danger; life always exists in the possibility of going astray. (…) if you want to win the war, you will have to lose many battles. If you are afraid to lose a battle, you will never enter into the war; then there is no possibility. (…) Whenever you fail in something, it is not the ultimate failure; you can transcend it.

Hindus have called this world sansar. Sansar means the wheel: you simply repeat the same mistakes again and again and again. Situations may differ, but the mistake remains the same, of the same quality. (…) Hindus have said that you have to be born again and again, because you have not yet grown. Only a grown-up person goes beyond this world. Those who have not grown, they have to fall back in the pit; they have to learn.

Suffering brings in consciousness, but if you move more and more in consciousness, suffering disappears. (…) In the center, there is awareness; on the circumference, there is suffering, as if suffering belongs to somebody else: you are not identified. (…) The body becomes the object, and you become the subject; there is a gap. (…) In awareness, all bridges are broken; the identification is broken – and that is the key to life.

Jesus on the cross is just a symbol of the final suffering, the absolute suffering, of the peak of suffering. (…) I always say that before the moment of crucifixion, he was Jesus; after that moment, he became Christ. At that moment, the total transmutation happened. At the moment of crucifixion, he came to the perfect awareness.

Wherever you feel any identification, your energy moves there.

Use all your suffering for meditation, and soon you will come to know that the suffering disappears, because the energy starts moving inwards.

Jesus said: Look upon the living one as long as you live, lest you die and seek to see him and be unable to see him. (…) In you, there is one who is a living one, and one who is already dead. In you, two worlds meet: the world of matter and the world of spirit – you exist on the boundary. In you, two realms meet: the realm of death and the realm of life – you exist in between. If you pay too much attention to that which belongs to death, you will always remain afraid, suffering, fearful. If you pay attention to your center, which belongs to life, to eternal life, to immortality, fear will disappear.

If for your whole life you have been attentive to the realm of death – the realm of things, the realm of matter and the world – it will be difficult, almost impossible, to look at the realm of life when you are dying. (…) Your whole life you have been looking outward – your neck will be paralyzed; you cannot turn back. It needs a continuous movement towards the world of the deathless while you live. (…) Obsession with the outside has to be broken. No need to escape the forest, that will not help; but in twenty-four hours, you have enough moments to look within. (…) Just a little practice is needed to see and become attuned to the inner light. It is inner darkness right now because you are attuned to the outer light. (…) Become attuned to the inner light – look, wait, watch. Soon your eyes will become accustomed and you will be able to see.

All the religions have tried fasting – why? Because when you fast, awareness grows intense, because it is not part of food. Really, food destroys awareness, and when you don't eat, you become more and more aware, because food gives a sort of sleep; it is an intoxicant. (…) Without food, more awareness happens. (…) When you give the body food, to absorb the food, to digest it, your whole energy is needed. You feel sleepy, because the energy that was working as consciousness is required in the stomach to work as a digestive force. So people who eat too much cannot meditate well, impossible. They can sleep well, but they cannot be aware; they cannot be very conscious. (…) Their whole life is a food-circle.

If you go on a long fast, after the third, fourth or fifth day, hunger disappears, because the body insists for three, four, five days – the body does not have a very long memory – it insists on the old habit for a few days, and then, if you don't listen, the body makes its arrangement in a different way. Every day, you have to eat to give the body its daily quota. If you don't give it food for five to seven days, then the body has an emergency measure: the accumulated flesh in the body, the accumulated fat. Every ordinary, healthy person accumulates enough fat for at least three months; that is a reservoir. When the body thinks that you are not going to give food, the body starts eating its own reservoir. (…) All the religions became aware that if you fast, awareness increases, because the energy is released when there is nothing to digest. Nothing to be taken in and thrown out, all work stops. The work at the factory of the body is not there; the factory is locked. Then the whole energy that you have got becomes awareness. That's why it is difficult to sleep when you are on a fast. And if you have been on a fast for at least twenty, thirty, forty days, you will have a new type of sleep: your body will sleep, and you will remain awake.

Jesus said: Two will rest on a bed; the one will die, the one will live. (…) Exactly the same words are in the Upanishads. They say that there are two birds on a tree, one sitting on a lower branch, another sitting on a higher branch. The bird on the lower branch thinks, gets worried, desires, demands, accumulates, fights, competes; it remains in anguish, tension, jumps from this branch to that, always moving, never in repose. The other bird, who is sitting on a higher branch, is in repose. He is so silent, as if he is not. He has no desires; no dreams happen to him. He has no needs to fulfill, as if everything is fulfilled, as if he has attained, nowhere to go. He simply sits, enjoying himself, and he watches the bird who is on the lower branch. These are the two dimensions in you. You are the tree.

Now the whole question is to whom the attention should be paid. Towards whom should you move, towards whom should your whole energy flow? Who should become your goal? Ordinarily, the one who is going to die is your goal. That's why you are always in anxiety, because you are building a house on sands. (…) You are always trembling, because you are making a signature on water. (…) Your anxiety is because you are concerned with the realm of death, and you have not looked towards life. (…) Pay more attention to the witness; turn towards it more and more – that's what conversion means. Conversion means the movement of attention from the death realm to the life realm. It is an about-turn: looking at the witness, becoming one with the witness, losing yourself into the witness, into awareness, and then you know that which is going to die will die.

Hume has said, "Many people have talked about going in and looking there. Whenever I look, I find nothing – just thoughts, desires, dreams, floating here and there – just a chaos." You will also feel the same. And if you conclude that there is nothing worthwile in going again and again to see this chaos, then you will miss. In the beginning you will see this, because your eyes can only see this – they need a tuning. (…) Don't conclude too soon. (…) impatience is the greatest barrier; infinite patience is needed.

In this world, you always enter as imperfect. Perfection simply disappears from this world. Perfection is not of this world, cannot be; it is against the very law. Once somebody is perfect, his whole life enters into a vertical dimension. (…) He moves in eternity, not in time. (…) It is said in old scriptures that whenever a man comes near perfection, he will leave something imperfect in order to come back and help people. (…) Before dying, Ramakrishna said that he had been clinging to food just as a part of something imperfect in him, so that he could be here and serve you. Many Masters have done that. The moment they feel that something is going to be completely perfect in them, they will cling to some imperfection just to be here; otherwise this bank is not for them. If all the fetters are broken, then their boat sails towards the other bank, then it cannot remain here. They will keep one fetter; they will keep some relationship; they will choose some weakness in themselves, and they will not allow it to disappear. Through that gap, they can remain here.

Hindus alone dispose of their gods. They make a god for two or three weeks; they worship it; and then, when the worship is over, they go to the ocean and dispose of the god. (…) Being, not the form, you will find everywhere. And that beingness is the point to be understood – that beingness is God. (…) Cleave a piece of wood and I am there; lift up the stone and you will find me there.

Rejection means that something has to be done; as you are, you are wrong; something has to be cut, something has to be thrown. As you are, you are not accepted; you are not welcome. You will have to change yourself; only then will you be welcome. Vedanta says that as you are, you are welcome. Nothing is to be done – the very concept of doing has been the cause of your misery, because whatsoever you do will lead you into the world. That's why Hindus say it's because of karma you are in the world. Karma does not mean doing bad; karma simply means doing. Because you have been paying too much attention to doing this or that, you are in the world. Don't pay much attention to the doing; pay much attention to the being. Don't think of what is to be done; just think of who you are. (…) The problem is not that others reject you; the problem is that you reject yourself. And if you reject yourself, you are in a vicious circle. Then you will try to improve, and nothing can be improved, because it is impossible to improve you. You are God himself; as you are, you are divine – how can the Divine be improved? (…) When you come to understand the futility of your effort, you will drop all effort and become aware of who you are. Then the problem will be solved.

Karma is a cycle, a wheel: one karma leads to another.

Vedanta says you are not a sinner – you may be ignorant, but you are not a sinner. (…) Hindus will say that you may have got into trouble because you ate the fruit of the tree of ignorance, not of knowledge. (…) So religion means gaining more light, more knowledge, more awareness; not more morality, not more virtue. Virtue will be a by-product. When you are aware, virtue will happen; it will follow like a shadow. When you are unaware, sin will follow, because ignorance cannot do anything else; it can only commit mistakes.

Jesus is a poet of the Ultimate.

Christianity depends not on Jesus, but on Jesus' miracles. (…) No miracle can prove anything. Miracles really prove the ignorance of those who are impressed by miracles, nothing else. (…) all tricks are useless; they prove nothing. They prove your ignorance, and they prove that the other man is cunning and exploiting you.

Christians missed the inner thing that happened at the crucifixion. Only a few can see it. Those who have seen themselves can see what happened at the crucifixion: this man accepted – that was the miracle. This man suffered and accepted; this man suffered and still remained filled with love – that was the miracle. Those who were killing him, murdering him, he could pray even for them – that is the miracle, the greatest miracle that ever happened on earth. (…) This is the greatest miracle, at the crucifixion: the whole body is suffering, and he is dying – yet still filled with love. (…) Miracles did happen, but they were not miracles which the eyes can see; they were those which only the heart can feel.

Try to understand: as there is an inner blindness, there is an inner leprosy. You are so guilt-ridden, fear-filled, jealous, anxious – this is the leprosy. It is eating your inner world like a worm; you are a wound inside. Jesus healed, but that is a private thing. It happens between a Master and the disciple; nobody else becomes aware of it.

Your misery is that you cannot remember who you are. Self-remembering is needed; nothing else is to be done. You have to become more conscious. You have to raise your consciousness to a peak from where you can see. At that moment you become illuminated – no corner remains dark; your whole being becomes aflame. Then you will understand Jesus; then you will understand Buddha; then you will understand Krishna; or then you will understand me, because the whole effort is to make you aware of who you are.

Man is born a slave and remains a slave all his life – a slave of his desires, a slave of the body or of the mind, but all the same, slavery continues. From the moment you are born to the moment you die, it is a long struggle against slavery. And religion consists of being free. Religion is freedom from all slavery.

To be completely free is very difficult. It will need a crystallization within you; it will need a center. And right now, there is no center in you; you are not a crystallized being; you are just a chaos. (…) Sometimes one desire overpowers you, (…) and only a few minutes later, another desire overtakes you. (…) you get identified with each desire; you say, "I am this." (…) This identification is the root cause of all slavery, and unless this identification disappears, you will never be free. Freedom means the disappearance of identification with the body, mind, heart.

Your whole life is a long cry for some desires to be fulfilled – that's why there is so much suffering. It stops only when you are dead. Religion gives you the keys to make you free; but you being a slave, and the life of a slave being convenient, comfortable, you create mock religions which don't give you any freedom, which simply give you new types of slavery. Christianity, Hinduism, Buddhism, or Islam, as they are, organized, established, they are new sorts of imprisonments. Jesus is freedom, Mohammed is freedom, Krishna is freedom, Buddha is freedom; but not Buddhism, not Mohammedanism, not Christianity, not Hinduism – they are mock. So a new slavery is born: (…) you become slaves to the priests. More slavery happens out of your mock religions, and nothing changes in you.

The crowd that you are has to disappear, disappear in a crystallized center. You will have to disappear completely. (…) Fire is an alchemical term; anything that needs to be crystallized will have to pass through fire. If you want to make something out of gold, the gold will have to pass through fire. First it will have to become liquid, then it will be purified. It will be pure gold, and then you can mold it into anything else. (…) And the same thing is going to happen to a disciple: the Master is a fire, and you have to become completely liquid, so that all that was wrong is burned, and all that was right has become liquid and one. Then you will crystallize. (…) to come to Jesus is difficult: you are coming near a fire, and the nearer you come, the more you will feel burned. (…) So Jesus says, Whoever is near to me is near a fire, and whoever is far away from me is far away from the kingdom. (…) When a disciple allows the fire to work, he passes through a furnace. And when he comes out of it, the crowd has gone; the baser metal has changed into the higher – there has been a transformation.

When I say it has been a transformation, I mean it is discontinuous with the past. If there is a continuity, there is no mutation, only modification. (…) You go on modifying yourself a little bit here and there. It is a patchwork, but a patchwork is never a revolution; (…) you are never transformed. Somewhere you change a little bit, but the totality remains the same. And the totality is so powerful that the new that you have made will not remain new for long. Sooner or later, the totality will absorb it, and it will be the old. You go on improving yourself, but no improvement can lead you to religion. Religion is not an improvement. Whom are you improving? You are the illness; you are the disease; and you are improving a disease. You may polish it, you may give it a mask, but the illness remains.

A transformation is a new birth, a resurrection. (…) There is a gap: the old drops, and the new comes, and there is no causal link. (…) The old has disappeared from the known, and the new has come from the unknown. (…) The old has gone into nothingness, and the new has come out of nothingness.

When you meditate, you are creating an opening; when you pray, you are creating an opening.

The kingdom has to be achieved; that is the fulfillment. Without it, you will remain unfulfilled; without it, you will remain a barren womb, without giving birth to anything; without it, you will remain futile, meaningless; without it, your whole life will be just a nightmare, leading nowhere – running so fast, and reaching nowhere.

One has to decide. Decision is final, because you cannot go back. Once you are in the fire, you cannot go back. Once you are really intimate with Jesus, then there is no going back.

You have to be purified; you have to be really completely dissolved, so there comes an emptiness. And in that emptiness, the ray of creation, God's ray, enters, and then you are fulfilled. (…) Then, you remain in the bliss eternal; then, the ecstasy is there. Not that it happens through something: then, it is your nature, your very being. If ecstasy happens through something, it cannot be eternal, because that something can be lost; if it is caused by something outside, then it cannot remain forever – it can be only momentary. Ecstasy and bliss can remain permanently with you, eternally with you, non-temporally with you, only when you have come to realize them as your being.

Wherever you feel only consolations, escape from there – priests may be there, but not a Master. (…) "Do something good: make a hospital, a school; go and serve the masses, the poor, the downtrodden, the ill. Donate some money to the church." These are ways to console you. (…) You may not exploit, you may start serving, but the old is there – there is no transformation. (…) This is not change. This is just throwing away guilt. It becomes a release; it gives you a feeling that you are good. It's a calculation – because you have been bad, you are just trying to balance the account. But you remain the same, the same cunning mind.

Always remember that when the positive becomes negative, it gives you a false feeling that you have changed. It is just like a man standing on his head: the man remains the same. (…) You accumulate money; then you donate money. It has changed: from positive, the greed has become negative. But you have not changed; you remain the same. Money remains the most significant thing; you remain money-obsessed. First, it was positive; now, it is negative. (…) If you can change from the positive to the negative, you can change from the negative to the positive. These are the two poles of the same mind. (…) Both can be dropped, but you cannot do the impossible: choosing one and denying the other. Whosoever denies, affirms; whosoever suppresses, feeds. (…) A man of greed remains a man of greed; a man of anger remains a man of anger; a man of sex remains a man of sex; just moving to the opposite pole makes no change, remember this. (…) You can throw the whole thing out, that's possible, but then you are neither a brahmachari nor one who indulges. Then you are neither male nor female. That's what Jesus means when he says "eunuchs of God": when both polarities have been thrown out.

Mind always likes to move to the opposite pole, because mind always gets fed up with one thing. And the opposite gives the taste again. (…) Look at this polarity. (…) Mock religion helps you to move to the opposite pole, which is not a transformation; real religion simply helps you to burn both the polarities completely. That's why real religion is real fire. (…) And when desire, positive and negative, both disappear, the kingdom is there. (…) When your eyes are not filled with desire this way or that way, when you are not moving in sex or against sex, when you are not obsessed with food or with fasting, when you are simply without desires, then your eyes have clarity. (…) Fire will burn all your desires, all your future and past; it will leave you simply here and now. Suddenly the energy turns within; there is a conversion, a transformation. Nothing left to look at, you have to go within. Energy has to move; finding no passage outside, the whole energy turns within. The kingdom of God is there.

A Master is needed, who is awake, who will not allow your sleep to create new dreams, who will go on shaking you.

It is always good to have one Master. Even if you have two Masters, you will know trouble, and if the Masters are millions, you will be in constant confusion. Millions of orders will be received, and you will be pulled in every direction; you will become a chaos. That's how madness happens, because you cannot see what to do. Whom to follow and whom not to follow? Your greed says, "Just go on accumulating money". Your sex says, "Go on indulging in sex". But then there is a problem, because there is a conflict. (…) So what to do? So many Masters, and only one slave. It is good if you choose one Master. At least a million voices dissolve, only Jesus has to be followed, and you can throw all the responsibility on him. And he says, Easy is my yoke. Why is it easy? Because even if he asks you to surrender, he is asking you to do so only that you become free of your other Masters. Once you are free of your desires, he will throw his yoke also. This is just an interim arrangement, just a passage. Once you have thrown all the desires, then this surrender is not needed. (…) You have become enlightened in your own light, in your own right. (…) The surrender is a passage for the disciple to become a Master himself. (…) Surrender means that now the ego cannot persist in you; there is no meaning to it, and there is no feeding it. (…) Jesus used the symbolic terms of drinking and eating: Whoever drinks from my mouth shall become as I am and I myself will become he, and the hidden things shall be revealed to him. He says, "Eat me, drink me, absorb me completely in you." That's what the meaning of eating and drinking is: let me move within you; digest me so completely that I become part of your being; (…) then the disciple has become the Master.

Before you can become a Master, you have to be totally a disciple. (…) You have to allow somebody to help you deeply. And that deep help is possible only when you are not there, because you are the disturbance, you are the hindrance.

The deepest urge in man is to be totally free. Freedom, moksha, is the goal. Jesus calls it the kingdom of God: to be like kings, so that there is no fetter to your existence, no bondage, no boundary; you exist as infinity, as if you were alone. Freedom and aloneness are two aspects of the same thing. That's why Mahavira called his concept of moksha, kaivalya. Kaivalya means to be absolutely alone, as if nothing else exists. (…) those who are in search of freedom will have to find their solitariness; they will have to find a way, means, method to reach their aloneness.

Politics, psychology, culture, education, they are all in the service of society. Religion alone is basically rebellious. But the society has fooled you; it has created its own religions – these are social tricks. (…) Jesus is antisocial; Buddha is antisocial – but Christianity is not antisocial; Buddhism is not antisocial. Society is very cunning: it immediately absorbs – even antisocial phenomena it absorbs into the social. It creates a façade, it gives you a false coin, and then you are happy. (…) Established religions give you consolation; they give you good sleep; they allow a soothing existence in this torturing slavery all around; they give you a feeling that everything is okay, nothing is wrong. They are like tranquilizers; they are drugs.

Something has to be understood: society is not without you; it is something within you. And unless the root causes within you disappear, wherever you go, the society will come into existence again and again and again. (…) It is not the society that follows you – it is you. You always create your society around you – you are a creator. Something in you exists as a seed which creates the society. This really shows that unless you are transformed completely, you can never go beyond society; you will always create your society. And all societies are the same; the forms may differ, but the basic pattern is the same.

You cannot live with yourself. Whenever you are alone, you become uneasy; immediately you feel inconvenience, discomfort, a deep anxiety. What to do? Go to the club, go to the church, go to the theater – but go somewhere, meet the other. Or just go shopping. (…) To be alone is very difficult, very unusual, extraordinary – because whenever you are alone, your whole meaning disappears.

Jesus says, It is very difficult for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God. A camel may enter through the eye of a needle, but not a rich man into the kingdom of God. – Why? Because a man who has been accumulating riches is trying to become significant through wealth. He wants to be somebody, and whosoever wants to be somebody, the door of the kingdom is closed for him.

Who is a solitary? One who does not ask any meaning from you, from your eyes, from your responses. If you give your love, he will be grateful, but if you don't give, there is no complaint; he is as good as ever. If you come to visit him, he will be happy, but if you don't come, he is as happy as ever. If he moves in a crowd, he will enjoy it, but if he lives in a hermitage, he will enjoy that also. (…) You cannot change the mood of a solitary man; you cannot change his inner climate. (…) You cannot make a solitary man unhappy, because he has learned to live with himself and be happy with himself. Alone, he is sufficient. That's why people who are related to each other never like the other to become religious. If one starts moving in the direction of religion and God, the other feels disturbed. Why? An unconscious fear comes into the conscious – the fear that someone is trying to become sufficient unto himself. (…) A sannyasin means one who is sufficient unto himself, who does not need anybody, who is not in any way dependent. And that gives fear: then you become useless. Your whole existence has been around this need, that he needed you. (…) There will be disturbance; your ego will be hurt.

Those who need a crowd will be thrown again and again into the crowd – that is their need; that's their demand; that's their desire. God fulfills whatsoever you ask, and whatsoever you are is just a fulfillment of your past desires. Don't blame it on anybody else; it is what you have been praying for. And remember, this is one of the dangerous things in the world: whatsoever you desire will be fulfilled. (…) Think before you desire. (…) Desire with full awareness, because every desire is bound to be fulfilled sometime or other.

Blessed are the solitary and elect, for you shall find the kingdom; and because you come from it you shall go there again. (…) A solitary becomes an elect; he is the chosen one of God. Why? Because a solitary never desires anything of this world. He does not need to; he has learned whatsoever was to be learned from this world; this school is finished; he has passed through it, transcended it. He has become like a high peak which remains alone in the sky. (…) A Buddha, a Jesus, they are high peaks, solitary peaks. That's their beauty: they exist alone. (…) What has the solitary chosen? He has chosen only his own being. And when you choose your own being, you have chosen the being of the whole universe. (…) Alone, the solitary is whole. This beingness, this wholeness makes you a circle, and the beginning and the end meet; the alpha and the omega meet. A solitary is not like a line. You are like a line – your beginning and end will never meet. A solitary is like a circle – his beginning and end meet; he becomes one with the source.

The society, the crowd does not allow anybody to become a solitary. They will haunt you; they will try to press you back into the society. They will want you to come back to the prison. (…) And they will feel uncomfortable with you if you become a solitary one, because your very presence makes them doubtful about their own existence. (…) This man seems so happy, not needing anybody, not being needed, so solitary, so alone, and so blissful; and you are almost neurotic, almost mad. Something is wrong with you, not with this man. You will try in every way to prove that this man is wrong. (…) it is because he gives you a doubt about yourself. That's why we have never welcomed such people, never. We have always rejected them when they were alive. We welcome them when they are dead, because then we can paint their faces in our own ways; we can arrange everything according to ourselves.

The cross is a symbol of time and eternity meeting. And that point must be your death, (…) because when you disappear from the time-world, you become a part of eternity. (…) you will die as you are, and you will be reborn. (…) And through that birth, no death exists, but life eternal. To Jesus, the cross was a time symbol: time and eternity crossing. But for Christianity, it became a sad death symbol of suffering.

If they say to you 'From where have you originated?' say to them, 'We have come from the light, where the light originated through itself.' If they ask you, What is the sign of your Father in you?' say to them: 'It is a movement and a rest.' (…) We are moving and yet at rest. (…) We are in the crowd, but not of the crowd. (…) We live and move in this world, but we don't belong to this world. (…) We move, and yet there is no tension in the movement; we walk, but at the center of our being there is no movement, because there is no motivation to reach anywhere – we have attained. This is the sign of the Father. (…) There is no desire, and yet we go on working. There is no motivation, yet we go on breathing and living. (…) We live, and yet we do not. You see us in time, and yet time has disappeared for us; we have entered eternity. This is the sign of a perfect Master: movement and rest; living in the world, not renouncing it – and yet totally renounced. Where contradictions meet, the Ultimate appears. If you choose one, you have missed. (…) Extremes are easy to choose: you can move into activity and get lost in it, or you can renounce the activity and get lost in rest. But both will be choices – you will be as far away from God as possible, because God has not rejected anything; he has not renounced anything. He is in all; he is all. (…) Be choiceless, a choiceless awareness; let movement be there, and let rest be there, and let movement and rest rest together. Become a symphony, not a single note.

Unless mystery dissolves, man cannot rest at peace.

Dreams bring misery; existence is pure ecstasy.

To know Jesus, you will have to know your innermost nothingness. Without knowing it, you cannot make anybody else acquainted with Jesus.

Moses gave a very crude discipline to society. He could not have done better; there was no way. Human consciousness existed in a very primitive way. A little bit of civilization was more than one could expect. But Moses prepared the way, and Jesus is the fulfilment. What Moses started, Jesus completes. Moses has laid the foundation; Jesus raises the whole temple. Those stones in the foundation have to be crude and ugly. Only on those crude and ugly stones can a beautiful marble temple be built. (…) Jesus is not against Moses. But the Jews misunderstood him, because Moses talks about law and Jesus talks about love. (…) Jesus does not exist at the level of justice; he exists at the level of compassion.

Life is meaningless, unless you give meaning to it. There is no in-built meaning in it; it has to be created. (…) Life is just blank. It is just an opportunity. You can create meaning; you can create meaninglessness too. You can create freedom; you can create imprisonment too. It all depends on you. Your freedom is total. Man is very afraid of this freedom, because this freedom becomes a great responsibility. You would like somebody to give you meaning, so that then you are not responsible. (…) If you are simply waiting for some meaning to come into your life, you are waiting like a beggar with a begging bowl. Then you will never get it. And because you are waiting, you will continuously feel meaningless. (…) Sannyas means a creative approach towards God. Your prayer should not just be impotent.

A man who lives moment-to-moment will have many contradictions. He cannot be very consistent; only dead people can be consistent.

Understand Jesus; there is no need to follow. If you follow, that will be against Jesus, because he never followed anybody. If you follow Jesus, you will be carrying a blueprint in your head, and you will always be looking from that blueprint: what to do? what not to do? And Jesus never came to any conclusions. He lived an open life.

You are not completely fed up with the mind. There must be some subtle infatuation still lingering. You are still hoping that maybe something better can come out of it. (…) But this will be just a reformation. (…) That does not make any difference. The mind will be there, and the mind creates the barrier between you and God. (…) So, don't be in a hurry. If you are not totally fed up with the mind, get a little more fed up with it. But it needs a let-go. (…) Let go of it. In its dropping is the benediction. (…) The mind is very cunning in playing games. (…) The one that says "I am fed up" is but a part of the mind; (…) the mind divides and then goes on playing the game of hide-and-seek. The one that you are fed up with and the one who is fed up – both are the same. The object and the subject are the same. See it; look into it. Just be choiceless. Choice is mind. (…) Just watch. (…) Don't decide. Don't take sides. Go on watching. (…) Simply watch without deciding that you have to do anything about the mind. (…) Be a witness. Just watch what is happening.

There are three stages of enlightenment. First is when the glimpse happens. I call it mini-satori. (…) from that moment, the seed will be in your heart and growing. (…) The second I call satori: that is when you have become capable of retaining this gap as long as you want. (…) But a little effort is still needed on your part. If you drop the effort, the satori disappears. (…) It will not happen if you are not groping in the dark at all. (…) real gropers can accept all kinds of defeats and frustrations, but their search continues. Unwavering, they go on groping. The darkness is great, it seems to be almost endless, but their hope is greater than the darkness. That is the meaning of faith. (…) Faith means trying to see that which you have not seen, and you cannot even be certain whether it exists or not. A great passion is needed to have that much faith. (…) Then the second becomes a more conscious groping. (…) Now faith is not needed; experience is enough. (…) Now you grope more consciously; you make efforts in the right direction. (…) Now things become more clear; now it is not just waiting in the darkness. You can start moving; you can have a direction. Still you falter; still sometimes you fall. (…) But never again can doubt arise in you. The doubt has been killed by the first satori. Then, more and more, it will come. And sooner or later, you will become capable of bringing it on order; whenever you want, you can create that milieu in you which brings it. (…) This is the second stage. But still, effort is needed to tune. You are not continuously tuned on your own; you have to work it out. (…) Then the third thing happens. (…) It becomes a natural quality. That I call samadhi.

What I say is just an excuse. What I am is the real thing.

Man in himself is not a being, but a passage. In himself, man is not a being, because man is continuously becoming. There is no rest in being a man. Rest is below man or above man. Below is nature; above is God. Man is just in between – a link, a ladder. (…) The ladder cannot become your abode. Man has to be surpassed; man has to be transcended. (…) The whole message of Jesus is how to go beyond man. That's why again and again he says: I am the Son of man and the Son of God. He goes on insisting on this contradiction, because he wants it to be completely clear that he is both: on the one hand part of nature; on the other hand part of God. That is the meaning of the word son: son means a part of the father. And because man belongs to these two realities, two separate realities, there is tension in man, there is a constant conflict in man, because these two realities go on fighting. Hence, as man, there is no possibility of peace. Either you have to become absolutely unconscious, like a drunkard, or you become a Buddha or a Christ – then there is peace. Either fall below man, or go beyond man. Don't go on clinging to being a man, because then you are clinging to a disease. That's exactly what man is: a disease, a constant tension, a constant fight between the lower and the higher. To understand man as a conflict, to understand man as a constant tension will help immensely, because then you stop clinging to man as such.

The mind has five layers. First, the mind of the child, the pre-mind or the primal mind. (…) You don't have any understanding; you don't have any identity; nobody exists in you. (…) You are not yet real. (…) Second, the collective mind. (…) The collective mind functions through conditionings. (…) The third mind I call the 'individual mind' or the 'ego mind'; Nietzsche calls it 'the lion'. It is independence; it is assertion; it is rebellion. The ego has evolved. The ego has become very crystallized. The man is no more just a part of a church, country, tribe, clan, family; he is himself. The real culture can only start when you have become an individual. The sense of the self is a must, and this is the third stage of the mind. The identity is no more of belonging; (…) the identity is more personal; (…) the identity is more creative. (…) In the nebulous mind, a center arises by and by. In the child's mind, there was no center. In the collective mind, there was a false center imposed from the outside. In the individual mind, an inner center arises. The first was a kind of chaos – no order. The second was a kind of patriarchy – an imposed order by the demanding society. The third is a kind of fraternity; a brotherhood arises. (…) You respect others' freedom as much as you respect your own freedom.

The man who always says yes – his yes is not of much worth. But the man who says no ninety-nine times and says yes one time – he means it. It has an authenticity.

If you fall from the third, the individual mind, you will go immediately into madness, because falling back to the second is no more possible. You have learnt no-saying; you have learnt being rebellious; you have tasted freedom – now you cannot fall back to the second. That door no more exists for you; that is finished forever. If you fall from the third, (…) you will go mad. That's exactly what happened to Friedrich Nietzsche himself. He was a lion, but the lion went mad, roaring and roaring and roaring, and could not find a way beyond the third. (…)

Nietzsche needed a man like Buddha. And because Buddha was not available, and because the Western mind has not yet been able to make it possible for people to go beyond the third, he had to go mad. In the West, it is almost a certainty that whenever a person becomes really evolved at the third stage, he starts slipping into madness, because the fourth is not available there yet. If the fourth is available, then the third is very creative. If there is a possibility to surrender the ego, then the ego is of immense value. But the value is in its surrender. If you cannot surrender it, then it will become a load – a great load on you. It will be unbearable. Then the lion will go on roaring and roaring, and there will be no other way than to go mad.

This is a very critical state – the third; it is just in the middle. Two minds are below it, and two minds are above it. It is exactly mid-link. If you fall, you go into the abyss of madness; if you rise, you go into the beatitude of being a Christ or a Buddha.

Religion helps you to go through the third door. That is the difference between psychoanalysis and religion. Religion also makes you adjusted, but not with the society; it makes you adjusted with the Whole, with the universe, with God. That is real adjustment, and great joy arises out of it.

The fourth mind is universal mind. (…) Near the age of forty-two, forty-five, a man starts looking for the fourth mind. (…) he starts looking for samadhi, meditation. (…) the ego can be dissolved, because the ego has matured. Remember, let me repeat: the ego can be dissolved only when it has become mature. (…) When ego has been used and dropped, when the ego's function is fulfilled, it is no more necessary; one has gone beyond it. The boat can be left behind.

God loves individuals, but not persons. And the difference is great. A person is one who has an ego definition. And an individual is one who has dropped his ego and knows who he is. A person is a circle with a center; and the individual is a circle without the center – just pure space. "The person is only a mask; it is a theatrical creation, a mere stage-prop" (Viktor Frankl). The longing for freedom, salvation or nirvana means simply the wish to be relieved of your so-called personality and the prison that it creates. "The trouble with the self is that it is derived from other. It is constructed in an attempt to live up to the expectations of others. The others have become installed in our hearts, and we call them ourselves." The self is not you. It belongs to others who surround you. It exists in you, but is possessed by others. It is the subtlest slavery yet invented by the priests and the politicians. It is like a Delgado electrode inserted in your head and manipulated by remote control. (…) Revolution is possible only through the egoist. But the egoist can be manipulated very easily. Give him the Nobel Prize, give him a doctorate, and he is ready to do anything.

One has to go beyond the third state of mind, and the fourth state of mind, the universal mind, has to be created. The separation with the cosmos has to disappear. You have to become one with the Whole. (…) In India, we say: satyam, shivam, sunderam – then there is truth, then there is good, and then there is beauty. (…) With the universal mind, these three flowers come into bloom. (…) You have disappeared, and all the energy that was involved in the ego is freed. That energy becomes beauty, good, truth. (…) With the fourth stage, love starts flowing. (…) The poet Schiller has called it "the universal kiss". (…) The universal mind lives in trust – shraddha; it is not belief; it is your own vision, your own experience. This is true religion: when you become a witness of God, (…) when you have not taken it as borrowed; it is no more knowledge, no more belief; it has become your existential experience. (…) Then God flows through you. (…) The real creativity is possible only with the universal. (…) you become instrumental – God is the doer.

The universal mind is not chaotic; it has a self-discipline. It has an inner cosmos, an inner order – not irresponsible like the first (primal mind); not responsible like the second (collective mind). (…) You see the right, and the right has to be done. Knowledge here becomes virtue. You act according to your awareness; your life is transformed. There is innocence; there is intelligence; there is love – but all is coming from your innermost core; your inner fountain is flowing.

And then the fifth, the last, the transcendental, is when you go even beyond the universal. Because even to think that it is the universal mind is to think. You have some ideas of the individual and the universe still left lingering somewhere. You are still conscious that you are one with the Whole, but you are, and you are one with the Whole. The unity is not yet total, is not utter, is not ultimate. When the unity is really ultimate, there is no individual, no universal. This is the fifth mind: Christ-mind, Buddha-mind. Now, three other characteristics appear: satchitananda. Sat means being; that means consciousness; ananda means bliss. (…) Man has surpassed himself; the bridge is no more. You are for the first time a being; becoming is no more. (…) You are fully awake. (…) That's what Jesus calls the kingdom of God.

It is not a question of repeating any formal prayer; the real question is of the heart – not what you say, but what you mean.

You can enter into God only in your absolute aloneness. (…) One has to go alone. The gate is very narrow. (…) You will have to go as an individual.

Jesus' sayings are addressed to the third mind, the individual, because they can be addressed only to the third mind. All the scriptures are addressed to the third mind, because only at the point of the third mind is understanding possible – difficult, but possible. (…) So remember, the first cannot listen; the second can listen, but cannot understand; the third can understand, but cannot follow; the fourth can follow, but only follow; the fifth can become the transcendental mind.

In life, one has to continuously move. It is movement; it is process. (…) one has to go on and on, till the goal is reached.

Jesus talks about prayer. Prayer is the way – Jesus' way – to be alone. Buddha's way is meditation; Jesus' way is prayer. But the intrinsic quality has to be the same. Jesus says: Be silent; language is not needed. (…) Language is to relate with the other; and God is not the other – God is your innermost core. There is no need for any language. (…) Language dropped, you have dropped the whole world. (…) You just have to be there, silent, present, utterly non-verbal, not saying a single thing. (…) Prayer should be in solitude; nobody should know about it. There is no need. It is nobody else's concern. But thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet, and when thou has shut thy door, pray to thy Father in secret.

Don't live psychologically in the past or in the future. But practically, sometimes you will have to remember past things, or consider future arrangements. (…) But you don't live there.

The depth of love has nothing to do with a relationship, one person or two persons. (…) that you should remain in love always – that brings depth. (…) You love a person not for the person's sake; you love the person for love's sake. (…) because only love, when it becomes deep, brings you closer to prayer.

God is an invitation for the ultimate journey. Let God be a quest, not a belief. Let it be a question mark on your heart, at the deepest core of your being. Let the question trouble you; let the question become a turmoil. Let the question create chaos in you, because only through chaos stars are born. And only when the quest has destroyed all your belief systems and you are freed of all conclusions given by others, will you be able to open your eyes to the naked truth.

Don't waste your time. I am not here to make you more argumentative. I am not here to make you more logical. I am not here to make you more capable of discussing, analyzing, interpreting things. I am here to help you see. And seeing comes when you are without the mind.

When you are related with somebody, relationship brings many complexities. There is a constant struggle to dominate. It is not really argument that you are interested in or your wife is interested in; it is really a question of who dominates whom. Each point becomes a power struggle. See it, and don't waste your time. (…) Standpoints are bound to be there up to the third mind, the individual mind. With the fourth mind, there is no argument; compassion arises. Only with the fourth – understanding, compassion. And with the fifth, one forgets about others or about oneself; then there is no division.

Man is not a meaning, but an opportunity. The meaning is possible, but it is not given. The meaning can be created, but it is not already there. It is a task, not a gift. Meaning is a search; the meaning, the logos, has to be created by man. Man has to transform himself into that meaning. It cannot be something exterior to man; it can only be something interior. Man's inner being has to become illumined.

In deep sleep, you are inside. In wakefulness, you are outside. In dream, you are just in the middle, hanging, not settled yet where to go, still indecisive, in doubt, uncertain. With the waking state, the ego enters in. In the dream state, there are just rudimentary fragments of the ego arising, but they settle in the third: the ego becomes the most concrete, most solid, most decisive phenomenon. Then whatsoever you do, you do because of the ego. The third state brings a little consciousness – just one percent, not much of it, just a flickering consciousness, momentary consciousness. The first was absolute unconsciousness; the second was unconsciousness disturbed; the third is the first glimpse of consciousness. And because of that – the momentary glimpse of consciousness – that one percent of consciousness coming in creates the ego. Now the future also enters in. First, there is only the present unconscious; then, there is the past unconscious; now, there is the future unconscious. Past, present, future, and the whole complexity of time revolves around you.

The third state is the state where people are stuck, where you are stuck, where everybody is stuck. And if you go on building your house with these three dimensions, you will be building it on sand, because your whole effort will be unconscious. (…) people are making sand castles – with money, with power, with prestige. Unconscious, asleep, snoring, they go on making their house, not knowing what they are doing. They will be crushed under it. (…) You will live a meaningless life if you live only with these three. You will live a meaningless life, because you will not be able to create yourself. How can you create in such unawareness? (…) People live only in the first three dimensions of human consciousness. The fourth dimension carries the meaning; hence the people who live only in the three live a meaningless life. They know it. You know it! If you look into your life, you will not find any meaning there, just a haphazard, accidental progression of things. One thing is followed by another, but with no particular consistency, with no particular relevance. One thing is followed by another, just accidentally. That's what Jean-Paul Sartre means when he says, "man is a useless passion"; man is accidental. Yes, he is true if he is talking about the first three dimensions – but he is not true about the fourth. And he cannot say anything about the fourth because he has not experienced anything of it. Only a Christ or a Buddha can say something about the fourth. (…) The fourth dimension is of awareness, witnessing – what Patanjali calls turiya. (…) To remain confined in the first three dimensions is to be in the world. To enter into the fourth is to enter into nirvana, to enter into the kingdom of God. (…) Only with the fourth do you come home. Only with the fourth are you grounded in existence.

Once you have come to the fourth dimension, you can be asleep and remain alert. (…) And just the reverse is the situation with you: you are asleep while awake. (…) Ninety-nine percent consists of sleep – only one percent of wakefulness. And that one percent also goes on changing. Sometimes it is there, and sometimes it is not there at all. (…) you are awake only in rare moments. (…) It is very delicate. Anybody and everything can take it and destroy it, and very easily. You were very okay, a little thing happens, somebody says something, and suddenly you are no more okay. All is disturbed. (…) you have lost even that small awareness. (…) Your awareness is not very much. (…) And that is the situation of the ordinary human consciousness. You go on moving in the same unconscious way, in the same unconscious direction. (…) Life is absolutely free. But to see that freedom, first you will have to free your unconsciousness.

If you are unconscious and you go on reading the Bible and the Koran and the Vedas and the Gita, it is not going to help, because your unconsciousness cannot be changed by your studies. In fact, the scripture cannot change your consciousness, but your unconsciousness will change the scripture – the meaning of the scriptures. You will find your own meanings there. You will interpret in such a way that the Bible, the Veda, the Koran, will start functioning as imprisonments. That's how Christians and Hindus and Mohammedans are – all imprisoned. (…) You cannot help the blind man to know what is white, or what is colour, or what is light. All your help is going to give him something wrong. There is no way to help the blind man by definitions, by explanations, by theories, by dogmas, by scriptures. The only way to help him is to heal his eyes. (…) So I insist again and again that the stories reported by the Bible are not miracles, but parables. (…) Jesus was not simply curing physical eyes. There is no need – this can be done by science. Religion has far higher things to do. (…) People are blind, and the Jesus-touch is a magic touch. He helps them to see; he helps them to become aware; he helps them to become more conscious. He brings the fourth dimension.

Jesus was not very fortunate, because the disciples that he found turned out to be very ordinary, and the religion became almost a political organization. The church became not a follower of Jesus, but deep down really antagonistic to Jesus. The church has been going against Jesus in the name of Jesus. Buddha was more fortunate. The followers never became a church; they never became so organized politically; and they never became so worldly. They carried little bits of Buddha's message down the ages.

The fourth dimension has to be understood as deeply as possible. (…) It is pure consciousness, simplicity again. The first was simple but unconscious; the fourth is simple but conscious. Unity again, bliss again – with only one difference: now everything is conscious; the inner light is burning bright. You are fully alert. (…) And when one is totally alert, ego cannot exist. Ego is a shadow cast in unawareness. When all is light, the ego cannot exist. You will be able to see the falsity of it, the pseudoness of it. And in that very seeing is its disappearance. (…) That is the meaning of enlightenment: the inner illumination. Again there is only one time left – present, but now it is conscious present. (…) A man who is aware lives in the present, here-now. Here is his only space, and now is his only time. And because he is only here-now, time as such disappears. Eternity is born; timelessness is born.

To go into the fourth, work is needed – work in the sense that Gurdjieff used to use that word. Work means a great effort to transform your being, a great effort to center your being, a great effort to drop all that which creates darkness, and to bring all that which can help a little light to come in. If a door has to be opened, then open the door and let the light come in. If a wall has to be broken, then break the wall and let the light come in. Work means conscious effort to search, to enquire, to explore into the fourth dimension – into light, into awareness – and a conscious effort to drop all that which helps you remain unconscious, to drop all that keeps you mechanical. (…) The mechanical mind, the instinctive mind, the repetitive mind – that has to be broken and dropped. Work means an alchemical change. Great effort is needed. Hard and arduous is the path. It is an uphill task.

You have to surrender your will, and you have to follow God's will. (…) Only very, very willed people, who have a strong willpower, can surrender, because surrender is the ultimate in willpower. It is the last; there is nothing higher than that. To surrender, you will need great will; you will have to put all your willpower into it. (…) when surrender happens, the will disappears and not even a trace is left. Surrender is the will committing suicide. And only when your will has committed suicide can God's will flow into you. (…) First surrender, and then you come to know. (…) In your disappearance, God appears. Your absence becomes His presence. When you are empty as far as your self is concerned, you become full with His presence. He comes only when you are not. And then the great transformation happens. (…) Jesus says again and again to his disciples, "Rejoice! Celebrate! Be glad!" (…) You can be fulfilled only when God has become a resident in you; otherwise you are empty, hollow.

And the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell not: for it was founded upon a rock. This has to be understood. (…) If you don't love, there will be no challenge in your life; if you love, there will be great challenge in your life. If you don't meditate, there will be no challenge; if you meditate, the whole mind will strike against you, will become antagonistic, will try to destroy your meditation. This is some basic law in life: that if you try to attain something higher, it has to be tested; it has to pass through many tests and many criterions. And those tests look like winds and they will strike hard on you. But they are good, because only they will make you strong and crystallized. And only they will show whether you have built on rock or on the sands. (…) Be a wise man; don't be a fool. (…) Make something out of your consciousness, so death cannot destroy it. There is something which is deathless, and unless you attain it, you will live in agony, suffering and fear. Once it is attained, all agony, all misery, all hell disappears. And then there is beauty, and then there is benediction.

If you can love one enlightened person, sooner or later you will understand all the enlightened persons in the world.

Jesus' words are so potent, so full of love, so full of poetry, that no comparison exists. I have not come across such potent words.

The Master is sharing – not out of responsibility, but out of compassion. He is sharing because he has so much that he has to share. (…) it is not some kind of duty that he is fulfilling; it is his joy to share.

The unconscious is always against the conscious; they move like polar opposites. (…) They exist together. (…) If you love a man through the conscious, you hate the man through the unconscious. Love never exists alone, and hate does never exist alone; they always exist together. If you ask psychoanalysts, they say, "Love-hate is one relationship". (…) From one side it is love; from the other side it is hate.

The only thing is how to live in this moment. Only forms change; we are not going anywhere. (…) So live totally in the now, and live relaxedly.

Just like a shadow, morality follows a religious person naturally. He never considers it; he never deliberately thinks about it; it is his natural flavor. But when religion is dead, when life has disappeared, then one starts thinking about morality continuously. Consciousness has disappeared, and conscience becomes the only shelter. (…) Conscience is a pseudo-phenomenon. Consciousness is yours; conscience is borrowed. Conscience is of the society, of the collective mind; it does not arise in your being. (…) A religious person is one who has eyes to see, who has awareness. In that awareness, actions are naturally good. (…) But when religion has disappeared, then you have to manage it. Then you have to constantly think about what is right and what is wrong. (…) You will learn morality from others, and you have to learn from others, because you don't have your own insight. So morality is borrowed – it is social; it is mob; it comes from the masses, (…) from tradition. They have heard what is right and what is wrong, and they have carried it down the ages.

There are a thousand and one moralities. If you go on deciding, you will be in difficulty; it will be impossible for you. You will go mad, (…) you will not be able to do anything.

The Master functions as a catalytic agent, not as a cause.

Silence is possible only when you are one, when there is nobody else within you, when you are one piece – not fragmented.

Morality creates schizophrenia, split personalities, divisions. A moral person is not an individual because he is divided. Only a religious person is an individual. The moral person has a personality, but no individuality. Personality means persona, mask. And he has many personalities, not just one, because he has to have many personalities around him. In different situations, different personalities are needed. With different people, different personalities are needed. To one, he shows one face; to another he shows another face. One goes on changing faces. (…) Your smiles are not true; your tears are also not true – your whole personality is synthetic, plastic. (…) Morality creates conflict in you, because it creates many faces. And the problem is that when you have so many faces, you tend to forget which is your original one.

The Zen Masters say that the first thing for a seeker to know is his original face, because only then can something start. Only the original face can grow; a mask cannot grow; a false face can have no growth. Growth is possible only for the original face, because only the original has life. So the first thing is to know "What is my original face?", and it is arduous, because there is a long queue of false faces, and you are lost in your false faces.

The moralist is always making efforts to impose his morality on others. (…) First, he uses morality to manipulate himself. Then, he does the same to others; he starts using morality to manipulate others. (…) Naturally, he learns a trick: that if he can enforce his morality on others, then things will be easier. (…) He is very much afraid. He knows that just as he is deceiving others, so others may be deceiving him. Bertrand Russell has said that thieves are always against stealing. (…) Just think: a society where it is an accepted phenomenon that everybody tells lies – then you will be at a loss; you will not be able to cheat people; you will not be able to exploit people. So, in his own interest, the liar has to go on preaching morality. This has to be understood.

A religious man is a totally different person. He will be able to forgive; he will be able to understand. He will be able to see the limitations of man and the problems of man. He will not be so hard and cruel – he cannot be. His compassion will be infinite.

The world is a kind of big hospital, because everybody is ill here and everybody is on the deathbed; and everybody is full of anger and violence and aggression and jealousy and possessiveness; and everybody is false, pseudo, and everybody is a hypocrite – this is the world. You don't feel it, but when a Jesus moves amidst you, he feels it, because he comes from the heights. (…) So Jesus would go to the mountains in aloneness to cleanse his being, to cleanse his consciousness. (…) Meditation is like an inner bath. To be alone for a few moments every day is a must; otherwise you will gather too much dust, and because of that dust, your mirror will not reflect anymore, or will not reflect rightly.

You cannot trap a Jesus or a Buddha; it is impossible – you will be trapped. You exist at a lower state of mind. How can you trap a higher state of mind? That is just foolish. The higher state of mind can trap you immediately, because from the higher state, your whole being is available.

The very being of Jesus is that of a stranger, because he is an outsider. He lives on a different plane; he lives in a different dimension. He lives in God; you live in the world. (…) You cannot understand him; he is incomprehensible. (…) You can be introduced to Jesus only through meditation – not through any kind of teaching, not through the Catholic catechism. It is all rubbish. In fact, rather than helping you to become acquainted with Jesus, it becomes a barrier. (…) No theory can make Jesus comprehensible. All theology is false. (…) So it sometimes happens that one who has not been brought up as a Christian may have fresher eyes to see Jesus, because his mind will be uncluttered. He will not know anything; he will look through innocence. He will not have any conditionings; he will look empty.

Jesus and Mohammed and Buddha and Krishna remain strangers. They do not belong to this world, that's why Hindus call them avatars. Avatar means one who has come from beyond, descended from the beyond, like a ray of light descends into darkness. It comes from the transcendental world, from the world of turiya – the fourth dimension. (…) Only if you are a nobody can you meet with Christ or Buddha or Krishna. And these are different names for the same state of consciousness.

All the so-called siddhis and miraculous powers just enhance your ego and are against spiritual growth. Be aware of them. (…) Let it be understood deeply. All is possible if the will is dissolved into God's will. All is possible – with no conditions. But if you want to do it at will, then you will become more and more egoistic. And that's what happens. (…) Mind has great powers, but to use the powers of the mind is to prevent yourself from going higher than the mind. You will get stuck there. (…) A few people are lost in worldly powers; a few people are lost in mental powers. Then you can have clairaudience, telepathy – things like that – mind reading. But you will be lost; you will never move beyond that. Get out of the world, and get out of the mind too!

Through friction, ego is created. You start fighting with something.

The ego is subtle; its working is very complex. It is a puzzle, and a puzzle that cannot be solved – that can only be seen through and through, but cannot be solved. (…) All efforts that are made to solve it make it more complex, make it more difficult. If you fight with it, you are fighting with yourself. There can never be victory; you cannot defeat it by fighting. Because by fighting, you will be dividing yourself into two – the fighter and the fought. (…) It will be just ego dividing into two parts, playing the game of fight. Sometimes one part can pretend to win; sometimes the other part can pretend to win – but nobody ever wins. The struggle becomes infinite, and meanwhile energy is dissipated; meanwhile life is wasted. Remember, you cannot fight the ego.

The ego is subtle; its ways are subtle; its working is very complex. (…) all the efforts that are made to solve it, make it more complex, make it more difficult. (…) Fighting the ego, repressing the ego, sublimating the ego (identifying the ego with higher goals) – these are the three available ways, and nothing helps. (…) No way will ever bring you out of it. (…) To see it is to be on the right path. (…) Otherwise it will come, and it will come in more subtle forms, and you will be deceived far more. (…) Each remedy brings three egos into your being instead of one. How does it happen? In accepting a remedy, you become the one who you are, plus the one who is helping you become other than you are, plus the one who you hope to become. (…) You are divided in three, and this division is not going to help; it will confuse you; it will make you insane, neurotic, schizophrenic. The remedy proves far more dangerous than the disease itself. (…) So the first thing to be understood: the ego is the basic problem that anybody who is searching for his real self has to face. Now it cannot be countered by anything outside. No remedy is going to help; no method is going to help; no remedy can be imposed from the outside. (…) The way to get out of the ego is clarity, transparency, to look through and through, to watch how the ego functions, to see its subtle games. You throw it out from the front door and it has come back from the back door. You throw it from one side; it starts imposing itself from another side. You think you have got rid of it; suddenly you find it is there sitting inside. So without any condemnation, without any conclusion, the ego has to be looked into through and through. Go innocently into it.

The first thing you will come across is the ego's mechanicalness. (…) The ego consists of your dead past. And if sometimes the ego thinks of the future, that too is nothing but a projection of the past and from the past – maybe a little modified, sophisticated, decorated, but it is the same thing. (…) Right at this moment, if you go into yourself, you will not find any ego. There will just be fragments from the past floating in the present consciousness. The present consciousness is always egoless, and that is your reality. (…) Unless you are like a child, you will not enter into the kingdom of God. (…) A child means one which has no past.

The man who is free, who has become free, avoids nothing. He has no antagonism towards life. (…) People who repress become angry; (…) they become irritated by small things. (…) Deny anything, and it becomes overpowering. (…) Freedom from sex is not repression of sex; it is the understanding of sex. And through understanding, one goes beyond it. (…) The man who has gone beyond sex is free from sex. To say that he has no interest in sex is also wrong. His interest is not personal anymore. (…) The man who is free of sex has no personal involvement in it; he has no desire for it. Not that he is against it; just his desires have moved higher. (…) Your sex energy is the nourishment for your samadhi. Never repress it! (…) God has chosen sex as the vehicle for life. Life comes through sex, in sex, out of sex. It is life-giving energy. (…) Sex is life; sex is potential spirituality. (…) It is out of the mud of sex that the lotus of samadhi is going to bloom. (…) Knowing your sexuality, one day you will stumble upon your spirituality. Then you become free; your energy has risen. Now sex is just like a toy.

Maturity is mature enough only when it can accept the immature, bless the immature.

Ego is a constriction, a limitation of the mind. When the ego disappears, mind becomes Mind. (…) When you have dropped the ego-mind, then the cosmic Mind arises in you. Then you start functioning not from your own; you start functioning from the original source. Then God functions through you.

Meaning arises only when you start rising upwards. The higher you go, the more meaning, the more significance. (…) Life starts becoming a song.

God comes to you only in that proportion in which you go into Him.

Cathartic therapies help. They will not produce insight; they will only clear the way.

Adam dies to God, and is born to the world. Christ dies to the world, and is born into God. And Jesus remains in the limbo – half-half, divided, split.

Ego is an effort to create a kind of unity inside yourself. The natural unity is lost. Now you have to create an unnatural, synthetic unity. The ego is a synthetic self, a created self, a managed self. One part of your being becomes the master and forces other parts to be the slaves. A kind of government arises in you.

Jesus touched the feet of his disciples. That is a rare phenomenon, a great message – that there is no higher, no lower; that all hierarchies are of the mind, are political; that in spirituality, there is no hierarchy. It is all one; it is all the same. It is one being all over the place. It is one heart beating in millions of hearts. It is one consciousness in every consciousness. It is one moon reflected in millions of pools.

Always fall back to the witness; go deeper and deeper into witnessing. Never allow any other identification to settle. (…) All identifications are bondages. Total freedom is not in identification; total freedom is in non-identification with each and every thing. Someday, when all identifications are broken and they fall down, then you will know who you are. (…) You are gods in exile. Only by witnessing will you remember who you are. Then all misery disappears; all poverty disappears. You are the very kingdom of God.

Unless one understands maya, one goes on doing things which are eventually found to be meaningless. (…) Once you understand it, you need initiation, initiation into the other world, the dimension of religion. (…) Once this world is understood to be just a dream, the other becomes available.

Through your hope, you go on. Through your hope, the unhappiness remains. My whole effort is to kill the hope, to leave you in such total darkness that you cannot allow any dream any longer. Once this intensity reaches to the hundredth degree, you evaporate.

Religion is nothing but the search for a home.

All attachments are absurd. Except for your innermost consciousness, everything can be renounced. Deep down, one should live in renouncement; one should be in the world, but one should remain in renouncement.

Healing is a function of love.

Everyone is defeated in this world. Even those who appear to be victorious are also defeated. They only appear victorious to others; in themselves they are utterly defeated. (…) if we look within man, everyone is defeated. This world is a long story of defeats. Here victory does not happen, cannot happen; (…) defeat is the destiny here, the destiny of being in the world. (…) Nobody ever wins here. (…) Prayer means the realization of a person who has been defeated in the world.

Understanding the pattern and the behavior of one desire, one comes to know the whole nature of all desires, and one becomes a Buddha. (…) The race after desires is due to the fact that some dream always appears to be coming to its fulfillment somewhere in the far distance. (…) Tis is called adhyas, or projection, illusion.

Do you have a single thought which may be yours, which you can say is yours? There are none. (…) they are all borrowed; they have come to you from somewhere.

Whatsoever becomes your experience, you are beyond it.

Life is merely a neutral opportunity; you may use it the way you like.

One who is conscious while awake slowly learns how to sleep consciously. One who lives consciously one day dies consciously. (…) Death feels like a friend to him.

Never betray your innermost experience. If you betray it, you are committing suicide; (…) you are destroying your very soul.

Truth cannot be accepted, because people are living comfortable lives.

When a Buddha is fasting, it is not to destroy the body. It is to destroy the demands. (…) The Buddha is changing the seat of power, who the master is. (…) The deeper the master, the more is your freedom.

We live in a deep illusion – the illusion of hope, of future, of tomorrow. As man is, man cannot exist without self-deception; (…) man needs lies to exist. (…) As man is, he cannot exist with the truth.

Yoga is a method to come to a non-dreaming mind. Yoga is the science to be in the here and now. (…) Yoga means to encounter the reality as it is. (…) Only reality can become liberation. (…) Yoga means that now there is no hope; now there is no future; now there are no desires. One is ready to know what is. (…) Yoga is an inward turning; (…) you start moving within yourself. (…) Yoga is concerned with your total being, with your roots.

Total despair is needed. That despair is called dukkha by Buddha.

Discipline means creating an order within you. As you are, you are a crowd.

The non-moving yoga posture is not a physiological training – it is to create a situation in which centering can happen, in which you can become disciplined.

Yoga is the cessation of mind. Yoga is the state of no-mind. (…) When the mind ceases, the witness is established in itself. (…) Except witnessing, in all states, you are identified with the mind. You become one with the flow of thoughts; you become one with the clouds.

Yoga says there is no possibility to expect anything; there is no possibility of any fulfillment in the future. (…) Yoga expects you to be mature, to understand that toys will not help. (…) When you have come to a point where suicide has become a meaningful thing, where life has lost all its meaning, where you can kill yourself, in that moment yoga becomes possible, because you will not be ready to transform yourself unless this intense futility of life has happened to you. You will be ready to transform yourself when you feel that there is no other way – either suicide or sadhana; either commit suicide or transform your being. When only these two alternatives are left, only then yoga is chosen, never before. (…) It depends on your intensity. If your realization is so deep that it is total, that desire is misery, you will not only have entered yoga, you have become a siddha. You have reached the goal.

Unless this life becomes absolutely meaningless, you cannot transcend it; you will cling to it. And unless you transcend this life, this mode of existence, you will not know what bliss is. (…) Desiring must cease; (…) only then the door opens, and you can enter into the unknown.

Through understanding, the mind drops.

Mind can be either the source of bondage or the source of freedom. Mind becomes the gate for this world; it can also become the exit. (…) Right use of mind becomes meditation; wrong use of mind becomes madness.

Sanity is this: you will become aware that you are not centered.

Mind has two centers: one of right knowledge; it starts functioning through concentration, meditation, contemplation, prayer – then, whatsoever you know is true. There is a wrong center; it functions if you are sleepy, live in a hypnotic-like state, intoxicated with something – then, whatsoever you know is false.

Samadhi means perfect meditation, where even meditation has become unnecessary, meaningless. You cannot do it; you have become it. (…) When mind is transcended, when no-mind is achieved, you are a pure being, satchitananda. There is no happening in you; neither action is there, nor knowing is there – (…) all duality is transcended.

Just by witnessing, identification is broken.

When we say, the mind ceases, we mean your identification is broken. The mind has not really ceased; it has not really ceased to be – otherwise cognition is impossible.

Imagination has to be understood. (…) We go on projecting. Our mind is just completely filled and fixed from the very childhood. (…) Put aside your knowledge, your conceptions, your preformulated information, and look afresh. (…) When all imagination falls, only then truth appears. Otherwise, imagination goes on making conditions, and truth cannot appear. Only in a naked mind, in an empty mind, truth appears, because you don't distort it.

Abhyasa means constant inner practice, constant repetition; and vairagya means non-attachment, desirelessness.

Yoga does not believe in intellectual understanding; it believes in total understanding, in which your wholeness is involved. Not only you change in your head, but the deep sources of your being also change.

Anything can become unconscious if you go on repeating it continuously. (…) Constant repetition in the child goes deeper, because the child has no conscious, really. He has more of unconscious just near the surface; everything enters into the unconscious. As he will learn, as he will get educated, the conscious will become a thick layer – then less and less penetrates towards the unconscious. Psychologists say that almost fifty percent of your learning is finished by the seventh year of your age.

Just to change the inner mechanism, repetitive practice will be needed – a reconditioning of the whole body-mind pattern. But this is possible only if you have dropped desiring. (…) The deepest pattern of the mind is desire.

Non-attachment means not to depend on anything. (…) Preference is good; attachment is a disease.

Society conditions you to make a slave out of yourself.

Psychologists say that hate or anger are not natural; hate and anger are just created.

The present moment is not part of time at all. (…) The present is existential.

The ordinary religious man leaves the world; the really religious man leaves ambition, hoping, imagination – he renounces all expectations.

Ordinary humanity can be divided into two basic types: one is the sadist, and the other is the masochist. The sadist enjoys torturing others; and the masochist enjoys torturing himself. (…) Both sadist and masochist always move, knowingly or unknowingly, towards situations where they can torture others or themselves; they are always in search of opportunity.

Man lives in a deep hypnosis; (…) all awakening is a sort of dehypnotization.

Lack of awareness is taking the painful as pleasurable.

Postponing life is the only sin that I can call sin. Don't postpone. If you want to live, live here and now. This is the only existential moment.

Prati-prasav, going backwards, means going consciously to things which you have done in unconsciousness. Go back – just the light of consciousness heals. It is a healing force; whatsoever you can make conscious will be healed. A man who goes backward releases the past. (…) Unless you are finished with the past, you are living a ghost life. Your life is not true; it is not existential. (…) Don't condemn; don't appreciate; simply be a witness. (…) Through prati-prasav, one becomes free of karmas. (…) Prati-prasav is a complementary technique to meditation. If blocks come up, if your past is very loaded, you will need prati-prasav; simply meditation will not do.

Life has to be attained; one has to work for it. It is like a seed in you; it needs much effort, right soil, care, love, awareness. Only then does the seed sprout.

In a fast, you will feel that in the night you cannot fall asleep. You turn again and again; something is missing. The body energy is completely free; there is no need to digest anything. The free energy moves all over the body. It is no longer concentrated in the stomach. In fact, it is available, so your mind goes on functioning. You remain alert; sleep is difficult. Fasting is a way to create awareness. If you fast for a long time, you will attain to a certain awareness which is difficult to attain while you go on eating. It can be attained, but it will take a longer time. Fasting is a shortcut to achieve it.

Ordinarily, mind is constant traffic. (…) When consciousness is fixed on one point, thoughts cease, because thoughts are only possible when your consciousness goes on wavering, from here to there, from there to somewhere else. This is concentration, dharana. (…) In dhyan, meditation, you drop that point also. The temple should be absolutely empty. (…) The object has fallen, but the subject is still there. You still feel you are. This is asmita, 'amness'. (…) When asmita also disappears, when you no longer know that you are, then happens samadhi. Samadhi is a point of no return; one never comes back. A man in samadhi is no longer of this world. He may be in this world, but he is no longer of this world. He lives in the world, but the world does not live in him.

If you become established in truth, suddenly you find sex has lost the lust. It is no longer a mad passion. You can enjoy it if you like, but the passion is no longer mad. It has become softer, and finally it disappears. And when it disappears, the energy that was encaged in sex is released. That energy becomes your reservoir; it becomes an inner pool.

In relaxation, Jesus became Christ.

A religious man lives a life of invisible revolution.

The whole process of yoga is a pilgrimage, an inward journey. Step by step, in eight steps, Patanjali is bringing you home, from the periphery to the center.

Consciousness is all, because whatsoever is known, is known through consciousness. Whatsoever is known is nothing but a reflection in consciousness; whatsoever is known is nothing but a formation in consciousness. All forms arise in the ocean of consciousness and disappear. But consciousness remains; consciousness abides – consciousness is eternal.

The sun is intellect; the moon is intuition.

Patanjali divides human personality into five seeds, five bodies, five layers. (…) The first body he calls annamaya kosha, the food body. (…) When the first body is loaded, it is difficult to create great awareness. Hence fasting became so important in all the religions. (…) Fasting is important; it should be done carefully. The right amount of food and the right quality of food has to be practiced. (…) The second body Patanjali calls pranamaya kosha, the energy body, the electric body. (…) That's what acupuncture is all about; (…) that's why yoga insists very much on the purity of breathing. (…) Then there is the third body, manumaya kosha, the mental body. (…) if you don't grow it, you will remain almost just a possibility of man, but not a real man. (…) When you start living on your own, when you start answering your life problems on your own, when you become responsible, you start growing a manumaya kosha. (…) The fourth, higher than manumaya kosha, is vigyanamaya kosha, the intuitive body. (…) it goes beyond reason; it takes you to very far out horizons. (…) The fifth body, anandamaya kosha, is the bliss body.

A problem is an opportunity to face yourself, to go on a pilgrimage inside your being. A problem is a door. Use it to enter into your being.

Mind's nature is to move from one extreme to another. It is just like the pendulum of a clock – the more it moves to the right, the more energy it gathers to move to the opposite, to the left. (…) The mind always has the opposite within it, and that opposite goes into the unconscious and waits for its moment to come up. (…) The mind depends on imbalance. If you are balanced, mind disappears.

The religious man is basically non-ambitious. If there is any sort of ambition, then to be religious is impossible, because only a superior man can become religious. Ambition implies inferiority.

When society demands slavery and goes on destroying your freedom and crippling you from every side and paralizing your soul and deadening your heart… one comes to feel it is better to die than to compromise. (…) Sannyas and suicide are alternatives. This is my experience: you can become a sannyasin only when you have come to a point where, if not sannyas, then suicide. (…) Intelligence means seeing deeply into things. Has your life a point? (…) Your life, as it is, is leading you towards suicide.

To be intelligent is difficult, and it costs much. You have to put at stake whatsoever you have. It is a cross. (…) People remain unintelligent because if you start understanding, it will be almost impossible to endure the life that you are living. You are living in hell.

A constant remembrance is what Buddha used to call mindfulness. Only mindfulness will protect; otherwise the mind tends to repeat the past again.

Religion is not object-oriented; it has no object, it knows nothing. Knowing knows itself, as if the mirror is reflecting itself. It is utterly pure of all content. Hence religion is not knowledge, but knowing. Science is a lower kind of knowing; religion is a higher kind. Religion is philosophia ultima: the ultimate knowing.

Unless a freedom is both – freedom from and freedom for – something is missing, something is lacking; your freedom will be poor. Just to be free from is a poor freedom. The real freedom starts only when you are free for. You can sing a song, and you can dance a dance, and you can start overflowing. That's what compassion is. Man lives in passion. When the mind disappears, passion is transformed into compassion. (…) Once you have seen who you are, the beggar disappears. In fact, it had never existed; it was just a dream, an idea.

Passion means you are a beggar with a begging-bowl; you are asking for more and more from everybody; you are exploiting others. Your relationships are nothing but exploitations – cunning devices to possess the other, very clever strategies to dominate. When you are living in the mind, in passion, your whole life is power politics. Even your love, even your social service, even your humanitarian works, are nothing but power politics. Deep down, there is a desire to be powerful over others.

The mind is creating all your misery. With the mind gone, misery is gone, and suddenly you are full of energy. And the energy needs expression, sharing; it wants to become a song, a dance, a celebration. That is compassion: you start sharing.

Mind is the barrier. Nothing else is hindering you from truth, just your own mind. Mind surrounds you like a film, like a movie that goes on and on, and you remain engrossed in it, fascinated by it. It is a fantasy that surrounds you, a continuous story that goes on and on. And because you are so fascinated by it, you go on missing that which is. And mind is not – it is only a fantasy; it is only a faculty for dreaming.

The mind clings; it never allows you to settle in your being. It keeps you interested in something that you are not. When you don't cling to anything, there is nowhere to go. (…) And when you settle, there is pure awareness. (…) Only this moment exists; (…) all is silence. To know this serenity is to know who you are, what this existence is all about.

Only glimpses will happen in the beginning. Slowly, slowly, they become more and more solid; they abide more and more. Very slowly, they settle forever.

All are dreams; every phenomenon is a phantom.

There are three objects which can either function as three poisons, or can become three bases of infinite virtue. Atisha is talking about inner alchemy. The poison can become the nectar; the base metal can be transformed into gold. What are these three objects? The first is aversion; the second is attachment; and the third is indifference. (…) Between these three objects, the mind exists. (…) This is the rut, the routine. (…) And if you live in these three as they are, you are living in poison. (…) These are the three poisons, but they can become the three bases of virtue if you bring in the quality of compassion.

Atisha is not an escapist. He does not teach escapism; he does not tell you to move from situations which are not to your liking. He says: You have to learn to function in bodhichitta, in Buddha-consciousness, in all kinds of situations – in the marketplace, in the monastery, with people in the crowd or alone in a cave, with friends and with enemies, with family, familiar people, and with strangers, with men and with animals. In all kinds of situations, in all kinds of challenges, you have to learn to function in compassion, in meditation – because all these experiences of different situations will make your bodhichitta more and more ripe. Don't escape from any situation – if you escape, then something will remain missing in you. Then your bodhichitta will not be that ripe, will not be that rich. Live life in its multidimensionality. (…) Live life in its totality. And living in the world, don't be of it. Live in the world like a lotus flower in water: it lives in water, but the water touches it not. Only then will bodhichitta flower in you, bloom in you. (…) Not to know it is to miss the whole point of life; to know it is the only goal.

Religion is not for cowards; it is for people who want to live dangerously. (…) It is a call and a challenge to all those who have any courage, any guts, any intelligence.

The more knowledgeable the mind is, the more difficult it is to drop it.

I am deliberately inconsistent, contradictory, so that you cannot make any body of knowledge out of me.

The mind is always unsure; it lives in unsureness. Mind lives in confusion; it can never have any clarity. Clarity is not part of the mind at all; clarity is the absence of the mind. Confusion is the presence of the mind. Confusion and mind are synonymous. You can't have a clear mind. The mind is always divided against itself; it lives in conflict. Divisibility is its nature. Hence those who live in the mind never become individuals, indivisibles. They remain divided: one part wants this, another part wants that. Mind is a crowd of many desires. Mind is multi-psychic, and all the fragments are falling apart in different directions. It is a hard struggle to keep oneself together. Somehow we manage, but that togetherness remains only on the surface. Deep down, there is turmoil.

You fall in love with a woman; are you sure that you are in love? Really sure? I have never come across a lover who is really sure. You may even get married, but were you sure? You may have children, but were you sure that you really wanted to have children? That is how you are living: nothing is sure. But one has to do something or other to keep oneself occupied, so you go on keeping yourself occupied.

All decisions come from the heart. The mind is never decisive; it cannot be. If you want to decide through the mind, you never can.

Enlightenment is the realization that we have only the present moment to live. (…) Don't make a goal out of it; it is not a goal – it is the most ordinary state of consciousness.

Before you can come out of your contradictory life, your life of conflict, you have to close the doors of that life.

To be close to a Master, to be related to a Master, to be intimate with a Master, is nothing but an approach towards your own understanding, your own enlightenment. (…) To move into the unknown, you will need a guide – a guide who has moved into the unknown, who lives in the unknown, who lives in innocence. Just to imbibe the spirit you need the guide – not for any guidance, but just to imbibe the spirit of the unknown, the joy of the unknown, the celebration of the unknown. (…) Sannyas makes it possible. It is an energy field, it is a Buddhafield. It is communion: nonverbal, heart-to-heart, and, one day, being-to-being.

If somebody else puts fire into your life, he becomes powerful over you. I am not here to put any fire into you; I am just here to help you to see your own fire.

If you don't trust yourself, then no other trust is ever possible. And the society destroys trust at the very roots. It does not allow you to trust yourself. It teaches all kinds of trust – trust in the parents, trust in the church, trust in the state, trust in God, ad infinitum. But the basic trust is completely destroyed. And then all other trusts are phony, are bound to be phony. Then all other trusts are just plastic flowers. You don't have real roots for real flowers to grow.

The society does it deliberately, on purpose, because a man who trusts in himself is dangerous for society – a society that depends on slavery. (…) this society depends on beliefs. Its whole structure is that of autohypnosis. Its whole structure is based in creating robots and machines, not men. It needs dependent people – so much so that they are constantly in need of being tyrannized, so much so that they are searching and seeking their own tyrants. (…) We have turned this earth into a great prison. A few power-lusty people have reduced the whole of humanity into a mob. Man is allowed to exist only if he compromises with all kinds of nonsense. (…) Parents are very much afraid, the society is very much afraid: if children are allowed to remain free, who knows? (…) Who knows what is going to happen when they become intelligent on their own? They will not be within your control. And this society goes into deeper and deeper politics to control everybody, to possess everybody's soul. That's why the first thing they have to do is to destroy trust – the trust of the child in himself, the confidence of the child in himself. They have to make him shaky and afraid. Once he is trembling, he is controllable. If he is confident, he is uncontrollable; he will assert himself. (…) Destroy his trust, and you have castrated him. You have taken his power: now, he will always be powerless and always in need of somebody to dominate, direct and command him. Now, he will be a good soldier, a good citizen, a good nationalist, a good Christian, a good Mohammedan, a good Hindu. (…) He will not have any roots, he will be uprooted his whole life. He will live without roots – and to live without roots is to live in misery, is to live in hell. (…) A man needs roots in existence, or else he will live a very unintelligent life.

This society is a power-oriented society. This society is still utterly primitive, utterly barbarian. A few people are dominating millions. And this society is run in such a way that no child is allowed to have intelligence. It is a sheer accident that once in a while, a Buddha arrives on earth – a sheer accident.

It is only when you can trust the unknown that you can trust a Master, never before, because the Master represents nothing but the unknown, the uncharted, the Infinite, the unbounded. He represents the oceanic, he represents the wild, he represents God.

Millions of people are wasting their lives in belief and disbelief. The enquiry into truth begins only when you drop all believing.

All good, all bad, is just arbitrary, man-made. There is not much difference. Just scratch a little, and you will find sinners in the saints, and saints in the sinners. (…) Existence is simply there; there is nothing to choose from. And when there is nothing to choose in between, you will become undivided. When there is something to choose between, it divides you too. Division is a double-edged sword: it divides reality outside; it divides you inside. If you choose, you choose division; you choose to be split; you chose schizophrenia. If you don't choose, if you know there is nothing good, nothing bad, you choose sanity. (…) You are crystallized; you are centered.

Good and bad are socially manufactured things, and of course, they are utilitarian. I am not saying to go into the marketplace and behave as if there is nothing good and nothing wrong. I am not saying to walk in the middle of the road, saying what does it matter whether one walks on the right or the left. When you are with people, remember, for them good and bad still exist. Be respectful to them and their dreams. It is not for you to disturb anybody's dream. It is not for you to interfere. Be polite to the people and their stupidities; be polite to them and their games. But all the time remember, deep down, nothing is good, nothing is bad.

To come to know that nothing is good, nothing is bad, is a turning point; it is a conversion. You start looking in; the outside really loses meaning. The social reality is a fiction, a beautiful drama; you can participate in it, but then you don't take it seriously. It is just a role to be played; play it as beautifully, as efficiently, as possible. But don't take it seriously; it has nothing of the Ultimate in it. The Ultimate is the inner; the indivisible soul knows it. And to come to that soul, this is a turning-point.

Your innermost core has always been pure; purity is intrinsic to you; it cannot be taken away. Your virginity is eternal – you cannot lose it; there is no way to lose it. You can only forget about it or remember it. If you forget about it, you live in confusion; if you remember it, all is transparent. (…) Transparency is your birthright. (…) Sannyas is an effort to reclaim that which is yours and to drop that which is not yours. (…) Ecstasy is our very nature.

Be grateful to everyone, because everybody is creating a space for you to be transformed – even those who think they are obstructing you, even those whom you think are enemies. Your friends, your enemies, good people, bad people, favorable circumstances, unfavorable circumstances – all together they are creating the context in which you can be transformed and become a Buddha. Be grateful to all.

Personality is that which is given to you by the society. Personality is imposed on you from the outside; it is a mask. (…) And the more personality you have, the less is the possibility for individuality to grow. The personality starts occupying the whole space. (…) The personality has to be dropped, so that individuality can be. Individuality is a non-egoistic phenomenon; it is pure 'amness'; it has no 'I' in it.

Psychoanalysis simply helps you to unburden the unconscious. It makes things conscious which have remained unconscious for long. And just in that very process, things start changing. One or two years of psychoanalysis, and the person has changed enormously; he is totally a different person, more at ease, more at home. (…) the real psychoanalyst does not even comment, because commentary may become a disturbance. He simply listens, and nothing else. He is a passive listener, so you can unburden yourself totally, without any interference.

Once you take sannyas, it cannot be dropped. It is not something that can be dropped. It is a milieu, an experience that goes so deep into you that it becomes your very heart. It permeates you. (…) Once you have taken sannyas, it is impossible to drop – but the real crux is whether you have taken it. If you can drop it, that will simply show that you have never taken it in the first place.

If the mind wants to comprehend reality, it will have to come out of the past and the future. But coming out of the past and the future, it is no longer the mind at all. Hence the insistence of all the great Masters that the door to reality is no-mind. (…) The mind will reduce your experience to the measurable, the fathomable, the knowable – and the knowable is ordinary, mundane. The unknowable is sacred. And only with the unknowable does life become a benediction. (…) The mind is impotent, incapable of knowing the beginningless and the endless. The mind exists between birth and death; it knows nothing beyond birth and beyond death. (…) The mind is a beautiful instrument if you know how to be a no-mind too. (…) You were here before you were born, and you will be here after you are dead. The mind has a very limited existence, very momentary – one day it comes, another day it goes. You are forever. Have some experience of your foreverness. But that is possible only through no-mind. No-mind is another name for meditation.

The priests have behaved with men as if men are rats. Psychologists are not the first to dehumanize humanity; priests were the pioneers. First the priests behaved with men as if they were rats; now the psychologists are behaving with rats as if they are men. But the process is the same; the technique is exactly the same. (…) If life is lived in its totality, the priest is not needed at all. (…) I teach you a tremendous total yes to life. I teach you not renunciation, but rejoicing – because in your rejoicing, you will come closest to God. (…) When the dancer disappears in his dance, he is divine. (…) When it comes to such an optimum, there is a transformation, a revolution. (…) Say yes to life, say a total yes to life. That's what sannyas is all about.

Truth is an experiencing. You cannot claim it. If you want to grab it, it will disappear from your fist. You can have it only with an open hand, not with a fist.

If the ego does not arise, nobody can deceive you. It is always the ego that deceives and is deceived. If you don't have any ego, there is no possibility of you ever being deceived. (…) You will deceive yourself. The ego is the fundamental deception; don't help it to grow in you; don't nourish it. And the greatest thing that nourishes it is experiences, particularly spiritual experiences. (…) Whenever you have some experience, remember, you are not it. It is a content in consciousness – and all contents have to be dropped. Only then does the mind disappear. The mind is nothing but all the contents together; the accumulation of contents is the mind. (…) And we have to go beyond the mind. Don't trust in the content – watch it, and let it pass. And yes, sometimes the content is so tremendously enchanting, so hypnotizing, that one would like to cling to it. When spiritual, so-called spiritual experiences start happening, it is really very tempting. (…) This is just a new kind of darkness, because you are again being caught, trapped, by the content. (…) The consciousness is a pure mirror; it only reflects. The mirror remains unaffected; it simply goes on reflecting whatsoever is the case.

Always remember, always and always: "I am the witness." Don't get identified with any content, otherwise you will be falling into error. If you become identified with any content, howsoever beautiful and spiritual it appears, you have gone wrong, you have gone astray. And remember, whatsoever can happen outside can happen inside too.

All experiences are hindrances, obstacles. The real seeker, when he moves inwards, has to be more alert than he had ever been on the outside. He has to be really alert not to get caught by anything.

You need not go anywhere. Meditation is neither a journey in space nor a journey in time, but an instantaneous awakening. If you can be silent now, this is the other shore. If you can allow the mind to cease, not to function, this is the other shore. (…) Hence my insistence that no sannyasin has to leave the world, because leaving the world is part of a project, part of a dream of reaching to the other world. And because there is none, all your efforts will be vain. You are not to go to the monasteries or to the Himalayas; you are not to escape from here. You have to become awakened here.

Let me repeat it again: there is no other reality; there is only one reality. But the one reality can be seen in two ways: with sleepy eyes, dreamy eyes, eyes full of lust, and then what you see is distorted; and the same reality can be seen without sleep, without dreaming eyes, without dust. Then whatsoever you see is the truth – and truth liberates.

The higher can only be reached through the lower. You will have to pass over the lower rungs of the ladder, otherwise how are you going to reach the higher part? (…) I accept the totality of it. I accept the mud, I accept the lotus, and I accept all that is in between. (…) I accept this earth, and I accept this heaven. I accept both the body and the soul, the outer and the inner. My teaching is that of total acceptance.

If one really wants to live life in all its richness, one has to learn how to be inconsistent, how to be consistently inconsistent, how to be able to move from one extreme to another – sometimes rooted deep in the earth and sometimes flying high in heaven, sometimes making love and sometimes meditating. And then, slowly, slowly, your heaven and your earth will come closer and closer, and you will become the horizon where they meet.

The eyes of others are needed to reflect your personality. You are neither this nor that. You are, but you are in your reality; you are not created by others. (…) This is one of the reasons why many people thought it wise to escape from the society. It was not really to escape from society; it was not really against society – it was just an effort to renounce the personality. (…) Personality is a showpiece. It can deceive others, but it cannot deceive you, at least not for long. (…) the day you can enjoy your individuality, you are free – free from dependence on others. If you ask for their attention, you have to pay for it in return. It is a bondage. The more you ask people to be attentive towards you, the more you are becoming a thing, a commodity, which can be sold and purchased.

First, witness the objects of the mind. Patanjali calls it dhyana, meditation. Witness the objects, the contents, of the mind. Whatsoever passes before you, watch it, without evaluation, judging or condemning. Don't be for or against; just watch – and dhyana, meditation, is created. And the second is, witness the witness itself – and samadhi is created; satori is created; the ultimate ecstasy is created. The first leads to the second. (…) Just watch the watcher; witness the witnessing. Nothing else is left; only you are. Become aware of awareness itself, and then dhyana is transformed into samadhi. By watching the mind, the mind disappears. By watching the witness, the witness expands and becomes universal. The first is a negative step to get rid of the mind; the second is a positive step to get rooted in the ultimate consciousness – call it God, or nirvana, or whatever you wish.

If you are unhappy, that simply means that you have learned tricks for being unhappy, and nothing else. Unhappiness depends on the frame of your mind. (…) Everything is the same. All depends on what kind of frame you are carrying in your head. (…) The world is utterly neutral, balanced; it has all. Now it depends on you as to what you choose. (…) You will live in your own chosen world.

I don't see any possibility that politics and religion can ever meet. Politics always thinks the world is wrong; change the society, the economic structure, this and that, and everything will be okay. And religion says the world has always been the same and will remain the same; you can change only one thing – the context of your mind, the space of your mind.

Always rely on just a happy frame of mind. Let it be one of the fundamental rules of your life. Even if you come across a negative, find something positive in it. You will always be able to find something. And the day you become skillful at finding the positive in the negative, you will dance with joy.

Remember, there is not only one world; there are as many worlds as there are minds in the world. I live in my world; you live in your world. They are not only different; they never overlap. They are utterly different; they exist on different planes.

To know this, that existence mothers you, is to know God. (…) To feel that "This existence is my home" is to know God.

Remember, it is very difficult to create meditativeness; it is very easy to lose it. Anything higher takes much arduous effort to create, but it can disappear within a moment. To lose contact with it is very easy. (…) Meditation has to be a regular phenomenon. It is not that one day you do a little meditation, then for a few days you forget about it, and then, one day, you do it again. It has to be as regular as sleep, as food, as exercise, as breathing. Only then will the infinite glory of God open its doors to you.

The man who wants to become a Buddha has to drop the nonessential more and more, so that more energy is available for the essential. (…) The seeker has to be watchful. (…) All that is great comes only if you have extra energy. If your whole energy is wasted on the mundane, then the sacred will never be contacted. (…) Block the leaks of your energy.

Thinking and feeling are both halves. No half can ever satisfy you, and you will remain divided. Being is total, and only the total can bring contentment. And the ultimate change is from being to non-being. That is nirvana, enlightenment; one simply disappears. Neti neti: neither this nor that, neither existence nor nonexistence – this is the ultimate state. (…) One has disappeared, and one has arrived. One is no more, for the first time. And for the first time, one really is.

Don't ponder over others' defects; it is none of your business. Don't interfere in others' lives; it is none of your business. (…) Not only is it a wastage of time and energy, but it strengthens and gratifies the ego. (…) Don't even be too much concerned about your own defects. Take note, be aware, and let the matter be settled then and there. (…) If you are fully aware of anything, the fire of awareness burns it. There is no need for any other remedy.

Watch which is your basic obsession; find the characteristic upon which your whole ego edifice rests. And then be constantly aware of it, because it can exist only if you are unaware. It is burnt in the fire of awareness automatically. And remember, remember always, that you are not to cultivate the opposite of it. (…) People move from one thing to the opposite. That is not the way of transformation. It is the same pendulum, moving from left to right, from right to left. (…) The pendulum has to be stopped in the middle. And that's the miracle of awareness.

The mind, the ego, are all result-oriented. The being is not result-oriented. And how can the non-being ever be result-oriented? It is not there in the first place. Meditation happens only to those who are not result-oriented. (…) Abandon all hopes of results. (…) That assertion which comes from the deepest core of being – "I give up" – in that very giving up, all goal-oriented mind efforts and endeavors disappear. In that very moment, one is no more the same person. One is silent, one is a nobody, and one touches the ultimate stratum of being.

Be; don't try to become. There is nothing to become. You are already that. Stop running after shadows. Sit silently and be.

The religions, the society, the politicians, have given people only fictions to live by. Now all those fictions are broken, and people have nothing to live for – hence their anguish.

Don't follow rules imposed from the outside. No imposed rule can ever be right, because rules are invented by people who want to rule you. (…) Great enlightened people have not given rules to the world; they have given their love.

Never be an imitator; be always original. (…) Life is really a dance if you are an original – and you are meant to be an original. (…) Imbibe the spirit, imbibe the silence of the Master; learn his grace. Drink as much out of his being as possible, but don't imitate him. Imbibing his spirit, drinking his love, receiving his compassion, you will be able to listen to your own heart's whisperings. (…) Listen to the Master's silence, so that one day you can listen to your own innermost core. And then this problem will never arise: "I am doing something that I should not do, and I am not doing something that I should do." This problem arises only because you are being dominated by outer rules; you are imitators. (…) What is right for Buddha is not right for you. Just look how different Krishna is from Buddha. (…) A Buddha is a Buddha; a Krishna is a Krishna, and you are you. And you are not in any way less than anybody else. Respect yourself; respect your own inner voice and follow it.

To come to the right door, one has to knock first on many wrong doors. That's how it is. If you suddenly stumble upon the right door, you will not be able to recognize that it is right. (…) So remember, in the ultimate reckoning, no effort is ever wasted; all efforts contribute to the ultimate climax of your growth. So don't be hesitant; don't be worried too much about going wrong.

I teach you: Commit as many mistakes as possible, remembering only one thing – don't commit the same mistake again. And you will be growing. It is part of your freedom to go astray; it is part of your dignity to go even against God. And it is sometimes beautiful to go even against God. This is how you will start having a spine.

Forget all about what you have been told, "This is right and this is wrong." Life is not so fixed. The thing that is right today may be wrong tomorrow; the thing that is wrong this moment may be right in the next moment. Life cannot be pigeonholed; you cannot label it so easily. (…) Life is a mystery; one moment, something fits, and then it is right. Another moment, so much water has gone down the Ganges that it no longer fits and it is wrong. What is my definition of right? That which is harmonious with existence is right; and that which is disharmonious with existence is wrong. You will have to be very alert each moment, because each moment it has to be decided afresh. You cannot depend on readymade answers for what is right and what is wrong.

My own understanding is this, that whenever commandments are given, they create difficulties for people, because by the time they are given, they are already out of date. Life moves so fast – it is a dynamism; it is not a static. It is never the same for two consecutive moments. So one thing may be right this moment, and may not be right the next moment. (…) Life is like that. You cannot prepare for it; you cannot be ready for it. It always takes you unawares; it always comes as a surprise.

To command somebody is to reduce him to a slave. I don't give you any orders; you are not to be obedient to me or to anybody else. I simply teach you an intrinsic law of life. Be obedient to your own self; be a light unto yourself and follow your own light. Then whatsoever you do is the thing to do, and whatsoever you don't do is the thing that has not to be done. And remember, don't go on looking back again and again, because life goes on changing. (…) There is no need to look back; life goes ahead. But there are many drivers who go on looking in the rearview mirror. They drive onwards, but they look backwards; their life is going to be a catastrophe. Look ahead. The road that you have passed, you have passed. It is finished; don't carry it anymore. Don't be unnecessarily burdened by the past. Go on closing the chapters that you have read; there is no need to go back again and again. And never judge anything of the past through the new perspective that is arriving, because the new is new, incomparably new. The old was right in its own context, and the new is right in its own context, and they are incomparable.

What I am trying to explain to you is: Drop guilt! Because to be guilty is to live in hell. Not being guilty, you will have the freshness of dewdrops in the early morning sun; you will have the freshness of lotus petals in the lake; you will have the freshness of the stars in the night. Once guilt disappears, you will have a totally different kind of life, luminous and radiant. You will have a dance to your feet and your heart will be singing a thousand and one songs. To live in such rejoicing is to be a sannyasin; to live in such joy is to live a divine life. To live burdened with guilt is simply to be exploited by the priests.

Everything becomes irrelevant, because life never remains confined. It goes on and on; it crosses all borders, all boundaries; it is an infinite process. (…) And the only way to be in contact with life, the only way not to lag behind life, is to have a heart which is not guilty, a heart which is innocent. Forget all about what you have been told – what has to be done and what has not to be done. Nobody else can decide it for you. You have to decide. In fact, in that very decisiveness, your soul is born. When others decide for you, your soul remains asleep and dull.

To decide means to take risks; to decide means you may be doing wrong – who knows, that is the risk. Who knows what is going to happen? That is the risk; there is no guarantee. With the old, there is a guarantee. Millions and millions of people have followed it – how can so many people be wrong? That is the guarantee. If so many people say it is right, it must be right. In fact, the logic of life is just the opposite. If so many people are following a certain thing, be certain it is wrong, because so many people are not so enlightened and cannot be so enlightened. The majority consists of fools, utter fools. Beware of the majority. If so many people are following something, that is enough proof that it is wrong. Truth happens to individuals, not crowds. Be an individual if you really want truth to happen to you. Take all the risks that are needed to be an individual, and accept the challenges, so that they can sharpen you, so that they can give you brilliance and intelligence. Truth is not a belief; it is utter intelligence. It is a flaring-up of the hidden resources of your life; it is an enlightening experience of your consciousness.

Truth creates controversy, because it shocks people; it shatters their illusions. And they want to cling to their illusions; those illusions are very consoling, comfortable, convenient and cozy. They don't want to leave their dreams; they are not ready to drop their investments in all kinds of foolish projects – and that's what truth requires of them. They feel angry; they want revenge. It's absolutely natural.

To live a life of compromise is worse than death. And to die for truth is far more valuable than to live in lies.

To live in freedom is heaven; to live in bondage is hell. You can decorate your prison cell beautifully, but that makes no difference; it is a prison cell. And that's what people have been doing; they go on decorating their prison cell. They give it beautiful names; they go on painting it, putting new pictures on the walls, arranging the furniture in new ways, purchasing more and more things – but they live in prisons. Your marriage is a prison; your church is a prison; your nationality is a prison. How many prisons have you created? You are not living in one prison; your prisons are like Chinese boxes: a box within a box within a box within a box, it goes on. (…) This is what hell is. (…) The consciousness of a Buddha, the pure consciousness of a Buddha, that is heaven. (…) Heaven is not a metaphysical concept; it is your own experience.

Life is dialectical. It exists through duality; it is a rhythm between opposites. You cannot be happy forever, otherwise happiness will lose all meaning. You cannot be in harmony forever, otherwise you will become unaware of the harmony. Harmony has to be followed by discord again and again, and happiness has to be followed by unhappiness. Every pleasure has its own pain, and every pain has its own pleasure. Unless one understands this duality of existence, one remains in unnecessary misery. Accept the total, with all its agonies and all its ecstasies. Don't hanker for the impossible; don't desire that there should be only ecstasy and no agony. Ecstasy cannot exist alone; it needs a contrast. Agony becomes the blackboard, then ecstasy becomes clear and loud, just as in the darkness of night the stars are so bright. The darker the night, the brighter the stars. In the day, they don't disappear; they simply become invisible – you cannot see them because there is no contrast.

Your mind contains memories, thoughts, desires, jealousies, power trips, and a thousand and one things. All that, on a little more subtle plane, is food. Thought is food. Hence when you have nourishing thoughts, your chest expands. When you have thoughts which give you energy, you feel good. (…) The mind is food in subtle form. (…) Watch what you allow into your mind. (…) Avoid such situations in which you are unnecessarily burdened with rubbish. (…) Talk less; listen only to the essential; be telegraphic in talking and listening. If you talk less, if you listen less, slowly, slowly, you will see that a cleanliness, a feeling of purity will start arising in you.

All kinds of conditionings are poisons. (…) Think of yourself only as being. And the being includes all.

To live with blind people and to have eyes is a dangerous situation; they are bound to destroy your eyes. They cannot tolerate you; you are an offense.

Let your soul be free from the idea of the self. When the soul is free from the idea of 'I', you have arrived at that inner space called no-self, anatta. (…) You are empty in the sense that all poisons, all contents, are gone. But you are full, full of something which cannot be named, full of something which devotees call God.

Don't be consistent. Consistency means living according to the past. And to live according to the past means to be dead.

The real man has no character. A real man is characterless, or beyond character.

The most important responsibility is not to the nation, or to the church, or to anybody else. The real responsibility is to yourself. And it is that you have to live your life according to your own light, and you have to move wherever life leads, without any compromise.

The sage has no character. (…) They don't fit into any mold; they are pure freedom. They don't leave any trace behind them.

Don't have any views. Live life without a philosophy to live by. No philosophy is needed to live life; in fact the best and most glorious life is the life which is lived without any philosophy – simple, innocent, spontaneous. (…) Start by dropping wrong views. Don't live through prejudice; don't live through anger; don't live through hatred; don't live through greed and ambition; don't live through dreams. Be more real, more realistic. (…) The highest possibility is to live without any views, to just live, to just be. The second best is to at least drop the negative part and follow the positive. And slowly, slowly, you will see that if you can drop the negative, the positive can also be dropped. In fact, to drop the negative is more difficult than to drop the positive. The person who can drop the 'no' can easily drop the 'yes', because the 'no' is more ego-strengthening than the 'yes'. (…) And to remain transcendental to all dualities is the ultimate goal of Atisha and all the great Masters.

Death is the shadow of the ego. Because the ego is, death appears to be. (…) The secret of knowing death, of understanding death, is not in death itself. You will have to go deeper into the existence of the ego. (…) And the day you have found that there is no ego, that there has never been – it appeared only because you were not aware; it appeared only because you were keeping your own existence in darkness… the day it is understood that the ego is a creation of an unconscious mind, the ego disappears and simultaneously death disappears. (…) The real you is eternal. Life is neither born nor dies. The ocean continues; waves come and go. Waves have no substantial existence; they are just forms, the wind playing with the ocean. And the ocean is, always is. (…) To know life is to know there is no death; there never has been.

Whatever you dream, take note of it. The dream indicates what you are missing in reality. A man who lives in reality – his dreams start disappearing. There is nothing for him to dream. By the time he goes to sleep, he is finished with the work of the day. He is finished; he has no hangover that moves into dreams.

You can be hypnotized so much by the mind that you can lose your soul. (…) Ego is the state of utter unawareness. The mind has taken possession of your whole being; it has spread like a cancer all over you; nothing is left out. The ego is the cancer of the inner, the cancer of the soul. And the only remedy is meditation. Then you can start reclaiming a few territories from the mind.

If you live totally, cunningness and cleverness disappear, and trust arises. These are the criteria to know whether one has lived or not.

Atisha says, “Don’t wait for the opportunity” – because the world is the opportunity; we are already in it. The world is an opportunity to learn. It looks paradoxical – time is the opportunity to learn the eternal; the body is the opportunity to learn the bodiless; matter is the opportunity to learn consciousness; sex is the opportunity to learn samadhi. The whole existence is an opportunity.

Growth means you are not moving in a circle, that something new is happening every day, every moment. And when does that become possible? Whenever you start living intensely and totally.

Buddha becomes disidentified from the body. The first meditation is complete; the body is left. Then the second meditation: the mind is dropped. As a master, it was dropped long before, but as a servant it was still used. Now it is not even needed as a servant; it is utterly dropped, totally dropped. And then the third meditation: he dropped his heart. It had been needed up to now; he had been functioning through his heart; otherwise compassion would not have been possible. He had been the heart; now he disconnects from the heart. When these three meditations are completed, the fourth happens. He is no more a person, no more a form, no more a wave. He disappears in the ocean. He becomes that which he had always been.

Existence simply is, for no purpose. And the person who really wants to live has to get rid of this idea of purpose.

If you are enlightened, if you have lived your life with awareness, and you have reached the point of awareness where no dark spot of unconsciousness exists for you, then there is no longer any womb or you. Then you enter into the womb of God – existence itself. That is liberation, moksha, nirvana.

We are not interested in politics; not at all. But we cannot avoid them either. Politics is like the weather – whether you like it or not, it is going to affect you anyway.

Desire is life. Desire is the very source of all that you see. Desire is creativity. (…) Desire has not to be destroyed; it has to be purified. Desire has not to be dropped; it has to be transformed. Your very being is desire; to be against it is to be against yourself and against all.

The desire for money is not really the desire for money; it is the desire to expand. And the same is the case with all other desires. (…) Men want to be more. They don’t want to remain confined; they don’t want to be limited. (…) To have limitations means to be imprisoned. (…) But all objects of desire sooner or later disappoint. If you watch carefully, money, power, prestige – nothing satisfies. On the contrary, they make you more discontented. (…) Intelligence means the insight that no object can fulfill your desire. (…) Your desire is divine; your desire is for the Infinite. (…) The intelligent person stops desiring objects. He makes his desire pure of all objects – worldly, otherworldly. He starts living his desire in its purity, moment to moment. He is full of desire, full of overflowing energy. His ordinary life becomes so intense, so passionate, that whatsoever he touches will be transformed. The baser metal will become gold, and the dead tree will come to bloom again. (…) Buddha is pure desire, just desire. Not a desire for anything; he has abandoned all objects.

When there is nothing to desire, there is nothing to dream about either, because dreams are reflections of your desires. (…) Patanjali says that dreamless sleep is closest to samadhi – just one more step, and you have come. (…) Enlightenment means that desire is freed from all objects. With freedom from objects, desire is divine.

For lower things, words are bridges; for higher things, they become barriers.

Sex is triggered not by your physiology, but by your psychology. The physiology cooperates with it, but deep down sex comes from the inner body to the outer body.

The mind is very traditional, conventional, conformist, orthodox. The mind is never revolutionary; it is against all change. And the change I am talking about is a total change.

If what I am saying has anything of truth in it, it will be understood by your heart. But the mind has to give way. And then you will not need to change your life according to it; it will be changed of its own accord.

The past is that of an animal; the future is that of God. And between the two is man.

Man is naturally schizophrenic; man is naturally divided. (…) Schizophrenia is not a disease; it is not a pathology – it is the state of normal human beings. It starts looking like a pathology only when it goes to the extreme.

The higher can exist only with the lower; this is one thing of great importance to be remembered. The lower can exist without the higher – it will remain unfulfilled, but it can exist. The higher cannot even exist without the lower.

I want you to become alchemists. This is an alchemical school, a university for inner alchemy. We are trying to change the baser metal into gold. (…) There is no question of denying anything, but of transforming it.

Man has no center separate from the center of the Whole. There is only one center in existence.

Life is a wandering; it is not a home. It is a search for the home, but life itself is not the home. It is an enquiry, an adventure. It is not necessarily that you will succeed – success is very rare, because the search is very complex, and there are a thousand and one difficulties on the way.

Those who seek pleasure will find sorrow – because pleasure is just a camouflage; it is sorrow hiding itself behind a curtain. (…) The real joy never comes from the outside; it is the spurious that comes from the outside.

There is no need to have many goals; one goal is enough. Enquire into the truth of your life. (…) One method will correct all wrong. That method is awareness. (…) Light the candle of awareness in your heart, and your whole being will radiate compassion.

Life in itself is not meaningful. It is meaningful only if you can sing a song of the eternal, if you can release some fragrance of the Divine, of the godly, if you can become a lotus flower – deathless, timeless. (…) Meaning has to be created in life; meaning is not given already. (…) All the essential ingredients of meaning are given, but meaning is not given; meaning has to be created by you. You have to become a creator in your own right. And when you become a creator in your own right, you participate with God; you become a part of God.

Action is the farthest from the being; then comes thought; then comes feeling. And behind feeling, just hidden behind feeling, is your being. That being is universal – call it God, atman, self, no-self, whatsoever you wish to call it.

The Buddha never fulfills any expectations of the multitudes – he cannot; he is not here to follow you.

Life is not going anywhere; there is no goal, no destination. Life is non-purposive; it simply is. Unless this understanding penetrates your heart, you cannot slow down.

Life is very short. If there is a goal to be achieved, there is bound to be hurry. And there is bound to be worry, a constant worry whether I am going to make it or not – a trembling heart, a shaking of the foundations. You will remain almost always in an inner earthquake; you will be always on the verge of a nervous breakdown. Have a goal, and sooner or later you will end up on the psychoanalyst's couch.

My vision is that of a goalless life. Then, this moment is given to you. (…) Life is for life's sake.

Each moment is utterly for its own sake. To sacrifice it for anything else is to be unintelligent. And once the habit of sacrificing settles, then this moment you will sacrifice for the next, and the next for the next, and so on, so forth – this year for the next year, and this life for the next life! Then, it is a simple logical process: once you have taken the first step, then the whole journey starts – the journey that leads you into the wasteland, the journey that makes your life a desert, the journey that is self-destructive, suicidal.

Life is a pure journey; it is a pilgrimage from nowhere to nowhere – and between these two is the now-here.

All questions are absurd. (…) Life never becomes known; it always remains a mystery, a question mark. (…) Who knows? Who has ever known? But still God is, and still God has to be addressed.

Slowly, slowly, learn the ways of living in mystery. Mind continuously hankers to demystify everything; there is a deep urge in the mind to demystify. (…) The greater the secret, the more the impotence of the mind. But that is where prayer arises; that is where meditation arises; that is where all that is beautiful arises. That is where truth is felt. (…) Religion is not of the mind; religion is of the heart. Mind raises questions; the heart knows only the ultimate question mark.

The meaningful questions will be solved; the meaningless questions will be known as absurd – then, finally, remains only the question mark.

Mind is a power seeker. Hence mind slowly, slowly became too much attached to science. (…) And then, automatically, science becomes reduced to technology.

Learnedness is nothing but a cover up for inner stupidity.

Man creates comparison, because ego is possible only if nourished by comparison continuously. But then you will have two outcomes: sometimes you will feel superior; and sometimes you will feel inferior. (…) The mystic has seen that all comparison is false, meaningless; he has dropped comparing. The moment you drop comparing, you are simply yourself. (…) A mystic is one who simply knows that he is himself. He lives his life according to his own light; he creates his own space; he has his own being. He is utterly contented with himself, because without comparison you cannot be discontented either.

Beliefs are created by constant repetition. (…) People don't believe in what you say; people believe in the way you say it. (…) And once you have learned the art of telling lies, it becomes an addiction, because people start believing in you; you start becoming powerful.

God is a lie as a person. God is a quality, not a personality. (…) People love lies. Truth is arduous.

People are living in enormous ignorance; they have not lit the candle of light that is there in their hearts. Their interiority is full of darkness. They don't know themselves.

Love is a ladder, a ladder of three rungs. The lowest rung is sex; the middle is love; and the highest is prayer. Because of these three rungs, there are a thousand and one combinations possible. Real compassion, the compassion of a Buddha, appears only at the third rung, when sex energy becomes prayer.

Confusion is my technique to bring clarity. (…) When the old ceases to exist, the new appears – and that new has clarity. (…) Clarity comes not out of the mind and its projections and ideas and philosophies; clarity comes out of no-mind. (…) That emptiness, that virginity, is clarity.

I have no message; I have nothing to convey to you; I have no ideology to teach to you. You will have to learn my language; otherwise there is going to be more and more misunderstanding, and more and more confusion.

Misery nourishes your ego. Happiness is basically a state of egolessness. That's the very crux of the problem. That's why people find it very difficult to be happy.

The society does not want intelligence to flower. The society does not need intelligence; in fact it is very afraid of intelligence. The society needs stupid people, because stupid people are manageable. (…) The stupid person cannot disobey; he is always ready to be commanded. The stupid person needs somebody to command him, because he has no intelligence to live on his own. He wants somebody to direct him; he seeks and searches his own tyrants. (…) The intelligent person is rebellious. Intelligence is rebellion. (…) Without intelligence, there can be no happiness. Man can only be happy if he is intelligent, utterly intelligent. Meditation is a device to release your intelligence. The more meditative you become, the more intelligent you become. (…) You become happy; you become creative; you become rebellious; you become adventurous; you start loving insecurity; you start moving into the unknown. You start living dangerously, because that is the only way to live. To be a sannyasin means to decide that I will live my life intelligently, that I will not be just an imitator, that I will live within my own being, that I will not be directed and commanded from without, that I will risk all to be myself, but I will not be part of a mob psychology, that I will walk alone, that I will find my own path, that I will make my own path in the world of truth. Just by walking into the unknown, you create the path. The path is not already there; just by walking, you create it.

The mind is continuously afraid of allowing any truth to enter you. It finds a thousand and one ways to avoid the truth, because the truth is going to shatter it.

Because the mind itself is rubbish, it collects rubbish, very joyously.

Buddha used to repeat each statement three times. Once somebody asked, "Why do you repeat three times?" He said, "Because I know, the first time you don't hear at all. The second time you hear, but you hear something else that I have not said. The third time, I hope that you hear that which is said, exactly that which is said."

If somebody came to Buddha to surrender, he had to surrender three times. (…) Why? Buddha is reported to have said, "The first time, you may have said it but may not have meant it. The second time, you may have meant it, but you may not have meant that which I mean by it. The third time, I hope that you are exactly doing what is expected."

It is not a formal thing to say, I go to the feet of the Buddha. If it is formal, it is meaningless. If you are simply repeating it because others are repeating it, it is useless. And people are imitators. (…) you go on bowing to the cross because your parents have been doing it, because their parents have been doing it, and so forth. People simply imitate. Imitation is easy; it remains on the surface. It is not a commitment – commitment goes to the heart.

You will have to be very conscious; you will have to learn two things. The first thing is to drop the nonessential; only then the second thing is possible – to get attuned with the essential. (…) Beware of the nonessential. The moment you see something nonessential is there, don't pay any attention to it, bypass it. There is no need to even look at it. (…) Once you have started living in the essential, slowly, slowly, many things that you used to do before – going to the movies, reading the novels, watching TV, listening to the radio, gossiping with people – start disappearing. And the energy that is involved in them becomes available for the essential. (…) Buddha has said that the sannyasin should not look more than four feet ahead while he is walking on the road – just four feet ahead. Why? So that you need not see all that is going on around. It is beautiful; it is significant. (…) Life is short; energy is limited. Don't be foolish; don't go on wasting it on the nonessential. But you have to be conscious; only then the nonessential can be dropped.

Life is longing, pure longing – longing to attain higher and higher peaks, longing to go deeper and deeper into existence. But each moment can be utterly satisfying; that difference has to be remembered.

Whenever something is perfect, whenever something is really perfect, life will disappear from it. Life can exist only if something is still imperfect. Life is the ambition to make the ugly beautiful. Something of imperfection is a must for life to exist, for life to go on growing and flowing. (…) Whenever a person becomes perfect, that is his last life. He will not come back, because perfection means that life is no more possible. He will disappear into the cosmos, into nothingness. The Buddhist word is nirvana – annihilation, cessation. Literally, nirvana means "blowing out the candle".

Those of you who have seen, cannot say.

Man is a chaos. You are a kind of madness. Whatever you think is normal is not normal at all. It appears normal, because you have lived with these people from your very childhood and you have started thinking that these are the only people, so they must be normal. It is as if one was born in a madhouse and from the very beginning was acquainted only with mad people; he will think them normal. (…) The moment you realize that you are standing on your head, a great moment has arrived. Now you cannot go on standing on your head anymore – you have to do something; it is inevitable.

For thousands of years, man has lived in an imprisoned state. Those prisons have been given beautiful names: you call them churches, religions, ideologies. (…) But any person who lives through some ideology is a prisoner, because every ideology narrows down your consciousness, becomes chains on your being. Anybody who belongs to any crowd out of fear, out of conditioning, out of a kind of hypnosis, is not truly a man, is not yet born.

A really religious man knows not through scriptures, but by his own experience.

This is something to be understood: society respects only those saints who are not really sages, but agents – agents who help the society to continue as it is, agents of the establishment.

Belief means you don't know, still you have taken something for granted. Now your whole effort will be to prove it right; it will become your ego trip. Each belief becomes an ego trip; you have to prove it right. If it is wrong, then you are wrong; if it is right, then you are right. And every person is nothing but a bagful of beliefs. Remember, all beliefs are stupid. (…) To believe is stupid; to know is intelligent. And knowing happens to those who are not knowledgeable, but innocent. Knowing happens to those eyes which are absolutely without the dust of knowledge. (…) Once you believe in something that you have not known, you have already started gathering around you a darkness which will prevent you from knowing, seeing. (…) Be impartial; start without any conclusion; start without any a priori belief. Start existentially, not intellectually – these are two different dimensions; not only different, but diametrically opposite.

Truth is an experience, not a belief. If it is not experiential, it is not true.

Truth never comes by studying about it. (…) If you become too much obsessed with the map, the mountain may be there just in front of you, but still you will not be able to see it.

The prejudiced eye is blind; the heart full of conclusions is dead. Too many a priori assumptions, and your intelligence starts losing its sharpness, its beauty, its intensity. It becomes dull. Dull intelligence is called intellect. Your so-called intelligentsia is not really intelligent; it is just intellectual. Intellect is a corpse. You can decorate it with great pearls, diamonds, emeralds, but still a corpse is a corpse. To be alive is a totally different matter. Intelligence is aliveness; it is spontaneity; it is openness; it is vulnerability; it is impartiality; it is the courage to function without conclusions. (…) To function without a conclusion is to function in innocence. There is no security; you may go wrong; you may go astray. (…) It is an individual exploration; you cannot depend on others' conclusions.

Let your life be as multidimensional as possible; don't live one-dimensionally. Richness comes by living life in all its dimensions. (…) The really religious person will be very experimental. He will go on experimenting with everything that becomes available. (….) You are your experience. Hence, experience more. Before settling, experience as much as possible. The real person never settles; the real person always remains homeless, a wanderer, a vagabond of the soul. He remains continually in search; he never becomes learned.

God is found in intense living – a life of depth and totality, and a death also of depth and totality. Live totally and die totally, and God is yours and truth is yours.

The world is the negative pole of God. You need not renounce it; you have simply to be meditative in it. And one day, you will see the world has disappeared and there is God and only God. (…) Your work has to be with the negative, and the positive is the reward.

In the definition of the Buddhas, that which can be taken by death is unimportant, and that which cannot be taken by death is important. Remember this definition; let this be a touchstone. (…) You will be taking with you only whatsoever awareness you have attained; that is your only real wealth.

The heart has to be the master, and the head the servant. But people are living upside down. Logic rules; love is not even heeded. Personality has become more important than individuality. And the society wants you to have personalities which are comfortable for the society, convenient for the society. But personality is just a mask; individuality is your uniqueness. And the individual is not necessarily always comfortable to the society – in fact, he is very inconvenient. (…) Individuals don't fit with personalities. Light cannot be adjusted with darkness. (…) Move from thoughts to feelings, and from feelings to being, and start living from being.

Commit; involve! Involve yourself with life; get committed to life; don't remain a spectator. Don't go on vacillating. Life is for those who know how to commit – how to say 'yes' to something, how to say 'no' to something decisively, categorically.

The teaching of all the Masters can be condensed into one word: disidentification. Don't be identified with the mind. Discipline yourself into deep awareness, so that you are cut off from the mind. Atisha says, "Train as though cut off."

In the first satori, it happens accidentally: meditating, watching, one day it happens almost like an accident. You were groping in the dark and you have stumbled upon the door. The first satori is stumbling upon the door. The second satori is becoming perfectly aware where the door is, and whenever you want to, you can go to the door – whenever you want to go. Even in the marketplace, surrounded by all the clamor of the market, you can go to the door. Suddenly you can become cut off. You become capable of cutting off from the mind whenever you want. And the third satori is when you are absolutely cut off, so that even if you want to join the mind, you cannot. You can use it like a machine, separate from you, but even in your deep sleep you are not identified with it. These are the three satoris, three samadhis. First, accidental stumbling; second, becoming more deliberate, conscious in reaching to the door; and third, becoming attuned so deeply with the door that you never lose track of it, that it is always there, open. This is the state called satori in Japan, samadhi in India. In English, it is translated as ecstasy; literally it means "standing out" – standing out of the mind is standing in consciousness.

To live in the moment is innocence; to live without the past is innocence; to live without conclusions is innocence; to function out of a state of not knowing is innocence. (…) The more knowledgeable you are, the more and more existence is ugly, because you start functioning from conclusions, you start functioning from knowledge. (…) The moment you know, and think that you know, you have created a barrier between yourself and that which is. (…) Jesus says, Unless you are like small children, you will not enter into the kingdom of God.

The child brings the doubt in him – an inner doubt that is natural. It is because of the doubt that he enquires; it is because of the doubt that he questions. (…) From where are these questions coming? They are natural to the child. Doubt is an inner potential; it is the only way the child will be able to enquire and search and seek. (…) Doubt is a groping effort, an effort to understand the un-understandable, to comprehend the incomprehensible. (…) If doubt is there, doubt is there! (…) Let it become a thousand and one questions – and ultimately you will see, it is not the questions that are relevant; it is the question mark!

All believers are disbelievers, because belief brings disbelief; it is the shadow of belief. (…) The believer is not a seeker. The believer does not want to seek; that's why he believes. The believer needs a savior. He is always in search of a messiah – somebody who can eat for him, chew for him, digest for him.

Trust grows inside you, in your interiority, in your subjectivity. (…) Belief is from the outside; it can't help, because it can't reach to the innermost core of your being, and it is there that the doubt is. From where to start? Trust your doubt. That's my way of bringing trust in. Don't believe in God; don't believe in the soul; don't believe in the afterlife. Trust in your doubt, and immediately a conversion will start. (…) Out of this authentic doubt, some day, will grow the flower of authentic trust. (…) Be a light unto yourself.

Don't consider others; otherwise you will never grow. (…) There are millions of people. If you go on considering each and everybody, you will never be an individual; you will be just a hodgepodge. So many compromises made, you would have committed suicide long ago. It is said that people die at the age of thirty and are buried at the age of seventy. (…) My own observation is, people die nearabout twenty-one. Then whatsoever is, is a posthumous existence. On the graves, we should start writing three dates: birth, death, and posthumous death.

Life is eternal. It is not something that begins and ends; it has no beginning and no end. You always have been here in different forms, and you will be here in different forms, or, ultimately, formless. That's how a Buddha lives in existence: he becomes formless. He disappears from the gross forms totally.

Start feeling one with existence, because that's how it is. That's why my insistence again and again to let the distinction between the observer and the observed disappear, as many times during the day as possible. (…) The observer and the observed are two aspects of the witness. When they disappear into each other, when they melt into each other, when they are one, the witness for the first time arises in its totality. (…) When the witness arises, there is nobody who is witnessing, and there is nothing to be witnessed. It is a pure mirror, mirroring nothing.

Religion is the disappearance of separation, of duality. And in that disappearance, energy is released; energy that was confined by the dual, that was kept separate, simply dances in unity. That unity is witnessing.

Thousands of poets and painters and musicians have remained celibate, and with no effort. Monks remain celibate with great effort. Why? The monk is uncreative – in his life, there is no orgasmic experience; hence his mind hankers for the sexual experience. The poet, the musician, the artist, the dancer who is capable of being lost into whatsoever he is doing, is having orgasmic experiences on a higher plane; sex is not a necessity. If once in a while such a person moves into sex, it is not out of need, it is just playfulness. When it is out of need, it is a little bit ugly – there is manipulation, exploitation, an effort to use the other as a means. When you are simply playful, it is totally different.

Your body is energy; your mind is energy; your soul is energy. Then what is the difference between these three? The difference is only a different rhythm, different wavelengths, that's all. The body is gross; mind is a little more subtle; consciousness is purest energy, not even visible to you – it cannot be reduced into an object. (…) To be whole is to be holy. The effort that we are making here is how to help you so that your body, your mind, your consciousness, can all dance in one rhythm, in a togetherness, in a deep harmony. The moment your body, mind and consciousness function together, you have become the trinity, and in that experience is God. (…) When these three function in an organic unity, the fourth is always there: turya. To know the fourth is to know God. Let us say it in this way: God is when you are an organic unity. God is not when you are a chaos, a disunity, in conflict. When you are a house divided against yourself, there is no God. (…) When you are an orchestra of all your energies, God is. That feeling of unity is what God is. (…) God is the experience of the three falling in such unity that the fourth arises. And the fourth is more than the sum total of the parts.

Drop old ideas of meditation, that just sitting underneath a tree with a yoga posture is meditation. That is only one of the ways, and may be suitable for a few people, but is not suitable for all. For a small child, it is not meditation; it is torture. For a young man who is alive, vibrant, it is repression; it is not meditation. Maybe for an old man who has lived, whose energies are declining, it may be meditation. (…) Running can be a meditation – jogging, dancing, swimming, anything can be a meditation. My definition of meditation is: whenever your body, mind, soul are functioning together in rhythm, it is meditation, because it will bring the fourth in. (…) Each according to his need – only then this world can be full of meditation; otherwise not. (…) If we give only a fixed pattern of meditation, then it will be applicable only to a few people. That has been one of the problems in the past: fixed patterns of meditation, not fluid – fixed, so they fit certain types, and all others are left in the darkness. My effort is to make meditation available to each and everybody; whosoever wants to meditate, meditation should be made available according to his type. (…) We have to find as many dimensions to meditation as there are people in the world. The individual has not to fit with the pattern; the pattern has to fit with the individual. (…) But the basic fundamental is, whatsoever the meditation, it has to fill this requirement: that the body, mind, consciousness, all three should function in unity. Then suddenly, one day, the fourth has arrived: the witnessing. Or if you want to, call it God; call it God, or nirvana, or Tao, or whatsoever you will.

My respect for the individual is absolute. I am not much concerned with means; means can be changed, arranged in different ways. (…) You would be surprised how many doors God's temple has. And you would be surprised also that there is a special door only for you, and for nobody else. That's God's love for you, his respect for you. You will be received through a special door, not through the public gate; you will be received as a special guest.

The yoga posture is the most relaxed posture possible. It is more relaxing even than sleep, because when you are asleep, your whole body is being pulled by gravitation. It is horizontal, regressive; it brings you back to the ancient days when man was an animal. That's why in a lying posture, you cannot think clearly; it becomes difficult to think. (…) Thinking is a late arrival; when man became vertical, he began to think.

An erect spine was found to need the least expending of energy. (…) When both hands are touching each other, your body electricity starts moving in a circle. It does not go out of your body; it becomes an inner circle; the energy moves inside you. (…) Energy is released through the fingers, the toes of the feet and the hands. In a certain yoga posture, the feet are together, so one foot releases energy and it enters into the other foot; one hand releases energy and it enters into the other hand. You go on taking your own energy; you become an inner circle of energy.

The best way to receive death is the lotus posture, because in the lotus posture you will be fully alert; you can keep alertness to the very end. And if you are awake while you are dying, you will have a totally different kind of birth: you will be born awake. One who dies awake is born awake; one who dies unconscious is born unconscious. One who dies with awareness can choose the right womb for himself; he has a choice, he has earned it. The man who dies unconsciously has no right to choose the womb; the womb happens unconsciously, accidentally. The man who dies perfectly alert in this life will be coming only once more, because the next time there will be no more need to come. Just a little work is left; the other life will do that work. For one who is dying with awareness, only one thing is left now: he has had no time to radiate his awareness into compassion. Next time he can radiate his awareness into compassion. And unless awareness becomes compassion, something remains incomplete, something remains imperfect.

Every day, you are disappearing. Every day, something of you is evaporating. More and more, I am becoming your being. (…) That is the moment of great blessings – when the disciple disappears, when the disciple is only a vehicle to the Master. And the Master is nobody except the Whole. The Master is one who is not; the Master is one who has already disappeared into God. The Master is already a hollow bamboo, and God is using him as a flute.

Every relationship is only an arrow towards the ultimate relationship. (…) Every love affair is just an indication of a bigger love affair ahead – just a little taste, but that little taste is not going to quench your thirst or satisfy your hunger. On the contrary, that little taste will make you more thirsty, will make you more hungry. That's what happens in every relationship. Rather than giving you contentment, it gives you a tremendous discontentment. Each relationship fails in this world – and it is good that it fails; it is a blessing that it fails. Because each relationship fails, that's why you start searching for the ultimate relationship with God, with existence, with the cosmos. You see the futility again and again; (…) each experience ends in tremendous frustration, begins in great hope and leaves you in great hopelessness. When it happens again and again, one has to learn something – that each relationship is only an experimentation to prepare you for the ultimate relationship, for the ultimate love affair. That's what religion is all about. (…) it is the longing for God; it is the longing to merge with the Whole, so there is no separation any longer.

The more sensitive a person is, the more you will find him in discontent. The more intelligent, the more discontent will be found there. It has always been so.

Nothing changes in the world. But, falling again and again, something changes in you – and that is a revolution. Even to ask such a question means you are on the verge of a revolution. (…) Then a search in a new dimension is needed. That dimension is the dimension of the Divine.

When one is fulfilled, one starts overflowing. He cannot contain his own contentment. He is blessed, and so much is he blessed that he starts blessing others. He is so much blessed that he becomes a blessing to the world.

The more intelligent you are, the less mean you are. The utterly intelligent person cannot have any meanness; it is impossible. He can have only love and compassion. (…) The intelligent person has no desire to win; he is already victorious in his intelligence. The intelligent person is already superior in his intelligence; he has not to compete for it. The stupid person has to continuously compete. And because he is stupid, he cannot rely on his intelligence; he has to rely on something else – he becomes mean, deceptive, a hypocrite. To me, stupidity is the only sin, and everything else is just a by-product of it. And intelligence is the only virtue; everything else that we have known as virtue follows it like a shadow.

Man is reduced to a machine, and mechanical values are becoming dominant. (…) The whole life is geared around wrong things. Money is more important than meditation. This is a very topsy-turvy situation; man is standing on his head. Man is dying, and the death is very slow. And remember, when death is very fast, you can avoid it, because you become aware of it. But when it comes very, very slowly, a slow poisoning…

To be in relationship and become dependent is a sign of weakness. (…) To live in relationship and yet remain independent, that is what courage is. (…) The really brave man will live in the world and yet not be of it.

Man cannot survive as he is. Either he has to change himself, or he has to die and vacate the earth. This is what is felt; this is why you are in such a hurry.

What I am saying (…) is very difficult to communicate. It is almost an impossibility to communicate; still it has to be done. Even if fragments of what I am saying are understood, it will be enough to create the field, the energy field, in which the new man can be conceived. (…) even if people misunderstand it, even if the truth is misunderstood, it is better than a lie. Something of the truth will remain in the misunderstanding too. And truth is potential power, a great power. Even if a fragment, just a seed of truth, falls into your heart, sooner or later you will become the garden of Eden. It cannot be avoided. Just a drop, and the whole ocean will find its way towards you.

The ancient art was not only art; it was, deep down, mysticism. Deep down, it was out of meditation. It was objective, in Gurdjieff's terminology. It was made so that if somebody meditates over it, he starts falling into those depths where God lives.

Life is not something that can be defined. Life is not a singular phenomenon; life is multiplicity; life has millions of forms. (…) It differs from individual to individual. But one thing is very essential: anybody who is really alive will be here-now. Whatsoever the form and whatsoever the expression of his individual life, one thing will be essentially there: the quality of being here-now. (…) Life needs only one thing: to be rooted in the present. There is nowhere else for it to be rooted. Past is memory, future is imagination; both are unreal. The real is this moment – isness.

As I see it, millions of people on the road are not alive but walking zombies; they are dead people. In their eyes you will not find life flowing, life juices flowing. Their life is utterly meaningless – it is meaningless because it is not life.

Life is not there readymade, available. You get the life that you create; you get out of life that which you put into it. First, you have to pour meaning into it. You have to give it color and music and poetry; you have to be creative. Only then will you be alive. The second essential thing: that only those few people who are creative know what life is. The uncreative never know, because life is in creativity; life is creativity. Can't you see how life goes on creating? It is a continuum of creativity, constant creativity, every moment creativity. (…)

Whenever you are creating, you will have the taste of life, and it will depend on your intensity, your totality. (…) So the second essential is: be creative. If these two things are fulfilled, you will know what life is.

Joy is not coming out of work; joy is coming out of one's totality in the world, out of one's surrender to the work. No work in itself can give you joy unless you pour joy into it.

The man who lives with fixed ideas lives a dead life. He is never spontaneous, and he is never in a right relationship with the situation that exists. (…) He functions out of his old conclusions which are no longer relevant; he does not look at the situation itself.

According to me, there is no such thing as right and no such thing as wrong. (…) I teach awareness – not labelling, not categorizing. (…) I teach you to be fully aware in every situation, and to act out of your awareness. Or, in different words, I can say: any action that happens through awareness is right; any action that happens through unawareness is wrong. See the emphasis. The emphasis is not on the action itself; the emphasis is on the source – awareness.

If you go to the priests, they will teach you what is right and what is wrong. They will not give you insight; they will give you dead categories. They will not give you light, so that you can see in every situation what to do and what not to do; (…) their whole effort in fact is to make you dependent on them. They don't give you insight into things, so you have to remain dependent forever.

Man's greatest longing is freedom; man is a longing for freedom. Freedom is the very essential core of human consciousness; love is its circumference, and freedom is its center. These two fulfilled, life has no regret. And they both are fulfilled together, never separately. (…) Love without freedom naturally tends to be possessive. And the moment possessiveness enters in, you start creating bondage for others and bondage for yourself. (…) And there have been people who tried the other extreme, freedom without love. These are the escapists, the people who renounced the world. They escape into loneliness. Their loneliness never becomes aloneness, spiritual solitude; it remains loneliness. (…) If you have escaped from the world out of fear, you will be lonely; the world will haunt you, and all kinds of desire will surround you. You will suffer millions of nightmares, because whatsoever you have renounced cannot be dropped so easily. (…) Loneliness is such a misery that one starts believing in one's own hallucinations, to have company. But this is madness.

On the one hand is the person, the worldly person, who has tried to find love without freedom, and has failed. His life is nothing but a long, long slavery to many, many people, to many, many things. He is chained – body, mind, soul. That is one failure; the majority of humanity is caught in that extreme. A few escape from the world: seeing the misery, they start searching for the other extreme – freedom, moksha, nirvana. But they become neurotic, psychotic; they start living in their own dreams. Loneliness is so much that one has to create something to be with. Both these extreme efforts have failed. Hence humanity stands on a crossroads. Where to go, what to do? (…) One has to grow in such delicate balance, to where love and freedom can bloom together. (…) Meditation is the balance. Meditation is the bird with two wings: freedom and love. (…) Your freedom and your love have to grow hand in hand, in deep embrace, in a kind of dance, helping each other. (…) Just to love without freedom is to be impoverished; just to be free without love is to live in loneliness, sadness, darkness. Freedom is needed for love to grow; love is needed so that freedom can be nourished. Love has to become your circumference, your action; and freedom has to become your being, your center, your soul. (…) And then, the total man is born, who lives in the world and is not of the world at all.

Freedom can be of three types, and those three types have to be understood well. The first freedom is freedom from; the second is freedom for; and the third is just freedom, neither from nor for.

The first freedom, freedom from, is a reaction. It is past-oriented – you are fighting against the past; you want to get rid of it; you are obsessed with it. (…) As far as this freedom is concerned, Karl Marx and Sigmund Freud are not opposed to each other; they both agree. Karl Marx says one has to become free from the past, all past social structures, economic structures. His approach is political; Freud's approach is psychological – but both are rooted in the idea of freedom. All psychological therapies and all political reforms are reactions – and when you react, you are never free. This has to be understood. It only gives you an appearance of freedom, but it is never true freedom. Out of reaction, total freedom is not possible. And only total freedom is true freedom. You can go against the past, but just in being against it, you are caught by it. (…) Whomsoever you are fighting with, you become like him. Choose your enemies very carefully, because you will become like them! (…) If you fight with the czar, you have to learn his ways, and by the time you are the winner, you have learned the ways so skillfully, so efficiently, that they have become your ways. (…) That's why every revolution has failed. Persons change, but the structures remain the same.

The second freedom is freedom to; it is future-oriented. (…) Many people have tried that too, but that too is not possible, because future-oriented you can't live in the present – and you have to live in the present. (…) Visionaries only imagine. Beautiful utopias they have imagined, but those utopias never become reality, cannot become reality.

The third freedom is mystic, religious. It is present-oriented. (…) The real sannyasin, the real mystic, is not against the past, is not for the future. He is so utterly absorbed by the present that he has no time, no energy, for the past and the future. This is how the rebel is born. The rebel is the most beautiful phenomenon in the world. Buddha is a rebel, so is Jesus; Atisha is a rebel, so is Kabir. These are rebels. You will misunderstand them if you think of them as if they were revolutionaries; they were not. Neither were they reactionaries. Their orientation is totally different; their orientation is now, here. They don't live for any ideal, and they don't live against any ideal. They don't have any ideas; no ideology exists in the consciousness. The sheer purity of this moment – they live it, they enjoy it, they sing it, they dance it.

To die with your inner lotus fully in bloom, to die in love, in freedom, is the proof that one has known life, that one has really lived. All others go through empty gestures; they are not living.

How to find the essential core of your being? It happens in meditation, in awareness. And awareness has to be developed – it is only a seed in you; it can become a tree. (…) Examination is the first step: becoming alert to what passes your mind. And there is constant traffic – so many thoughts, so many desires, so many dreams are passing by. You have to be watchful; you have to examine each and every thing that passes through the mind. Not a single thought should pass unawares, because that means that you were asleep. Become more and more observant. (…) First, examine what is constantly there in your mind, what is being repeated again and again. You don't have many thoughts. If you examine them minutely, you will see that you have only a few thoughts repeated again and again – maybe in new forms, new colors, new garments, new masks, but you have only a very few thoughts. (…) And the second step is examination. First observe, examine, and then start looking into the roots. Why does a certain thing happen again and again? (…) By examination, you will see the tree; by investigation, you will see the roots. And it is only by seeing the roots that a transformation is possible. Bring the roots to the light, and the tree starts dying. (…) Find out which is the main characteristic, which is the center around which all your thoughts and moods move. If you can find the center, you have found the root. And the miracle is that once the root is found, you need not cut it; it is cut in the very finding of it. This is the inner secret of transformation.

The whole existence is celebrating every moment. Existence is a celebration, a blessing, a benediction. But your heart is dead. Only your physical heart is beating; your spiritual heart is completely nonfunctioning.

The non-meditator can be careless – he can afford to be careless, because he has nothing to lose. But the meditator cannot be careless; he has much to lose. Treasures are there now, and they can be lost within a second. (…) The energy is needed for inner nourishment. When something is growing in you, the whole energy has to be turned into manure. Don't use it outside in any way.

Spiritual experiences should not be talked about. (…) The seed needs to be hidden in the soil. (…) The disciple has to learn the art of keeping secrets. (…) Don't exhibit. A natural tendency of the mind is to exhibit. (…) If jealousy arises, that is the negative part of bragging. Then, sooner or later, you will start bragging.

Your very presence is going to create troubles for you, so at least avoid as much as possible irritating people. (…) The very presence of a person who has some spiritual quality is enough to create trouble for him, because blind people don't like people with eyes. Those who have lived always in darkness don't like people who bring light to them; they hate them – because the presence of a man of light is insulting; it makes them feel inferior. And this happens of its own accord; so please don't in any way do anything to enhance it more. (…) You cannot hide a light underneath a bush; it will show. You cannot hide a light; it will radiate. (…) The society is going to be angry with you. The society will try to destroy you, because you are undermining the society; you are cutting its very roots. It lives in ambition, and you are teaching a non-ambitious life. It lives in machiavellian ways, and you are teaching the ways of the Buddha. It lives through jealousy, violence, possessiveness, and you are teaching love. You are undermining its very foundation; you are destroying its very roots. It cannot forgive you; it will take revenge. So it is better to be very cautious. (…) Jesus is crucified; Socrates is poisoned; Mahavira is beaten – these things have to be expected. That's how the greater part of humanity lives – in darkness, in such darkness; from their darkness, you cannot expect more.

Bodhichitta is the state of the awakened one, the Buddha, the enlightened one, who is absolutely alert. A transformation happens in him. He has five senses, but his five senses function in a totally different way. His five senses start pouring his compassion to the outside world. To the person who is asleep, the five senses bring only impressions from the outside. To the person who is awake, these same five senses start pouring his love, his energy, his compassion, into the world. When bodhichitta is discovered, when inner consciousness is known, you are no longer a beggar. You don't take anything from without. On the contrary, you become an emperor – you start pouring your being into the outside world; you beautify it; you become a blessing to it. This is the transformation. If you are alert, you will give something to the world; you will be a giver. Remember, the more you give, the more you have – because the more you pour into the world, from the unknown sources of existence more and more goes on flowing into you. You are connected with the oceanic. (…) Share, and you will have more. Give, and you will get from the beyond. The transformed person is continuously giving. He has so much to give, he is overflowing.

Everybody is an ancient pilgrim. (…) You have come from far, faraway corners of the world. You must have been seeking for many lives. You have gathered a certain energy that knows where the Buddhafield is, and you are attracted towards that Buddhafield. You know where the magnet is.

Only those who are real seekers, only the courageous ones, only the true seekers, will be able to ignore everything, to sacrifice everything, to stake everything. Those who are just curious, they will not be able to do it.

Once you have come in contact with a living Master, then all else is meaningless; then everything can be staked – it can be easily sacrificed.

"I dropped the people; I ignored what they said. Instead, I poured my whole energy into one thing: how to drop this idea of ego, how to drop ego-clinging." All these sutras are nothing but the whole science of destroying ego. Once the ego is no more there, once you are no more separate from existence, once you don't think yourself separate from existence, immediately you are enlightened. Here the ego disappears; there God appears – immediately, instantly.

When one is totally dissolved into freedom and when one is really free, the ego disappears. The ego is your bondage; the ego is you prison. In total freedom, there is no ego found. Surrender happens; you start feeling one with existence, and that oneness brings love. (…) Will freedom, and love will come of its own accord.

Totality is possible; perfection is not possible. (…) Totality brings wholeness; and totality brings health; and totality brings sanity. (…) I teach you to live here-now.

Man has lived very partially – in fragments, in guilt, in fear. Man has become sadist, masochist, pathological. (…) People are torturing themselves and torturing others in every possible way. (…) Unless you are a togetherness, integrated, crystallized, you will not know what God is, because God speaks only to those who are not a crowd, not noisy, not fragmented. (…) Only by becoming one will you attain to silence, and in that silence, you can hear the voice of God; in that silence, you can start feeling the presence of the Divine. (…) By being whole yourself, you become capable of having a communion with the Whole.

Life is a very mixed puzzle. Whatsoever you make out of it is going to be arbitrary; you cannot figure it out in reality. My suggestion to my sannyasins is to forget all about figuring out what it is. Rather, live it; rather, enjoy it! Don't analyze it; celebrate it.

Man is bisexual – every man, every woman. Half of you is male, and half of you is female. If you are a woman, then the female part is on top and the male part is hidden behind, and vice versa. Once you have become aware of this, then a new work starts: your inner woman and inner man can have a meeting, and that meeting can remain absolute. There is no need to come back from the peak. But the first vision comes from the outer. Hence tantra uses the outer woman, the outer man, as part of inner work. Once you have become aware that you have a woman inside you or a man inside you, then the work takes on a totally new quality; it starts moving in a new dimension. Now, the meeting has to happen inside; you have to allow your inner woman and man to meet. (…) You may have seen the statues of Shiva as ardhanarishwar: half man, half woman. That is the picture of everybody's inner being, (…) the inner duality, the inner polarity, but the polarity can meet inwardly and merge. (…) Tantra has two phases, two stages: the outer, extrovert tantra, and the inner, introvert tantra. The beginning has to be always from the without; it is because we are there, so we have to start from the place where we are and move inwards. When the inner man and woman have met and melted, and when you are no more divided inside, you have become one – integrated, crystallized, one – you have attained. This is enlightenment.

The ordinary man is living a very abnormal life, because his values are upside down. Money is more important than meditation; logic is more important than love; mind is more important than heart. Power over others is more important than power over one's own being. Mundane things are more important than finding some treasures which death cannot destroy. (…) Let this sink deep in your heart: that unless the within becomes more important than the without, you are living a very abnormal life. The normal person is the one whose within is the source of everything that he is doing. The without is only a means; the within is the end. (…) The outer has to be used as a learning situation; it is a great opportunity. I am not against the outer love affair; I am all for it, because without it, you will never become aware of the inner. But remember, don't get stuck in the outer.

Sex gives you pleasure. And sex gives you pleasure only when you have gone into sex; then pleasure is the end result. If sex has become irrelevant – not repressed, but because you experienced it so deeply that it is no more of any value… you have known it, and knowledge always brings freedom. You have known it totally, and because you have known it, the mystery is finished; there is nothing more to explore. In that knowing, the whole energy, the sexual energy, is transmuted into love, compassion. (…) The body sooner or later becomes old; it is bound to become old. But if you have not lived your desires, they will clamor around you; they are bound to create something ugly in you. Either the old man becomes the most beautiful man in the world, because he attains to an innocence the same as the innocence of a child, or even far deeper than the innocence of a child – he becomes a sage. But if repressed desires are still there, running like an undercurrent, then he is caught in a turmoil. When the body is not capable, and the mind continuously haunts you for something which the body is incapable of doing, really the old man is in a mess.

If the old man is really mature, which is very rarely the case, then he will be beautiful. But people grow in age; they don't grow up. (…) They remain seeds; they remain potentialities; they never become actualities. To remain a seed is to remain dead. They don't know what self-realization is; they don't know what self-actualization is; they don't know anything of being. Utterly empty they live; utterly empty they die. Hence the problem. (…) Grow up; become more mature; become more alert and aware. Old age is the last opportunity given to you; before death comes, prepare. And how does one prepare for death? By becoming more meditative.

When I say, be free of all desires, I simply mean, be free of all objects of desire. Then there is a pure longing. That pure longing is divine; that pure longing is God.

One who really wants to live has to live in danger, constant danger. (…) The greater is the longing to grow, the more and more danger has to be accepted. The real man accepts danger as his very style of life, as his very climate of growth. (…) Being is the basic requirement. If you are, courage comes as a consequence.

Something complete is something dead. Life knows no full point; commas are okay, but no full points. Resting places are okay, but no destination.

The soul is a question; it is a quest.

“Is there anything I need to remember?”, you ask. It is you yourself. Self-remembering is needed. Buddha used to call it right-mindfulness, sammasati. Mahavira used to call it vivek, awareness. George Gurdjieff used to call it self-remembering. Kabir used to call it surati. But they all mean the same thing.

Sannyas is an ultimate love affair: the search for God, the search for truth. It is possible only when you have failed many times, loved and suffered, and each suffering has brought you more and more consciousness, more and more understanding. (…) Those who have not loved and suffered never become seekers of God – they cannot; they have not earned that worth; they have not become worthy. It is the sole right of the lover one day to start searching for the ultimate Beloved. Love totally and suffer totally, because this is how the impure gold passes through fire and becomes pure gold. (…) I help my sannyasins to go into love, because I know love ultimately fails. And unless they know by their own experience that love ultimately fails, their search for God will remain phony.

Jealousy is the by-product of the conditioning for comparison. Otherwise, if you drop comparing, jealousy disappears. (…) Comparison is a very foolish attitude, because each person is unique and incomparable. (…) God creates originals; he does not believe in carbon copies.

If everybody is in misery, it feels good; if everybody is losing, it feels good. If everybody is happy and succeeding, it tastes very bitter. But why does the idea of the other enter in your head in the first place? Again, let me remind you: because you have not allowed your own juices to flow; you have not allowed your own blissfulness to grow; you have not allowed your own being to bloom. Hence you feel empty inside – you start comparing; you start imitating; you start pretending. You become more and more artificial, phony, jealous, mean. The jealous man lives in hell. (…) Grow up; become a more and more authentic individual.

The sannyasin is one who knows that he knows not; the sannyasin is one whose commitment is not to truth, but to the enquiry into truth. And the enquiry is possible only with someone who knows, who has arrived. The sannyasin is someone who is committed to the person, or to the non-person, around whom he feels the vibe of truth, the vibe of authenticity. (…) To be a disciple means to be ready to learn, ready to go into the unknown with someone who has been in it. Alone, very rarely one has attained to truth. Not that it has not happened – alone, also, it has happened, but very rarely, just an exception; otherwise one has to learn in communion with the Master. Then too, it does not happen easily. It is an arduous journey. Dropping the clinging to the known is not easy. That is our whole investment; that is our whole identity. Dropping the clinging to the known is dropping the ego, is committing a kind of spiritual suicide. (…) If you are really committed to truth, you are bound to become a sannyasin.

If you sit by my side, slowly, slowly, your mind will start dispersing like the morning mist. Slowly, slowly, a silence will start penetrating you – not of your doing, but coming on its own. A stillness will pervade you. And the moment you are utterly still, not even a thought moving inside you, that is the moment of illumination.

Organized religion tried to destroy science. It was unable to do it – because you cannot destroy truth, and science was truer, as far as the objective world is concerned, than religion. In fact, religion has no authority to say anything about the objective world.

The thirst for power is unlimited; it knows no end. And people are thirsty for power because deep down, they are empty. Somehow they want to stuff that emptiness with something – it may be money, power, prestige, respectability, character, virtue. Anything will do; they want to stuff their inner emptiness. There are only two types of people in the world: those who try to stuff their inner emptiness, and those who try to see the inner emptiness. (…) Meditation is looking into your emptiness, welcoming it, enjoying it, being one with it. There is no need to fill it, because it is already full.

Celebrate life, and all kind of obsessions disappear automatically. And when they go on their own accord, they leave no scratches; they leave no wounds behind; they leave no trace behind.

Wisdom is not knowledge. Knowledge comes from without; wisdom wells up within. Knowledge is borrowed; wisdom is original. Wisdom is your insight into existence. (…) The reflection of that which is, with no dust of knowledge on the mirror of the soul, is wisdom. (…) Wisdom is true knowledge.

"I am not". When I say this, I mean that there is no personality, no person, but just a presence. And the presence without the person looks almost like an absence. It is. The person is absent. I am a hollow bamboo, and if you hear some music, then it must be from God; it is not from me, it has nothing to do with me. I am not there; I have utterly disappeared.

How can I show you Zen, unless you first empty your cup? – Even an empty cup won't do; the cup has to be broken completely. Even empty, if you are there, then you are full. Even emptiness fills you. If you feel that you are empty, you are not empty at all; you are there. Only the name has changed; now you call yourself emptiness. The empty cup won't do at all; it has to be broken completely. Only when you are not can the tea be poured into you. (…) When you are not, the whole existence begins pouring.

Every man in his own way is a professor, professes his ideas, believes in them. (…) Every man carries his own philosophy, his own argument. (…) When you argue, you assert. Assertion is violence, aggression, and the truth cannot be known by an aggressive mind; truth cannot be discovered by aggression. You can come to know the truth only when you are in love. But love never argues.

Every mind is qualitatively the same: mind thinks, argues, collects and gathers knowledge, and becomes dull. Only children are intelligent. And if you can retain your childhood, if you continuously reclaim your childhood, you will remain innocent and intelligent.

The more philosophies you have, the farther away you are from the Divine. The religious mind is a non-philosophical mind. A religious mind is an innocent, intelligent mind. The mirror is clear; the dust has not been gathered; and every day a continuous cleaning goes on. That's what I call meditation.

Mind is a question-creating mechanism. Feed anything into it, out comes a question, and many questions follow. Give an answer to it, and immediately it converts it into many questions. You are here filled with many questions; your cup is already full; (…) you are already overflowing. (…) I will not give you any answers. All questions, all answers are useless, just a waste of energy. But I can transform you, and that is the only answer. And that one answer solves all questions.

You are so full with yourself and with rubbish and all types of paraphernalia which you have gathered in many, many lives, you cannot even enter into yourself; there is no room, no space. You live just outside of your own being, just on the steps. You cannot enter within yourself; everything is blocked.

No, an empty cup I won't allow, because if the cup is there, you will fill it. You are so addicted and you have become so habituated that you cannot allow the cup to be empty even for a single moment. The moment you see emptiness anywhere, you start filling it. You are so scared of emptiness, you are so afraid; emptiness appears like death. You will fill it with anything, but you will fill it. No, I have invited you to be here to break down this cup, so that even if you want to, you cannot refill it. Emptiness means that there is no cup left. (…) Emptiness means surrender.

All that can be destroyed is just the rubbish that you have gathered. All that can be destroyed is something that is not you. When it is all destroyed, then you will feel that you are indestructible; you are deathless. Passing through death, consciously passing through death, one becomes aware of life eternal.

The flame of bliss is just near the corner. Once glimpsed, that flame becomes yours. Life will push you in many ways to have a glimpse of it. If you miss, you will be responsible, no one else. The river is flowing, but if you cannot bow down, if you cannot come down from your egoistic state of mind, you may go back thirsty. Don't blame the river. The river was there, but you were paralyzed by your ego. (…) Empty the cup; (…) empty the mind. (…) when ego is overflowing, nothing can be done. The whole existence is around you, but nothing can be done. From nowhere can the Divine penetrate you; you have created such a citadel. Empty the cup, or rather, throw the cup completely. (…) be so empty that you don't even have the feeling that "I am empty".

Life is a mystery. (…) If you are wise, this will be the first realization: life cannot be understood; life cannot be solved. (…) Understanding is impossible. Only this much can be understood, that understanding is impossible. (…) Mind is maya; mind is illusion, just a dream, just a projection… a soap bubble floating on a river. (…) It is just a bubble; prick it, and the mind disappears.

When health is there, disease disappears; when silence is there, mind disappears. Silence is the inner health; mind is the inner disturbance. (…) there cannot be any silent mind. (…) When you awaken, you don't achieve an awakened state of mind; you achieve a state of no-mind.

When I say 'my work is done', I mean I am finished with any seeking; I mean I have come to realize that there is nothing left to be realized, nothing to be known, nowhere to go. This moment is enough; this moment is eternity. When I say 'my work is done', I mean now there is no desire. (…) And when I say 'my business is finished', I am finished, because I can exist only with the business.

Desire is business. You have to do something; only then will you be happy. (…) That is the difference between happiness and bliss. Happiness is caused; (…) it comes from the outside; it can be lost; it can be taken away. It is caused, and that which is caused cannot be forever. (…) Bliss is uncaused; it is simply beyond; it cannot be destroyed.

Buddha lived for forty years after he became enlightened. After his business was finished, he lived for forty years more. (…) The body became irrelevant, but it continued; it completed its cycle. (…) When there is no desire, how can the body continue? There is something very deep to be understood. Desire is just a form of energy. That's why you can turn one desire into another. Anger can become sex; sex can become anger. Sex can become greed; so whenever you find a very greedy person, he will be less sexual. If he is really perfectly greedy, he will not be sexual at all. He will be a brahmachari, a celibate, because the whole energy has moved into greed. And if you find a very sexual person, you will always find he is not greedy, because nothing is left. If you see a person who has suppressed his sex, he will be angry; the whole sex energy has become anger. (…) These are forms; life is the energy. What happens when all desires disappear? Energy cannot disappear; energy is indestructible. (…) All forms disappeared, so what became of that energy? (…) That energy becomes compassion, karuna. (…) Compassion is not a form. You cannot cultivate compassion. (…) Only when all your desires disappear does that energy become compassion. (…) Desire has a motivation in it, a goal; compassion is non-motivated. There is no goal to it; it is simply overflowing energy. (…) I am not doing anything for you, for that too is sort of egoistic. (…) It is happening. The form of desires disappears, and energy becomes compassion.

I am simply here. You are initiated not by me, but by the energy itself.

Buddha said ‘no’; (…) Shankara said ‘yes’; (…) both mean the same. Each language, each pattern of expression, has its own benefits and its own dangers and pitfalls. (…) Your desire is positive. If God is asserted in a positive way, your desire will not die; your desire will turn towards God, and you will start desiring God. Negativity is to say ‘no’ to all your desires, to all your objects of desire. Then all desire and all objects disappear, and only you are left in your purity.

Your whole energy is moving in activity, is being dissipated into the world. (…) each thought takes energy, needs energy. You are continuously thinking and dissipating energy for nothing – just dissipating energy. (…) You are leaking from everywhere. That’s why you feel so weak, so frustrated, so impotent. This impotence feels like helplessness; you are omnipotent, and you feel impotent. You have all the sources of infinite energy within you, you are related to the cosmic source, but you feel impotent because you are continuously dissipating energy. (…) If there is a movement from activity to no-activity, from thought to no-thought, from mind to no-mind, you become a pillar of energy, a flame of energy. Everything becomes conscious inside; everything is lighted; your whole being is filled with light. (…) Here open the doors of heaven. Silence is the door. Inner peace is the door. Non-violence is the door. Love and compassion are the doors.

Heaven and hell are within you. The doors are very close: with the right hand, you can open one; with the left hand, you can open another. (…) whenever you are unconscious, whenever you act unconsciously, without awareness, you are in hell; whenever you are conscious, whenever you act with full awareness, you are in heaven. If this awareness becomes so integrated, so consolidated, that you never lose it, there is no hell for you; if unconsciousness becomes so consolidated, so integrated, that you never lose it, there is no heaven. Fortunately, unconsciousness can never become so consolidated – a part always remains conscious. When your whole being seems to be unconscious, even then a witnessing part always remains conscious. Even while asleep, a part is witnessing; (…) a part is continuously alert. (…) You cannot become completely unconscious. (…) To make a distinction between the momentary heaven and the eternal heaven, Hindus have a different word: moksha. (…) Hindus say naraka for hell, swarga for heaven, and moksha – beyond both. (…) Hindus say heaven is not worth achieving; it can be lost. When the state of heaven becomes permanent, when it cannot be lost, it is moksha; it is absolute freedom. The bliss has become your nature, and heaven and hell have disappeared. (…) you cannot reach the third state if you are flickering, if you are wavering between heaven and hell; then nothing can be consolidated, integrated; there is no crystallization. Then you live in a flux; your being is liquid. Sometimes it moves to heaven; sometimes it moves to hell. Crystallization means you become more and more conscious; you become more and more centered, more and more grounded; less asleep, you become more aware.

You dream only because you carry a burden, only because the day is incomplete. (…) You looked at a woman, you desired her, but it was not possible. (…) You must make love to this woman, if not in reality, then in the dream; only then will you feel at ease. The incomplete act becomes a burden; then your sleep is disturbed. A Buddha sleeps dreamlessly, because nothing in him is incomplete. There is no desire, no passion. Nothing arises, and nothing remains. Things pass as if in front of a mirror; things pass, and the mirror is vacant again. There is no trace, no mark. (…) When the mind is silent, not dreaming, only the body sleeps; consciousness remains alert. (…) A yogi's consciousness needs no relaxation; it is always relaxed; there is no tension. Relaxation is needed because of tension. You are so tense the whole day, your consciousness has to be relaxed. A yogi's body relaxes because the body gets tired. His body is a mechanism; his consciousness is always alert, continuously alert. It is a continuum of alertness. When there are no gaps in consciousness, when there is no darkness within you, your whole inner temple has become enlightened. The light has reached to every corner; no part of your inner house is in darkness. You are a mukta, a free man. (…) You are Christ arisen, resurrected.

Be rooted in the earth so that you can stretch to the sky; be rooted in the visible so that you can reach into the invisible. Don't create duality, and don't create any antagonism. (…) I am against being against anything; I am for the Whole, the complete circle. The world and God are not divided anywhere. (…) Everything is related, joined together. This world does not exist in fragments; it exists as a Whole, one Whole. To me, "this" plus "that" is God: (…) roots into this earth, into all that is earthly, and wings into that you cannot even comprehend, that which cannot be conceptualized. Roots into the finite; wings into the Infinite… (…) Your so-called monks destroy their roots because they are against this earth, and then their flowering stops. (…) Their eyes are dull and dead; they are uprooted trees. (…) Look, and always try to find the unity. In unity is religion; in disunity religion is lost. And avoid being against. If you are against, you will become rigid, hard, and the harder you become, the more dead you will be.

When your mind is fresh, the whole existence becomes a melody. When you are fresh, freshness is everywhere, and the whole existence responds.

It depends on you. If you are being overpowered by the past, then you will delay, postpone, and you can delay for many lives. (…) Look at the tricks of the mind, the deceptions of the mind; look into them. (…) Just keep yourself out of the way, that's all.

When you seek a result, it is the mind; when you don't seek a result, it is meditation.

The whole of life has become an institution, a madhouse in which duties are to be fulfilled, not love. (…) I call a man a sannyasin who breaks out of these institutions and lives spontaneously. To be a sannyasin is the most courageous act possible. To be a sannyasin means to live without the mind, and the moment you live without the mind, you live without the society. The mind has created society, and society has created the mind; they are interdependent. To be a sannyasin means to renounce all that is false, but not to renounce the world; to renounce all that is unauthentic; to be real. (…) This is difficult. There is so much investment in falsity, in the masks, in the faces, in the games you go on playing. To be initiated as a sannyasin means, now you will try to be authentic, whatsoever the consequences – you will accept them and live in the present. You will sacrifice the future for the present; you will never sacrifice the present for the future. This moment will be the totality of your being; you will never move beforehand. This is what sannyas is – to kick the pot and walk out, and not to wait for the results. Results will take care of themselves; they will follow.

Your clothes, your food, your habits of life, your style are not going to help anything. These things will not make much of a difference. (…) The inner change is the first thing, and everything else is just a consequence. If you reverse the order, you will miss – then, you will become an addict.

When you drop something by fight, it is never dropped.

When the mind sees that now awareness is reaching a crystallization, and that when crystallized, the mind will not have any say, the mind will be dropped, this is its last struggle – suddenly the mind creates sex and the desire for sex; the mind projects. (…) The mind will play other tricks and always preserve sex as the last resort. If sex cannot work, then nothing can work. The mind depends basically on sex. (…) That's why all religions insist so much on transcending sex. Unless you transcend sex, the mind will play the last trick, and it will be the winner, not you. (…) Sooner or later, the whole sex energy becomes meditative energy; then you have transcended. Then, whether you stand in the market or sit in a forest, apsaras, nymphs from heaven, cannot come to you. They may be passing on the street, but they will be there no more for you.

In the moment of death, you are preparing for a re-entry, for entering the womb. (…) Sex means the urge to penetrate the feminine body, to enter again into the womb. They are both the same; whether you enter as a seed or whether you enter in a sex act, the urge is to enter. At the moment of death, sex must come into the mind, and if it comes, you have missed. You have created desire, and now this desire will lead you again into another womb.

A deep surrender is needed; before that nothing can be done. You have to die, die as you are, so that which you really are can be born out of you. You have to die as an appearance, so that the real can be born. You have to die on the periphery, so that the center evolves and comes out in its luminousness, in its full perfection.

To be a warrior is a quality of the mind, (…) the quality which can stake everything this way or that – a non-compromising mind. (…) The warrior is facing, encountering the enemy, face to face. (…) Thinking stops; when swords are drawn, thinking stops. (…) They move spontaneously; they become no-minds. (…) A warrior is after a peak, after a peak of experiencing. (…) Lose it, this is the way to preserve it; die, that is the way to reach eternal life. (…) To move in the darkness of the unknown, the unknowable, to move in that uncharted place without any maps and without any pathways, to move alone into that absolute, the quality of the warrior is needed.

Burn the books and be authentic. (…) Yes, truth liberates, but never borrowed truth. (…) With another's enquiry, your own search becomes false. The first thing to remember is: the question must be yours. Then, the second thing to remember is: the answer must be yours. (…) The doors open for the individual, because the individual is the authentic reality. (…) You have to pay the cost; you have to carry your own cross; you have to be crucified through suffering – your suffering, remember. Neither Jesus' suffering, nor anybody else's suffering will open the doors. They are closed, and you cannot enter just following Jesus. (…) Nobody can enter that way; nobody can enter in such an easy way. (…) Throw away all the maps; you are the goal.

Words are valuable because you have not known the value of being.

Rules of the world, then rules of sannyas, and then comes a no-rule state.

Your enlightenment is perfect only when silence has become a celebration. (…) A deep gratitude must be shown towards the Whole just for the opportunity that you are, that you can meditate, that you can be silent.

The morning sets the pattern for the whole day; (…) the last thought in the evening becomes the pattern for the whole night. Hence, all religions insist on at least two prayers – one in the morning, one in the night. (…) So pray at least twice a day.

Society exists as a hypnotic state, and the crowd is a hypnotizing factor. (…) This must be part of your alertness, that you should not be befooled by others. The whole society exists on exploitation, exploiting the other. Everybody is exploiting, and this exploitation is not only in the market – it is in the temple, in the church, in the synagogue… because the priest is also a businessman, and the pope is a super-businessman. (…) Maharishi Mahesh Yogi talks as if the inner silence can be purchased immediately, as if within a week you can find meditation; just by sitting for fifteen minutes and repeating a mantra, you will be happy forever and ever. (…) Meditation cannot be purchased, and no one can give it to you. You have to achieve it. It is not something outer; it is something inner, a growth; and that growth comes through awareness.

It is consciousness that you are built with; this house, this consciousness is not you. And this mind also is not you.

Meditation means no-mind – no past, no future, no present… just eternity, a pure mirror which reflects the Whole and which is not scratched by anything, just as the sky is not scratched by the clouds passing by. (…) Emptiness simply means the pure, unclouded sky of your consciousness.

In existence, there is no effort; there is no intention. (…) Everything is happening silently on its own accord.

Consciousness without thinking; that's what awareness is. Being alert and with no thought.

Thinking cannot be stopped. Not that it does not stop, but it cannot be stopped. (…) No-mind does not arise by stopping thinking. When the thinking is no more, no-mind is. The very effort to stop thinking will create more anxiety; it will create conflict; it will make you split. You will be in a constant turmoil within. This is not going to help. And even if you succeed in stopping it forcibly for a few moments, it is not an achievement at all, (…) because a forced stillness is not silence. Underneath it, deep in the unconscious, the repressed mind goes on working. (…) So what to do? (…) Watch; don't try to stop. (…) Just be a witness, and the mind stops of its own accord. (…) There is no need to do any action against the mind. (…) It will be mind fighting mind itself. You will divide your mind in two – one part that is trying to boss over, kill off the other part, which is absurd. It is a foolish game; it can drive you crazy. (…) And don't look at the mind like an enemy. (…) Watching the mind means: look at it with deep love, with deep respect, reverence; it is God's gift to you. Nothing is wrong with the mind in itself. It is a beautiful process as other processes are. Clouds move in the sky; thoughts move in the inner sky. (…) Look with deep reverence. Don't be a fighter; be a lover. (…) Attachment is the food for the mind to continue. Non-attached witnessing is the way to stop the mind without any effort to stop it. And when you start enjoying those blissful moments, your capacity to retain them for longer periods arises. Finally, eventually, one day, you become master. Then, when you want to think, you think; if thought is needed, you use it; if thought is not needed, you allow it to rest.

No-mind is not against mind; no-mind is beyond mind. No-mind does not come by killing or destroying the mind; no-mind comes when you have understood the mind so totally that thinking is no longer needed – your understanding has replaced it.

Meditation is not an effort against the mind. It is a way of understanding the mind. It is a very loving way of witnessing the mind; one has to be very patient. (…) Mind is a bridge between the body and the soul, between the world and God.

You have not given mind a rest; hence mind becomes mediocre. Continuously used, tired, it goes on and on and on. Day it works; night it works. In the day you think; in the night you dream. Day in, day out, it goes on working. If you live for seventy or eighty years, it will be continuously working. (...) This mind that you are carrying in your head has arisen over centuries, millennia. Your small mind carries the whole experience of humanity, and not only humanity: of animals, of birds, of plants, of rocks. You have passed through all those experiences. All that has happened up to now has happened in you also. In a very small nutshell, you carry the whole experience of existence. That's what your mind is. In fact, to say it's yours is not right; it belongs to all of us.

The man of awareness and understanding moves from the periphery to the center, from the center to the periphery. He never gets fixated anywhere. From the marketplace to the monastery, from sansar to sannyas, from being extrovert to being introvert – he continuously goes on moving, because these are his two wings. They are not against each other; they have to be balanced in opposite directions; (…) they belong to the same bird; they serve the same bird. Your outside and your inside are your wings; this has to be deeply remembered. (…) Being either fixated in the marketplace, or escaping out of the world – with one wing, frustration is bound to come. (…) I am neither for this nor for that. I would like you to become so capable that you can remain in the marketplace and yet be meditative. (…) Relate with others, but relate with your own being also. (…) Go out fearlessly, but don't get lost. (…) Don't lose contact with your inner center as you move on the periphery.

Each moment is both: work and worship, work and rest. (…) Hindus call it leela, God's play. It means He is resting, and at the same time He is doing. (…) a real man of understanding becomes godly – he is in the world, and yet he remains out of it; he is on the periphery, and yet he remains mindful of his center. Doing a thousand things, he remains a non-doer. In tremendous activities, he is never lost. His inner light burns bright.

Looking for God is already prejudiced. If you are looking for God, you will never find Him – because looking means you have a certain fixed concept already of who God is. And your idea is bound to be either Christian or Judaic or Hindu or Mohammedan. (…) Your concept of God is bound to be rooted in ignorance, borrowed. At the most, it is just belief; you have been conditioned for it. (…) your eyes are already corrupted. (…) Seeing is just clarity – open eyes, open mind, open heart. Not looking for something in particular; just ready and receptive. (…) Seeing is nude. And you can come to truth only when you are absolutely nude; when you have discarded all clothes, all philosophies, all theologies, all religions; when you have dropped all that has been given to you; when you come empty-handed, not knowing in any way. When you come with knowledge, you come already corrupted. When you come in innocence, knowing that you don't know, then the doors are open; then you will be able to know. Only that person who has no knowledge is capable of knowing.

Seeing is knowing. Trust only seeing, nothing else. Unless you have seen, all your beliefs are just useless. And when one has seen, there is no need for belief. When one knows, one knows; the question of belief does not arise. The ignorant man belives; the man of wisdom knows. Become a knower by becoming a seer.

When you are meditating, always remember that the periphery is not to be lost permanently. You have to come back to the periphery again and again, so the route remains clear and the path remains there. Hence my insistence to meditate, but not to renounce the world. Meditate in the morning, and then go to the market; meditate in the morning, and then go to your office. (…) Don't create a dichotomy; don't create any conflict. (…) Meditation is an introversion; it leads you to your center, and there is a danger that you become too much attached to this introversion. (…) If you lose your elasticity and you become incapable of coming back to the periphery, then sooner or later you will lose all contact with the periphery. (…) go on moving from the center to the periphery, from the periphery to the center. They are enriching to each other; they are enhancing each other. (…) understand the rhythm of the polar opposites. (…) Remember: life is a rhythm between day and night, summer and winter. It is a continuous rhythm. Never stop anywhere! Be moving! And the bigger the swing, the deeper your experience will be. So make it a point that you have to be continuously journeying; you have to travel. (…) Live in the world, walk in the marketplace like a Buddha. (…) In different situations, with different people, in different worlds, move… and gather all this richness and awareness and alertness and consciousness. Then go back to the center and take all this awareness with you, and your meditation will be deeper and richer for that. And this has to go on continuously. Pour your center on the periphery, and pour your periphery on the center. Pour your love in your meditation, and pour your meditation in your love. This is what I teach. This is what I call a dynamic life. And a religious life is a dynamic life.

Knowing is a process; knowledge is a conclusion. (…) Knowing always becomes knowledge, and you have to be alert not to allow it, (…) because the moment you have known something, the mind collects it as knowledge, as experience. (…) All knowing becomes knowledge. The moment it becomes knowledge, drop it. It is just like dust gathers on the mirror; every day you have to clean it. On the mirror of your mind, dust gathers, dust of experience; it becomes knowledge. Clean it. That's why every day meditation is needed. Meditation is nothing but cleaning the mirror of your mind. Clean it continuously! If you can clean it every moment of your life, then there is no need to sit separately for meditation.

God is not cheap. You will have to pay with your whole being. Only when you have paid totally and you are not holding back anything and you are not a miser, and you have sacrificed and surrendered yourself totally, will you attain. God comes to you when you are not; when you have become just a zero, God comes to you. He is just waiting by the corner. The moment you become empty, He rushes towards you; He comes and fulfills you.

The sun represents life, passion, longing, adventure, going out, spreading. The moon represents a totally different dimension, a higher dimension: coolness, collectedness, a gathering together, a silence. Many people would like to have a love which is cool, serene, but you cannot simply go into it unless you have lived love with heat. So the sun energy has to be used as a stepping stone towards the moon energy. (…) Only when one has known the other in all its possible expressions can one have a return journey, becomes one worthy of returning. And when one returns, the circle is perfect. Then there is silence and quietude and serenity. And that cool love is the ultimate phenomenon. But you have to live the first part first. (…) Love passionately; love tremendously; love totally.

Our whole civilization is head-oriented; it has been so down the ages. And now, we have come to a critical point where a decision has to be made. If man remains still head-oriented, then except for suicide, there is no other possibility; there is no hope. The head has come to its very end; it cannot take man beyond. It is finished; it has come to a cul-de-sac. The only hope for man is to start looking into the ways of the heart.

If the student moves rightly, he will become a disciple; if the disciple moves rightly, he will become a devotee. (…) To be a devotee is to bloom. (…) The student only collects information about truth. The disciple collects a few fragments of truth. The devotee drinks it in its totality.

Remember, human happiness is not worth much. It is momentary; it is more or less a kind of forgetfulness. Life is full of miseries; in the moment of happiness, you forget those miseries – but they don't go away. Once the moment of happiness has passed, they will be back again, and with a vengeance, and the moment of happiness will leave you in a kind of deep frustration. You cannot hold onto it; there is no way to keep it forever. By the very nature of things, human happiness can only be momentary, because in life everything is a flux; nothing ever abides in time. Divine happiness is that happiness which comes but never goes. It is not of time; it is part of eternity. And when you are really happy, not in a momentary way, the blessing has happened. Now one can feel the blessing of being alive, and because of that feeling, one can bless the whole existence too. (…) Sannyas is nothing else but the search for divine happiness and blessing.

Right-mindfulness means not doing anything mechanically, but doing it with full awareness. (…) act with awareness, alertness, watchfulness; always be in a kind of witnessing. (…) That is mindfulness. (…) Use it as much as you can; you cannot use it in excess. And the more you use it, the more you will find a great integrity arising in you. Something starts centering at the deepest core of your being; you become crystallized.

A new name has tremendous significance. The old name contains all your past; it is the very center around which your whole past is arranged. Once the old name is dropped, the whole past disappears. A discontinuity is created, and to be discontinuous with the past is a great leap, because then you can be in the present.

A man is born to be great music, a great song. But one has to remember that birth is not life. Birth only gives the opportunity to be alive or not to be alive. If you use it rightly, you will attain to life. If you don't use it rightly, you will simply live in boredom, in anguish, somehow dragging the weight; there will be no dance to your feet; there will be no song in your heart; and you will not be able to offer anything to God.

Something of the fight in me has gone, but I also feel dead a lot… a lack of enthusiasm. This doesn't seem right and that doesn't seem right. I don't seem to have any heart anymore. – Nothing to be worried about; this space will pass. It always comes; it is a transitory period. When all that you have known becomes meaningless and that which is meaningful has yet to be known, between these two, this space comes. It is nothing to be worried about.

Prayer is not something formal; it can never be formal. (…) Love is the only true prayer.

Words are heavy; they cannot go very far into the sky. Words are continuously being pulled by the gravitation of the earth; they belong to the earth. But silence is something of the beyond. The moment you are silent, you are no more here on the earth; you are already in paradise.

To believe is to live in a lie, to be insincere, dishonest. (…) The real seeker has to be an agnostic. The beginning of real seeking cannot be rooted in belief or disbelief. One has to be utterly open; (…) one should start without any conclusion, unprejudiced. Only then can one move into truth and one day come to know it.

The change from mind to no-mind is the only revolution there is.

A religion has to be life-affirmative; it has to root itself in the earth. It is God's world, his creation. It has to be appreciated in thankfulness, in gratitude. (…) Say yes as totally as possible.

Truth always comes from the beyond. We cannot manufacture it; we cannot cultivate it; and that is the beauty of it.

The only way to become really whole is to make the unconscious conscious; and that is the whole work of meditation.

Words have to be dropped; the inner talk has to be stopped. (…) Prayer has to be a silent communion. The best way is to be utterly quiet, to bow down in silence.

Only one thing can bring contentment, and that is becoming aware of who you are. The moment you become aware of who you are, immediately all the mysteries of existence are open to you. The whole kingdom is yours, and has always been yours. Then something happens which is going to abide with you; even death cannot take it away. A man is fulfilled only when he has come to something which cannot be taken away.

When I am meditating, there is much noise. It's as if my mind is becoming stronger and stronger. – It is not becoming stronger. You are becoming more aware of it; hence it looks as if it is becoming stronger. One has to become aware of it; only then can it go. Ordinarily, we are oblivious to it. It goes on there like an undercurrent; at the back it continues. (…) Only when you are meditating will you become aware of this noise; (…) your depth of awareness will bring the whole of your mind in front of you. (…) Then one day suddenly, the mind starts going away.

Ten years of dreams in the forest! – because a meditator does not just one day become a meditator; dreams follow, for years. Even if you go in the deepest forest, those dreams haunt you. But slowly, slowly, those dreams settle down, because there is no point. You are no more interested in them; you simply sit there watching.

In Zen, there is not much to a biography. What is important is that the man has become an eternal flame, that the man has achieved his ultimate potential, that his blue lotus has blossomed.

Always move into unity with the cosmos; dichotomy is division.

The Master behaves with the meditative man in a different way, because with the first, who lives in disidentification, communion is possible; with the second, who lives in identification, communication is possible.

I am against all kinds of habits. Good or bad is not the point – there is no good habit as such; there is no bad habit as such. Habits are all bad, because habit means that something unconscious has become a dominating factor in your life, has become decisive. You are no more the deciding factor. The response is not coming out of awareness, but out of a pattern, structure, that you have learned in the past.

Anything that the society respects becomes a nourishment for your ego. And people are ready to do any stupid thing. The only joy is that it will bring respectability.

I have never seen anybody arriving at truth by self-cultivation. In fact, the people who go for self-cultivation are not very intelligent people, because they have missed the most fundamental insight, that we are not going anywhere, that God is not something to be achieved. Nothing has to be achieved; God is already in you. (…) The function of the Master is to remind you, not to give you a path, but to give you a remembrance; not to give you methods of cultivation, a character, virtue, but only awareness, intelligence, awakening. In a single moment it can be attained, because you have never lost it in first place. You are dreaming that you are unenlightened. (…) One moment you can be in heaven; another moment you can be in hell. It all depends on you. It is something to do with your psyche; it is not something outside you.

Do you know how long past karma is? It is eternity! And if you are to get rid of all past karma, you are never going ot get rid of it – that much is certain. And meanwhile, you will be creating other karmas, and the past will go on becoming bigger and bigger every day. If that is the only way out – that one has to get rid of all past karmas – then there is no possibility of enlightenment. Then there has never been any Buddha and there is never going to be any Buddha; it is impossible. Just think of all the past lives and all the karmas that you have built up – first you have to get rid of them. And how are you going to get rid of them? In trying to get rid of them, you will have to create new karmas. And this is a vicious circle. (…) That is the essential message of Zen: that you need not be worried about the past karmas; they were all dream acts. Just wake up, and they are all finished. (…) The moment you are awake, you are out of all those dreams – they are finished! There is no question of getting rid of them.

Religion is experience – for the simple reason that its whole concern is your interiority, your subjectivity, which is available only to you and to nobody else. You cannot invite even your beloved into your inner being. There you are utterly alone – and there resides the truth.

Spirituality is something that happens to individuals. It is the individual becoming aflame with God. It has nothing to do with any collectivity – nation, race, church.

The earth is our home, and we have to be earthly. A real spirituality must be rooted in earthliness. Any spirituality that denies the earth, rejects the earth, becomes abstract, becomes airy-fairy. It has no more blood in it; it is no more alive.

Buddha or Christ cannot be created, and they cannot be developed. They have to be discovered; they have to be uncovered; they are already there. (…) They are your intrinsic nature. (…) You just have to reach your innermost core and you will find the Buddha enshrined; you will find the Christ. Christ and Buddha mean the same; the ultimate state of consciousness.

I know Jesus because I know meditation. My knowing of Jesus is not through the Bible; it is not through Christian theology. I know Jesus directly. I know Jesus because I know myself; that's my way of knowing all the Buddhas. The moment you know your own Buddhahood, you have known all the Buddhas; the experience is the same. All differences are in the mind; the moment you transcend the mind, there are no differences left. (…) When there are clouds in the sky, then each cloud is different, but when there are no clouds at all, then the sky is one and the same.

Jesus is a way, but the way has to be walked.

I don't teach tolerance. I teach freedom from all the nonsense of being Hindu, Mohammedan, Christian. Be free from all prejudices. (…) Drop all the nonsense; be free.

All gods are false. They are bound to be false, because they are answers to certain questions – and questions are false, questioning is false, and the gods are answers to certain questions. (…) The very premise was false; hence the conclusion is false. (…) That's how stupidities are perpetuated for centuries. Ask a question, and somebody is bound to supply an answer. If nobody supplies one, you are going to invent one yourself. (…) all gods have been created in the same way, and all the scriptures too – just to console you, just to keep you in a false state of knowledge, because you are so afraid of being ignorant.

All knowledge is untrue; all wisdom is true. (…) The Buddha talking to his disciples is talking wisdom, but the moment it reaches the disciples, it becomes knowledge. Wisdom falls from its heights to the level of the listeners and becomes knowledge. Hence Buddhas have always been very much aware that they impart something of their presence, something of their silence, something of their joy, rather than imparting their wisdom. Even if they have to talk, they talk only to persuade you to be silent. Even if they use words, those words are used to create a wordless state of consciousness in you.

Mind is interested in knowledge, not in wisdom; for wisdom, you will have to create a space called no-mind. (…) Sannyas is a suicide of the mind; so is meditation; so is wisdom. These are names for different aspects of the same phenomenon.

In the hands of a meditative person, words can become of infinite value, because they can be indicators. But in the hands of non-meditators, words are dangerous, very dangerous, because the spirit is completely missed, and one starts believing in the hollow, empty word, and one starts following the word. That is what is happening to the Christians, to the Hindus, to the Mohammedans, to the Jainas, to the Buddhists – all are believers in words. Somebody believes in the Koran, and somebody in the Gita, and somebody in the Bible, and they all are missing the spirit. Because to know the spirit of the Bible, you will have to come to certain inner spaces where you become acquainted with Moses, with Jesus… Unless you have direct, inner contact with Moses and Jesus, you will not understand the Bible. (…) Wisdom is an interior phenomenon. It is the discovery of the spirit of all the Buddhas.

There is no personality. Personality as such is false. (…) All masks are false. You can wear a beautiful mask or an ugly mask; it doesn't make any difference. The real thing is your essence. (…) Enlightenment is the dropping of the personality.

The primitive people cannot become enlightened. They are beautiful, spontaneous, natural, but utterly unaware of what they are; they don't have any awareness. They live joyously, but their joy is unconscious. First, they have to lose it. They have to become civilized, educated, knowledgeable; they have to become a culture, a civilization, a religion. They have to lose all their spontaneity; they have to forget all about their essence – and then, suddenly, one day, they start missing it. It is bound to happen. That is happening all over the world, and it is happening in such great measure because this is for the first time that humanity has really become civilized. The more civilized a country, the more is the feeling of meaninglessness. The backward countries still don't have that feeling; they can't have. To have that feeling of inner unhappiness, meaninglessness, absurdity, one has to become very civilized. Hence I am all in favor of science, because it helps the fish to be thrown on the shore. And once on the hot shore, in the hot sand, the fish starts feeling thirsty. It had never felt thirsty before. For the first time, it misses the ocean around, the coolness, the life-giving waters. It is dying. That is the situation of the civilized man, the educated man: he is dying. Great enquiry is born. One wants to know what should be done, how one can enter into the ocean of life again. (…) many Western intellectuals have committed suicide; (…) it is a very common phenomenon in the West; many intellectuals have gone mad. The real intellectuals have almost inevitably gone mad; it is their life experience. The civilization around, the over-developed personality, have become an imprisonment. They are killed by it. The very weight of civilization is too much and unbearable. They are feeling suffocated; they can't breathe. Even suicide seems to be a liberation, or if they cannot commit suicide, then madness seems to be an escape. At least by becoming mad, one forgets all about civilization; one forgets all about the nonsense that goes on in the name of civilization. Madness is an escape from civilization. (…) primitive people don't go mad. It is only the civilized man's privilege. Primitive people don't commit suicide; again, it is the civilized man's privilege. But to feel that life is utterly meaningless is to be on a crossroads – either you choose suicide, or you choose sannyas; either you choose madness, or you choose meditation. It is a great turning point.

In a better society, we will give children personalities, but also the capacity to get rid of them. That is what is missing right now; we give them personalities, too tight personalities, so that they become encapsulated, imprisoned, and we never give them a way to get rid of them. (…) Civilization should not become a tight enclosure.

It is absolutely necessary that you should have a personality, but you should have a personality which can be put on and off easily, just like loose garments. (…) That's what I call a man of understanding: he who lives in his essence, but as far as the society is concerned moves with a personality. He uses the personality; he is the master of his own being. (…) One should be natural, and by being natural, I mean one should be capable of putting on the personality when needed, in society. It functions like a lubricant, it helps, because there are thousands of people. Lubricants are needed, otherwise people will be constantly in conflict, clashing against each other. Lubricants help; they keep your life smooth. Personality is good when you are communicating with others, but personality is a barrier when you start communing with yourself. Personality is good when you are relating with human beings; personality is a barrier when you start relating with existence itself, with God.

Personality is also a necessary part of growth. (…) Unless you have a personality, you cannot drop it. Unless you have a properly developed mind, you cannot enter into the state of no-mind. Unless you have an ego, well-formed, mature, you cannot surrender. (…) First, the ego has to be developed. But the ego should be developed and side by side, another thing has to be developed – the capacity to drop the ego. Man has to learn this paradox, so when the need arises, you can drop the ego. Then you are always the master, and the mastery is always of the essence. But if you don't have any personality, then you will not be the master, because you don't have any slave to be the master of. (…) My vision of a right education is to teach people how to grow the ego and how to be able to drop it; how to become great minds and yet be ready any moment to put the mind aside. You should be able to just put your personality, your ego, your mind, on and off, because these are good things if you can use them. (…) Our situation is like that: our society puts on the ego, the personality, and nobody ever teaches us how to put it off. So day in, day out, we are burdened by it, tortured by it, goaded by it. We become slaves of something false.

Greed, digested well, becomes love, as far as inner alchemy is concerned. (…) That is the way to transmute lower energies into higher energies.

You are given a great opportunity. You have been expelled from the Garden of Eden – this is the opportunity. Adam can become Christ if he uses the opportunity well. (…) Don't try to destroy the animal, as your so-called saints have been doing down the ages; otherwise you will be dull and dead, insipid. Don't repress the animal, otherwise it will take revenge – the animal is the animal; one day it will jump on you with such a vengeance that you will be destroyed by it. And don't try to persuade it, because it cannot be persuaded. Its demands are infinite; its thirst cannot be quenched by anything. Give it anything, and it immediately asks for more. The "more" is its very way of living. So don't befool yourself that any indulgence or gratification will help the animal to subside and to be calmed. No, you will need great insight into the animal; you will need great acquaintance with the animal. You will need very deep awareness of the working of the animal. And you will have to digest it slowly, slowly, gradually, so that one day the animal becomes part of your being. (…) The animal has great energy; that's why it is called animal. Anima means aliveness, power, vitality; "animal" means one who is vital. The saints cut their roots from the animal; they become non-vital. (…) Rather than becoming more potent, rather than becoming omnipotent, they become impotent. Hence I am not for suppression. I am for understanding; I am for transformation. And if the animal is transformed and absorbed by the essence, you will feel great power, great fire. Your life will become such a passionate affair with existence, you will have such intensity, that each moment will give you the joy of an eternity.

Don't be a philosopher. (…) You can try anything, and you can prove anything right, and you can prove anything wrong. Something can be proved right and the same thing can be proved wrong; it all depends on what you want to prove. Logic is a whore; logic can go with anybody. So whenever someone wins in an argument, it does not prove that he has the truth; it only proves that he is more clever in logical gymnastics, that's all. (…) Slip out of the mind; be a no-mind, neither clever nor stupid. Then you will know what truth is; then you will know what bliss is.

Because your saints have condemned their natural instincts, they become unnatural, pathological. (…) they destroy their bodies. (…) Your so-called saints have created a very insane humanity. They have turned themselves insane, and they have turned you insane. And because they have to be unnatural, they are sitting on volcanoes. They have repressed all that is natural – and nature wants to assert itself. They are in a constant civil war; they are fighting with themselves. And whatsoever they are fighting with is becoming stronger every day. (…) If they repress sex, twenty-four hours of their day, there is an undercurrent of sexuality. If they fast, they think of food and nothing else. These insane people, pathological people, have been very dominant in the past.

I tell you that sleep cannot give you anything; it only promises but never delivers any goods. Sleep can give you only dreams, hallucinations; sleep cannot fulfill you.

What goes on in the name of prayer is not prayer; it is desire disguised. (…) Wherever separation disappears, prayer appears. When you become one with the whole of existence, that is prayer. Ego is a state of no-prayer; egolessness is a state of prayer. (…) In prayer, you are not; in prayer, God is.

Buddha says there is no soul, but only a continuum.

The phony sannyas is escapist; cheap it is, easy it is. (…) remaining in the world and yet not being of the world, that is true renunciation. That true renunciation comes through witnessing. It is not indifference. (…) Indifference makes you dull, makes you mediocre, makes you unintelligent. If you are indifferent, your sword will lose all sharpness. (…) indifference will make you alienated; being alienated you will feel meaningless, joyless, accidental. Feeling accidental, the desire to commit suicide will arise, is bound to arise.

God is this total existence happening. Be silent and know. There is nowhere to go; there is nothing to achieve; no ambition has to be fulfilled. (…) God has already given Himself; He lives in you; He resides in you.

The ordinary God is nothing but a projection of your fear.

The Indian trinity, Trimurti, the three faces of God, have to be understood. Brahma, Vishnu, Mahesh; these are the three faces of God. Brahma is the creator, the aspect that creates; Vishnu is the aspect that maintains the world, keeps it running; and Mahesh is the destroyer who destroys the world. (…) The Indian idea of God is total: with one hand he creates, with the other he destroys too. He is good and he is bad too; he is light and darkness both, life and death both. And if God is total, then only can God be transcendental. (…) Christians are so afraid; their God is partial. (…) The devil aspect of God has been completely denied. (…) God has to be accepted in His totality. This whole existence is divine; don't reject anything. Everything is good in its place; salt is needed as much as sweetness. (…) Life exists through polar opposites. And this has been a fallacious step, that we have chosen only one pole – God is only positive. Then the negative has to be given to some entity, some fictitious entity, the devil. There is no devil; there is no hell. (…) Accept both polarities; the negative and the positive are both needed for the world to go on. (…) Death is not against life, but in the service of life. Even what we know as bad is in the service of good. Yes, if you are wise enough, you can transform poison into medicine. And if you are foolish, even medicine can be dangerous; it can become poison. (…) God is both – the darkest depth and the lightest height.

Life is contradictory. Existence itself is possible only through contradictions. (…) Only the Whole is true; the parts are only parts. They have some meaning only in the context of the Whole; in themselves, they are meaningless. (…) The negative is the positive, and the positive is the negative. Life and death are not two sides of one coin; life is death, and day is night, and love is hate, and friendship is enmity. (…) And God is the devil – two names for the same energy, not two aspects.

With me, all is okay, third world war or no world war. If the third world war happens, I will be the same; if it does not happen, I am the same. (…) I will continue the morning discourse, the evening darshan… (…) I will go on doing my own thing, not being bothered by it at all. It does not matter.

The crowd keeps you away from yourself. The crowd is an escape from your real being. The crowd makes it possible for you to remain interested in others; it never allows you any self-encounter.

The Western religions know only two words, heaven and hell. The East has a third word also, moksha. That means absolute freedom from both heaven and hell. That means transcendence, transcending psychology, and suddenly you enter into the world of eternity. (…) Heaven and hell are not realities, but ways of living. You can live in jealousy; you can live in competition; you can live in conflict; you can live in ambition. That is the way to hell. That is how you have been brought up to live. (…) Whenever you are surrendered to existence, whenever you live in trust, love, prayer, joy, celebration, you are in heaven.

Do whatsoever you like – everything fails. And when I say everything, I mean everything. But it takes millions of lives for people to arrive at this point, because in one life, you cannot try all there is. They try a few things, they fail, but the hope remains.

Move inwards. Contentment is a quality of your center; it is not found on the circumference. Fulfillment is when you have arrived at your real, authentic being; it is not found in the ego. (…) become a Buddha… in fact, you are a Buddha, unaware of the fact. On the circumference maybe there is a great storm, just as on the surface the sea is stormy, sometimes more, sometimes less, but there are always waves, bigger or smaller; there is always turbulence, disturbance. But at the depth, there is not even a ripple; all is silence. (…) unless you grow and become a Buddha, you will be thrown back into life again and again. (…) Life is very precious; become aware; don't miss this opportunity.

People think that those who commit suicide are against life – they are not. They are too lusty for life; they have a great lust for life; and because life is not fulfilling their lust, in anger, in despair, they destroy themselves.

The first lesson here is to know that you don't know, that you are ignorant. (…) All knowledge is maya, a pseudo-coin invented by the mind. (…) All knowledge is illusory; we only think we know. (…) But we live by naming things; it gives us a false sense of security. (…) By labeling, by naming, you have not known anything. The reality remains unexplained, mysterious. (…) But the mind wants the illusion of knowledge very much; it feels at ease. (…) Mind lives in lies – old or new, but mind lives in lies, through lies; mind feeds on lies. Mind cannot encounter truth. (…) Knowledge dropped, ignorance accepted as ultimate, you become wise; you attain to the eyes of wisdom. (…) So these are the three types of people in the world: the ignorant who is trying to become knowledgeable; the knowledgeable who has forgotten his ignorance; and the wise who has dropped knowledge and has come to accept his ignorance as ultimate and is no longer making any effort to know anything whatsoever. He has come to know that nothing can be known, that knowledge is impossible, that ignorance is the very nature of existence, because it is a mystery. In his ignorance, he has become relaxed. He rests in his ignorance. He has become innocent like a child.

The masses are blind, a vast darkness all around the earth. I don't belong to the masses; I cannot. I belong to the Whole, but not to the masses. (…) I am here, available. If you have the intense desire and thirst, you can approach me. (…) Only when I feel that you are really ready to surrender, to sacrifice yourself – only when I see that truth is even more valuable to you than your life – then you belong to me. Otherwise not.

If you trust your nature, by and by, you will come closer to the cosmic nature. That is the only way. You are part of the cosmic. When you trust yourself, you have trusted the cosmic in you. Through that goes the way.

Don't accumulate anything whatsoever: power, money, prestige, virtue, knowledge, even the so-called spiritual experiences. Don't accumulate. (…) And when I say, don't accumulate, I mean it as an absolute imperative. Don't accumulate things of this world; don't accumulate virtue, knowledge, visions, so-called spiritual experiences – no. I am talking in absolute terms: don't accumulate; be poor. (…) If you don't accumulate, you are ready to die any moment. (…) The fear of death is not really fear of death; the fear of death comes out of the accumulations of life. (…) if you accumulate, with that accumulation comes fear. Each accumulation brings fear in the same proportion. Don't accumulate, and fear disappears. (…) The purity of the spirit is the real poverty. (…) Purity means an uncontaminated state of mind, where only your consciousness is and nothing else. Nothing else really enters into your consciousness, but if you hanker to possess, that hankering contaminates you. (…) possessiveness can enter into your consciousness; then you become impure. If you don't want to possess anything, then you become fearless; then even death is a beautiful experience to pass through. A man who is really spiritual has tremendous experiences, but he never accumulates them. Once they have happened, he forgets about them.

When I say, prepare for death, I don't mean the death that will come finally; I mean the death that visits you every moment with each exhalation. Accept this death each moment, and you will be ready for the final death when it comes. Start dying each moment to the past. Clean yourself of the past each moment. Die to the known, so that you become available to the unknown. With dying and being reborn each moment, you will be able to live life, and you will be able to live death also. And that's what spirituality is really all about: to live life intensely, and to live death intensely; to live both so passionately that nothing is left behind unlived, not even death. If you live life and death totally, you transcend. In that tremendous passion and intensity of life and death, you transcend duality; you transcend the dichotomy; you come to the One.

To me, sex is not just sex; sex is all. (…) Sex carries the whole blueprint of your destiny. (…) So if from the very beginning, you take an "anti"-attitude, you will be missing the whole journey of life. And you will get involved in a fight which leads nowhere; you will get involved in a fight in which defeat is certain. You cannot defeat sexual energy; (…) how can you defeat it? (…) Sex has to be taken out of the mind – it has to be cleaned; a temple has to be made around it. And remember, celibacy is not control; it is not a discipline; it is a tremendous understanding of your energies and their possibilities.

I confer freedom upon you, an absolute freedom. Sannyas is freedom. If you understand rightly, it is absolute freedom.

You don't surrender to me; you simply surrender your ego. I am just a device, an excuse. (…) I pretend to be here just to help you, so that you don't feel ridiculous. You can put your ego here. There is nobody to receive it, but it helps. Buddha used to call such devices upaya. It is just upaya, a device to help those who cannot put their egos down unless they find some feet. I make my feet available to you, but inside there is nobody.

Meditation is the art of dying. (…) it is the death of the ego.

We go on dreaming. People are dreamers, and that is their way. (…) By dreaming, by maya, we are avoiding the reality; by dreaming, we avoid the real. It is our escape. You don't have any other escape. This is the only escape route – dreaming. (…) Dreaming is avoiding life. (…) Stop dreaming; put aside your dreams; look at that which is. (…) When you are not dreaming, when you are in a state of no-dream, the reality is revealed.

Transform everything into a sacred thing; the profane disappears when you bring your energy of love, grace, gratitude.

I am not here to discipline you; I am not here to give you principles. My whole effort is to give you an unprincipled life, a spontaneous, undisciplined life. The only gift that I can present to you is freedom.

Those who have become alert in listening to their heart, to their real meanings, will not be looking for causes outside. They will look inside. They have come in contact with their being. (…) It is difficult to jump into yourself when there is some antagonism outside. You have to be outside then.

A man of knowing attains to a sense of humor. Let this always be remembered. (…) Knowing brings sincerity, but all seriousness disappears. Knowing brings playfulness; knowing brings a sense of humor. The sense of humor is a must. (…) The man of knowledge is very serious – (…) he cannot relax; his seriousness is a tension; he is anguished. (…) In fact, deep down, he is worried that he does not know anything.

Don't try to borrow. Nothing can be borrowed in the inner world. And don't try to become just knowledgeable. Attain to a clarity, attain to a vision where no thought exists in your mind. This is the hardest thing in the world. To drop thoughts is the hardest thing in the world, the greatest challenge. All other challenges are very small. This is the greatest adventure that you can take; and those who are courageous, they accept the challenge and go into it.

The world of being is the only real world, the world of truth. And unless you have come to it, you go on wandering in foreign lands. (…) You come home only when you have come to the innermost core of your being.

Many people start their journey towards God, truth, samadhi, because they have had a certain glimpse somewhere. Maybe through drugs, maybe through sexual orgasm, maybe through music, or sometimes accidentally. Sometimes a person falls from the train, is hit on the head, and he has a glimpse. I am not saying, make a method of that. But I know this has happened. (…) the person has a glimpse, an explosion of light. Never again will he be the same; now he will start searching for it.

The spiritual suicide means that a man has come to understand that not only this life is futile, but life as such is futile. Then he starts thinking of how to get rid of being born again and again, how to get rid of getting into the tunnel of the body and of being confined and encased; then he starts thinking of how to remain absolutely free without any form. This is what moksha is; this is what liberation is – or you can call it salvation.

My whole purpose here is to push you towards death, to push you into the abyss of the unknown, to push you into zero experience – samadhi. It is zero experience, where in a way you are and in a way you are not, where you are empty of all content, where all writing from the book has disappeared, just the book remains, empty. That's the real Bible, the real Veda – when all thoughts, mind, emotions, desires have disappeared, when there is only a pure consciousness, empty of all content. This is what I call the abyss.

Truth cannot remain long on earth; it comes and it disappears. If you are available, it hits you, and then it is gone. You cannot hold it on earth. (…) Whenever a Buddha walks on the earth, truth walks for a few moments. When the Buddha is gone, truth also disappears. Only the footprints are left, and you go on worshipping the footprints. (…) After a Buddha disappears, there is only a tradition left. What he said, what he did, the legends about him are many. And then people go on repeating them; people go on imitating them. These people are bound to be false. But this is natural; (…) a dead Master means nothing but a dead teaching.

The laughter that I am teaching to you is something that is going to destroy you completely. The laughter that I am teaching you is very destructive; it is a crucifixion. But only after this destruction is there creation.

Religious people make it a point to try not to sleep for too long – four hours, five hours at the most. Three is the ideal. Why? Because once your need of bodily rest is satisfied, your mind starts weaving and spinning dreams. And immediately, the mind brings up things which you have been repressing. Mahatma Gandhi said, "I have become a celibate as far as my waking consciousness is concerned, but in my dreams I am not a celibate." He was a true man in a sense, truer than other so-called saints. At least he accepted that in dreams, he was not yet celibate. But unless you are celibate in your dreams, you are not yet celibate, because the dream reveals whatsoever you are repressing during the day. The dream simply brings it back to your consciousness. (…) When a person represses nothing, dreams disappear. So a Buddha never dreams. If your meditation goes deep, you will immediately find that your dreams are becoming less and less and less. The day your dreams disappear completely and you attain to clarity in your sleep – no clouds, no smoke, no thoughts; simple, silent sleep, without any interference of dreams – that day, you have become a Buddha; your meditation has come to fruition.

There are people who try to control dreams also. In the East, methods have been invented to control dreams. That means you are not even allowing the unconscious to convey any message to you. You can do that too. You can cultivate dreams if you work hard. You can start planning your dreams. You can give a story to your own unconscious to unfold in your dreams. If you do it consistently, every day, by and by you will be able to corrupt the unconscious.

Poor men dream of kings' palaces and kings' treasures; rich people are fed up with their success and have dreams of becoming sannyasins. (…) the dream always goes somewhere else. The rich man thinks that the poor man is living a real life, and the poor man thinks that the rich man is living a real life. But the fallacy is the same; they both think: "Real life is somewhere else. Somehow I am always excluded from the real life; somebody else is enjoying it. Life is always happening somewhere else. (…) Wherever I reach for it, I always find emptiness." (…) Life seems to be like the horizon; it is just ahead somewhere. It is a mirage.

If a dream occurs too many times, it almost starts looking real. Repetition makes things real. Adolf Hitler wrote in his autobiography "Mein Kampf" that if you go on repeating a lie, it becomes real. Repetition is the key. And he should know; he practiced it. He is not simply asserting something theoretical; he practiced it the whole of his life. He uttered lies, absolutely absurd lies, but one thing he insisted on – he went on repeating. When you go on repeating some lie again and again and again, it starts becoming real, because the mind starts getting hypnotized by it. Repetition is the method of hypnosis. Repeat anything and it becomes engraved in your being; that's how we are deluded in life; (…) that's how all advertising functions; (…) that's how religions have been functioning in the world; and politics depend on it too. (…) Hitler says there is only one difference between a truth and a lie: the truth is a lie that has been repeated very often. And man can believe any lies. Man's gullibility is infinite; (…) you just go on repeating. And there is no need to argue. An advertisement never argues; have you observed? The advertisement simply persuades you, simply goes on throwing soft suggestions at you; it never argues, no direct arguments. Because when somebody argues with you, you may become defensive, but if somebody simply goes on hinting at certain things, not in any direct way, just supposing, you are more prone to be convinced by it. Dreaming functions in that way; a dream is a salesman. A dream simply goes on repeating itself. It never argues; it simply insists on being repeated. And, often repeated, one starts believing in it.

In this world, there is much competition, much conflict. Every place is guarded and every object has to be fought for; it is not easy. This is something very strange. In this world, nothing is meaningful, and yet for everything you have to fight. (…) Everybody is hankering for everybody else's place.

Life is painful. The pain comes because you are desiring something which is not possible. It does not come from life; it comes from your expectation.

This whole world is a cosmic joke. If you try to understand it, you will miss. That is how philosophers have always been missing.

This I call maturity of mind: when somebody comes to the point of looking at life without any questions, and simply dives into it with courage and fearlessness.

I go on using whatsoever devices are needed. (…) I am not interested in the dream; I am not a psychologist. But if I feel that by dissecting the dream, I will be able to make you aware that you are not the dream, that you are the witness to it, then I dissect it. (…) The dreams can be helpful so that the grip of the dreams on your mind is loosened, but the real step is only when you have started becoming watchful. (…) Whatsoever you are doing, remember that you are the watcher. (…) And when you can also remember that "I am just the watcher" in the dream, the dreams disappear. Then, with the disappearance of the dreams, a new consciousness arises in you. That consciousness I call the superconsciousness. (…) The reality is not in the dream; the reality is in the dreamer – and the dreamer has to be awakened. I function like an alarm clock.

That's what a dream is: a packaged message from the unconscious that you are doing something wrong, that you are moving against nature, that you are going against yourself. It is a warning from the unconscious that enough is enough, stop. Come back home, be natural, be spontaneous. Don't be lost in social formalities and moralities; don't become a fake. Be real. (…) the unconscious is always right, remember. The conscious is cultivated by society; it is a conditioning. The conscious means society inside you. (…) Once you understand a dream, once the message is delivered, the dream stops. If a dream is continuously repeated, that simply shows that you have not understood it, so the unconscious goes on knocking at your door. It wants you to understand it.

Man is conscious, unconscious, superconscious. Man is a trinity.

Your doing is not going to help, because by doing, you become more of a doer, and the doer feeds the ego.

Motivation is a thing you cannot hide. There is no way to hide it; there is no language to hide it. Motivation simply shows. Howsoever you put it, it will show. (…) It is natural to come with a motivation; nothing is wrong with it. (…) Always remember one thing: never feel guilty about anything. (…) So I accept it absolutely, and you have to accept it – you have come to me with some motivation. It is my work here to help you drop the motivation. (…) Become conscious of your motivation; (…) Consciousness helps you to drop it. (…) Consciousness brings so much light into your being that darkness simply disappears.

No face is yours; all faces are false. (…) You don't have any face; your face is just a belief. (…) Your reality is faceless. And that facelessness is what Zen people call the original face.

Ordinarily, religion is thought of as a practice. It is not. That is one of the most fundamental misunderstandings about religion. (…) Spirituality is not the practicing of virtues. (…) Virtue is virtue only when it comes out of your vision, out of your awareness, out of your understanding. (…) Spirituality is not the practicing of any virtue; spirituality is the gaining of a new vision. Virtue follows that vision; it comes on its own accord. It is a natural by-product. (…) So this is the first thing to be understood: you need a shift from the objective to the subjective. (…) The subjective has to be explored; nobody is born with a vision of the subjective. The subjective has to be explored; one has to learn what it is; one has to taste it by and by, and move into it by and by.

The objective and the subjective, these are the two ordinary realms of being. The third, the really religious, is the transcendental. (…) In it, both are implied, involved, but yet it is beyond both. The subjective is closer to the transcendental than the objective, but just being subjective, you don't become religious. (…) Drop the public world; then drop the private world. (…) First move from things to thoughts, then from thoughts to the thinker. (…) Just go on moving inwards. The first circumference around you is of things; the second of thoughts; and the third, the center, your very being, is nothing but consciousness. It is nothing but a witnessing. Drop things and go into into thoughts; then one day thoughts also have to be dropped, and then you are left alone in your purity; then you are absolutely alone. In that aloneness is God; in that aloneness is liberation, moksha; in that aloneness is nirvana; in that aloneness, for the first time, you are in the real. (…) This vision is what I call spirituality, the vision of the beyond.

The reflection in the mirror is not your totality; the reflection in the mirror is just the reflection of your surface, not of your depth. It says nothing about your depth. (…) Man remains the same unless he changes his dimension.

The religious person is a mystery. Because opposites meet, he goes beyond logic; his being is paradoxical. He is alive as nobody else is alive; and he is dead, more dead than the dead who are in the graveyards. He has known the art of dying and the art of living simultaneously. In ordinary life, with the ordinary mind, everything is divided into opposites, and there is a great attraction for meeting with the opposite: the man seeks the woman, the woman seeks the man – the yin-yang circle. In a religious man, search has stopped – the man has found the woman; the woman has found the man. In his innermost core, the energy has come to a point where everything has dissolved into oneness, into non-duality, advait. All opposites become complementaries; all conflicts dissolve and become cooperation. Then you have come home; then there is no need to go anywhere; then there is nothing to be sought, nothing to be desired. This state is the state of God. (…) God is transcendental.

When you become religious, then the tantra attitude arises. (…) Whether it is a man or a woman who is moving into the dimension of tantra, he or she is not interested in what is happening; rather, he or she is more interested in the witness who is watching it all. (…) Forget about your being a man or a woman; forget about your being in the body; forget that you are a mind – just be a witness, and then you have become transcendental. Tantra is transcendental. And this dimension has to evolve in all your ordinary life situations. Whatsoever you do, you can do it in three ways: objectively, that is the scientific way, the Western way; or subjectively, that is the Eastern way; or the religious way, the transcendental way, in which East and West meet and dissolve. (…) If you belong to me, then you belong to the transcendental. That is the whole meaning of being initiated by me. I bring you the transcendental; I bring you the Ultimate.

The revolution has to happen within you; it has not to be introduced into the world.

Truth is understood by a consciousness that is no longer clouded by any conditionings. Otherwise we go on seeing in things only that which we can understand. (…) It is impossible to understand beyond your own standpoint; people remain confined within their own standpoints. That is the real prison. (…) Drop all the imprisonments; drop out of your cages. They are very subtle cages, and you have decorated them for a long time; you may even have started loving them. You may have forgotten completely that they are prisons; you may have started thinking that they are your home. (…) If you have lived within these prison walls for too long, for centuries, if the mind has become accustomed to it, you think of it as a protection, as a shelter, as a security. (…) The prison corrupts your vision. Come out under the sky and under the stars; go beyond the standpoints; move to the transcendental.

I am against the guilt that has been created by the priests, but there is a different type of guilt which is not created by the priest. And that guilt is very meaningful. That guilt arises if you feel that there is something more in life, and you are not working hard to get to it. Then you feel a guilt. Then you feel that somehow you are creating barriers to your own growth – that you are lazy, lethargic, unconscious, asleep; that you don't have any integration; that you cannot move towards your destiny. Then a guilt arises. When you feel that you have the possibility, and you are not turning it into actuality, then a guilt arises – spiritual guilt. This guilt is of tremendous importance.

Accept the challenges of life. They are blessings in disguise. They are the very situation in which life has to integrate and to grow. Never escape; never repress. Let things be as they are; allow things as they are. Whatsoever the situation is, start allowing it. (…) Those who avoid, remain immature. (…) Whatsoever you are avoiding is not the point; the very avoiding is an avoidance of life. Confront life; encounter life. Difficult moments will be there; they are meant to be. They give you strength; they make you more integrated. Without them, you would never be centered, grounded.

If you have been truly hopeless, desperate, unhappy, miserable, if you have lived in hell, you have earned heaven. You have paid the cost.

Once you have dropped your futile desires, you cannot get back into them. Once you have dropped them, the very charm, the very mystery disappears from them. (…) Once the last desire disappears, you are enlightened.

It is not work that I am doing. It may be work for you; it is not work for me. I am enjoying the game. It is a play, leela. And in a play, it does not matter whether you make mistakes or not. (…) With me, nothing can go wrong, because there is nothing that is right.

Religion never becomes an established fact. You cannot make anything established out of it; it is intrinsically rebellious. In fact, the moment religion becomes established, it is no longer religion; it becomes a church.

The old religions were all perfection-oriented; my whole teaching is Whole-oriented. I say be whole, be total. It don't say be perfect. (…) How can egolessness be perfect? The very idea of perfection is the ego. (…) Absence is simply absence. Ego can be perfect, ego can be imperfect, but egolessness cannot be either. There is nobody to be perfect.

You cannot seek happiness directly. Truth has to be sought. Happiness is found when truth is found, but happiness is not the goal. And if you seek happiness directly, you will become more and more unhappy. (…) The search for truth is just the opposite dimension: not gratification, not pleasure, not happiness, but the nature of existence. (…) And to seek truth in existence, first one has to seek the true in one's own being. (…) That is what is meant by self-knowledge.

Mind is an infinite regress. Mind is the factor of duality; mind goes on and on dividing. That's why mind never reaches any conclusive state.

Life is a rhythm; it is just a centrifugal and centripetal rhythm. Everything falls apart and comes together, falls apart and comes together. (…) Be in step with the season.

The ordinary masses live in such unconsciousness that they can't even see a few steps ahead. They are blind.

Pythagoras' sutras are divided into three parts: preparation, purification, perfection. (…) Preparation is the introductory part – to create a great thirst in you. (…) Preparation means the disciple is being awakened to the truth that we are existing in darkness, and light has to be searched for. (…) Unless one starts moving towards God, life remains empty, impotent. The disciple has to be shocked out of his dreams – dreams of money, power, politics, prestige; he has to be given a new dream, the ultimate dream, in which all dreams will be consumed. The ultimate dream is to know truth, to know that which is, to know that from which we come, to know that source and to know that goal to which we are going. (…) First the desire, intense desire, a total desire… because only if you are totally desirous of truth will you be ready to go through the pains of purification. If the desire is lukewarm, you will not be ready to go through the pains of purification. (…) One can only be ready to go through purification if the desire is so total that one is ready even to die for it if that is needed. (…) Then the second part is purification. When the desire has arisen, then you have to be purified, because to reach the ultimate truth, you will have to drop much unnecessary weight, much luggage that you have always carried. (…) Your system has to be purified of all the toxic that you have absorbed on the way. And we have been drinking many kinds of poison. (…) Purification means one has to drop all conditionings, all ideologies, all prejudices, all concepts, all philosophies, all that you have been taught by others. One has to become a clean slate, a tabula rasa – one has to become utterly clean. (…) Emptiness is purity. Purification is a purgative part. In fact, truth is not far away; you have just accumulated many things around yourself. You have grown many layers around yourself, many personalities around yourself, many masks you are wearing. Hence you cannot see your original face. All those masks have to be dropped. You have to become authentic, truly as you are, utterly naked as you are. (…) And third is perfection. When you have stopped being phony, when you have dropped all the poisons that you gathered on the way, when the dust is cleaned off the mirror, then perfection starts happening on its own accord. Perfection is the unitive part, unio mystica.

Render to the immortal gods the consecrated cult. (…) whatsoever you believe, don't just believe it – consecrate it, make it holy by living. Let it not remain just an intellectual belief in the head; it has to become existential. Then it is consecrated; then you have made it holy and sacred. Beliefs, if they are only thoughts, are useless. (…) There is no other proof; only your life is a proof of your belief. (…) First go into meditation; experience truth; then live it, not from the without towards the within, but from the within towards the without. (…) whatsoever you have known, offer it to God, go on offering it to God – whatsoever you have known. Whatsoever experience has happened to you, of truth, of beauty, of love, go on offering it to God, go on offering it in deep gratitude. (…) Guard it; don't talk about it. (…) The masses are foolish; they cannot understand; it's beyond them. Keep it secret deep down your heart. (…) Don't open your heart in the marketplace – you will be misunderstood. And the misunderstanding will create disturbance for you – it will distract your search; it will disrupt your energies. It will create turmoil in you. Truth can be communicated only to people who have some understanding. (…) Whatsoever trust has arisen in you, let it become a seed in your heart; let it disappear into the soil of the heart. There it will grow into a big tree.

The more conscious you become, the more you go out of necessity; you transcend necessity; you start living out of power, out of abundant power. Then, your life is not a necessity.

Sannyas is a death and a resurrection. Death of all that you have been; and resurrection of all that you are, but have never been.

In obeying, you remain separate; in surrender, you are no more separate.

The eternal seeker exists in everybody. Pythagoras exists in everyone. We may not have taken note of him, but there is an in-built search for truth – man is a seeker. And unless you recognize it consciously, you will not be a man in the true sense of the word. (…) Pythagoras is almost an archetype – the seeker for truth par excellence, a person who devoted his whole life to finding philosophia perennis, the perennial philosophy of life. The possibility exists in everybody; it has to be actualized. But we are so much lost in playing useless, unnecessary games; we are so much lost in accumulating toys which are utterly childish, wasting life, wasting energy, wasting time. And life is short, and life is very fleeting, and time is continuously slipping out of our hands. Make it a point, a burning desire in you, that before death comes you will arrive home; before death takes possession of you, truth has to happen. Make it such an intense longing that every fiber of your being starts pulsating with it, that even while you are asleep, the longing goes on moving as an undercurrent. Whatsoever you are doing, all doing has to become peripheral, and a constant thirst for truth has to become your very center. Let that be your passionate love affair.

If the desire to know arises in you, then integration comes of its own accord. (…) So many desires go on pulling you in so many directions; that's why you always feel that you are falling apart. (…) These desires are clamoring you; they disintegrate you. (…) The desire for truth is a singular desire. And it is so powerful that all other desires simply disappear into it. These are small streams. When the desire for truth comes, the big river absorbs all small streams into it. They will disappear into one desire. It becomes such a passion, such a burning passion, that you are aflame with it. That very oneness of the desire integrates. (…) Desire for truth brings integration; and integration brings you to truth.

Awareness is the only virtue, remember. (…) If you are unconscious, even a noble cause is going to be very ignoble.

Is it not good to serve a noble cause? – No. Serve only with awareness; obey only with awareness. Obedience should not be for something exterior; obedience should be something interior. You should be able to see what is at stake, and you should be able to say 'yes' or 'no' according to your own conscience. (…) I am not telling you to be disobedient, because if it is out of unawareness, and you say 'no', it is as bad as saying 'yes'. I am not teaching you disobedience; (…) I am making you responsible. The individual is totally responsible, whatsoever he is doing. So you have to think, meditate and act out of your meditations – and whatsoever you do will be virtuous, and whatsoever you do will be moral, and it will be a totally different kind of morality.

Millions of people want plastic flowers. Plastic flowers are very convenient; you need not grow them; you need not take the trouble of growing them. To grow real flowers is troublesome – think of the soil, prepare the ground, bring the manure and the fertilizers and water, and then protect. And then too, it always remains unpredictable what is going to happen. Plastic flowers are very convenient; ready-made you get them. (…) That's how beliefs are – plastic flowers. But millions of people want plastic flowers, (…) and because the false is demanded, there are falsifiers. And this is a natural process; (…) some people want to be cheated, and some people want to cheat.

Once a truth is organized, it dies. And all truths will be organized. There is no way to protect them; there is no way to make safeguards; there is no possibility. Every truth will be organized; every truth will become a religion.

Become a sannyasin. (…) And convictions and conclusions will follow in their own time. And when they come out of experience, they have a tremendous validity in them, truth in them. The only valid truth is that which is arrived at through experience.

Brahmacharya actually means, living like a god.

The real man is always ready to expose himself to the very core, because he is not afraid. (…) There is a difference between a man of authority and an authoritative man. The authoritative man has no real authority; he is a pretender. The man of authority can expose himself, because his authority is not something imposed from the outside; it is his very core, his experience, his authenticity.

The words that I say to you are just a device to keep your minds engaged. The real work is a totally different thing: when your minds are engaged with my words, my hands are penetrating deeper and deeper into your being. When your head is engaged, you are more available to me. When your head is not engaged, your head keeps you closed. I go on talking to you; these words are just toys. While you are playing with toys, great surgery is going on underneath. (…) Truth cannot be said; (…) words are peripheral, they don't matter. (…) It is not a question of understanding; it is a question of communion, of being available to the Master, of being exposed to the Master's energy.

You will have to understand that the pride that you feel when you see yourself superior is the other side of the coin as when you see somebody superior to you and you feel humiliated. These two sides are together. You will have to drop the whole coin; you cannot save half of it. (…) Comparison sometimes brings great pride to you, and you feel very good. That's why people associate with inferior people; people avoid anybody whom they think is superior. They associate with people they think are inferior, because then they are the tops and they can always feel good. (…) The whole idea of comparing creates the problem; you are just yourself. There is nobody superior; there is nobody inferior. People are not similar; hence comparison is not possible. Drop comparing; drop the joy of pride and the misery of feeling inferior.

Bliss is neither happiness nor unhappiness; it is a state when all dualities have been dropped.

That's the very spirit of Jesus: he loved the world so totally that he could not find any sin anywhere; he loved the world so totally that nothing was ugly to him. All was transformed into luminous beauty. The real saint is one who cannot find a sinner in the world; (…) a real saint never meets a sinner. (…) Religion is nothing but attaining to such sensitive awareness that all is transformed into incredible beauty. (…) The moment existence becomes so totally beautiful for you, you have known God.

Love arises out of aloneness; aloneness makes you overfull. (…) Then you will have to pour yourself.

Whenever you accept, you are no more divided; the split disappears. (…) Drop all efforts to change yourself. Put your whole energy into knowing yourself, and out of that knowing comes growth. And that growth will bring your original face. You have to be only yourself; you have to be only that which you already are.

Pythagoras talks about two laws: the law of necessity and the law of power. The law of necessity means living an accidental life, like a robot, like a machine. The law of necessity means things happen to you; you are not the master; you are not conscious enough to be the master. The law of power means things don't happen to you; you happen to things. You are not just an accident; you are a power. Consciousness brings power – then life is not just like a driftwood; then life has a direction. Then life has some integrity; then life has a continuum. You have something solid in you, and so powerful it is that you start happening to people. You have a presence. And whatsoever you do, you do it. It is not an unconscious reaction; it is a conscious response. You are not just at the mercy of things, events. A mastery arises in you. That's why in the East, the sannyasin is called the swami. Swami means, one who has become a master of himself, one who has passed from the law of necessity to the law of power. (…) The law of necessity means you are walking like a man who is asleep, stumbling here and there, falling on this thing, on that, trying to grope in darkness. Your life will remain accidental, meaningless, "a tale told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, signifying nothing". Your life will be like the gibberish of a madman. You will not have any poetry; you will not have a song; you will not have any music arising out of you. All that happens only when your unconsciousness disappears and you become conscious. Meditation is the key to becoming conscious; meditation is the door to the law of power.

Pythagoras says, these two fundamental laws, the law of necessity and the law of power, are rooted in one primordial law. Lao Tzu calls that law Tao; Jesus calls that law logos; Buddha calls that law dharma; Moses calls that law torah. There is a fundamental law where all dualities dissolve and become non-dual; that primordial law is God, truth.

A rope is stretched between matter and consciousness. And to walk on this tightrope needs great skill. You will have to become a tightrope-walker. That's what sannyas is all about; that's what disciplehood is all about. The religious person is one who learns the art of walking on this tightrope. It is full of hazards; it is very dangerous. Just one step gone wrong, and you fall; just one step gone wrong, and you go astray; just a small mistake, and great will be your fall. The higher you move, the more dangerous your life becomes. But the more dangerous life is, the more worth living it is; the more meaning and significance it has to it. (…) Live dangerously! (…) Those who live only conveniently don't live at all; their life is nothing but a gradual death, a slow suicide.

In the Pythagorean mystery school, the word "fight" means creating a friction. (…) Create a friction in yourself, because out of friction, energy is released. (…) For example, great anger is arising in you. The Pythagorean method is: when anger is arising in you, just confront it; let great compassion arise in you. (…) And if you can reach from anger to compassion, you have overcome anger. (…) And remember always: whenever there is a fight between the lower and the higher, the higher wins; the lower cannot win. The lower can win only if the higher is absent; the lower wins only in the absence of the higher. Once the higher is there, the lower has no power. That's why Pythagoras calls the higher law the law of power.

No wise man is ever against your passions, but every wise man is against foolishness, ignorance, unconsciousness, mechanicalness. (…) All that is needed is a change in you from foolishness to wisdom, from unawareness to awareness. (…) Passions are not to be destroyed, but only subdued. And subduing does not mean repression; (…) subduing simply means: if you become aware, you become the master, and the passions become your slaves. As slaves, they are beautiful; as masters, they are dangerous. Freedom means mastery over thyself; and bondage means no mastery over thyself. (…) Become a witness of your passions, and subduing happens.

The first thing is: Above all, respect thyself – because unless you respect yourself, you will not be able to know yourself. (…) And in respecting yourself, you respect everybody else – because everybody else has a self in the same way as you have. If you respect your inner being, in that very respect, you have respected all the beings of the world.

Be sober, be diligent. (…) By "sober", Pythagoras means don't be too serious, and don't be too non-serious either. (…) "Diligence" means neither too much activity, nor too much inactivity; a balance between inactivity and activity is diligence. (…) To be in the middle is to be balanced. (…) To be in the middle is the way of the wise. To be exactly in the middle is to go beyond duality. In the exact middle is tranquility, equilibrium, balance and transcendence.

"Chastity" means you are natural, relaxed; you have not chosen a certain character for yourself. All characters are unchaste. You have not chosen a certain morality or immorality; you have not chosen anything. You simply remain watchful, and you respond moment-to-moment out of the chastity of your watchfulness. Watchfulness is chastity – it is virgin; it is pure. (…) If you choose something, if you become identified, you have fallen from your chastity; you have fallen from your virginity. You have become identified. To become identified is to become impure; to remain unidentified is to remain pure.

Unawareness is the only sin; awareness is the only virtue. (…) It is only in the darkness of unawareness that all kinds of enemies can enter you. Buddha has said: "If the light is on in a house, thieves avoid it; if the watchman is awake, thieves will not even try." (…) In unawareness, whatsoever you do is going to be wrong. Even your virtues will not be virtues if you are unaware. (…) Without awareness, your virtues are just pretensions, hypocrisies; they make you phony. They don't liberate you; they can't liberate you. On the contrary, they imprison you. Only one thing is enough; awareness is the master key. It unlocks all the locks of existence.

Once you have seen even a little bit of reality, you cannot go back; you have crossed the point of no return. You will have to live in the light. You will have to learn how to absorb it. (…) And out of the experience of the real, life becomes religious; out of the experience of the real, you cannot act in the old ways.

You have been brought up in such a way that you always live in inner conflict. This inner conflict creates fear and greed in you, and then your fear and greed has to find some outlet. From where it finds it is irrelevant; if you stop the outlet, it will come from another outlet. So rather than stopping outlets, please understand the root cause of it. If you remain divided in yourself, if you remain split, if you can't accept yourself as you are, if you remain dominated by the priests and the politicians, you will remain afraid, trembling. They want you to remain in trembling, because only a person who is in deep trembling can be dominated, can be possessed, can be reduced to a thing, a commodity. The person who is in fear is ready to become a slave to anybody. (…) Your fears have been imposed upon you; they are not part of your nature, so they can be easily shaken off. The moment you shake off all your fears, for the first time you will start existing as a single unit. You will be unitary; you will become an individual, one who is indivisible. (…) Abnormal fears will disappear; normal fears are perfectly okay. (…) There are no heavens and no hells, only two kinds of psychology. One psychology: that of the individual, integrated person; the other psychology: that of the split, schizophrenic person.

The real science has always been done without mind. All that is great in science has come not through intellect, but through intuition. (…) Science is always out of meditation, not out of mind. And whenever something is out of mind, it is not science, but only technology. (…) All machines are out of mind, because mind itself is a machine. But no insight ever comes out of the mind; (…) insights come from the beyond. Mind is just the surface of your being; insights come from the center of your being. Meditation takes you to the center. (…) The mind is a machine inside you. Don't become identified with it; that identification creates a wrong space. (…) Science comes out of no-mind, just as religion comes out of no-mind. (…) Technology comes out of mind, and religious technology also comes out of mind – yoga, mantra, yantra. All the rituals of religions, temples, mosques, churches, prayers, scriptures – these are all created by the mind. (…) Words belong to the mind. What I know is beyond mind; what I say to you is through mind. My words are part of the mind, but my knowing is not part of the mind.

Happiness is part of unhappiness. That's why happiness should not be the goal of your life, because if you want happiness, you will have to remain unhappy. The unhappier you are, then only a few moments, few and far between, will be those of happiness. (…) My effort here is to create bliss, not happiness. Happiness is worthless; it depends on unhappiness. Bliss is transcendence; one moves beyond the duality of being happy and unhappy. One watches both, and one does not become identified with either. (…) Watching both, a depth arises in you – the third dimension, witnessing, sakshi. And that third dimension brings bliss. (…) This is what meditation is all about; just become a watcher.

Drop the why. (…) Slowly, slowly, all whys, all hows will disappear. You will live in the 'isness' of the moment. Your life will have a tremendous presence, but no answers. You will know, but you will not have any knowledge at all.

Words are very inadequate. Words are meant to be for the mundane life of the marketplace. You cannot use them in love; and you cannot use them in prayer; and you cannot use them whenever and wherever the unknown is felt. When you come to the boundary of the known and the unknown, words start disappearing from you like dead leaves falling from a tree. And a totally new experience evolves, a wordless experience.

Splendors are revealed only to lovers; a real disciple is in love.

Real experiences always make you more innocent, rather than making you more knowledgeable. Problems are not solved here, but dissolved.

When you become enlightened, you become a tree of knowledge yourself. But nobody becomes the tree of knowledge by eating the fruit of the tree. One becomes the tree of knowledge by eating the fruit of the tree of life. (…) The man who becomes enlightened becomes himself the tree of knowledge.

Very rarely will you find a human being in the world. The people who are known as human beings are humanoids. A humanoid is a person who has never been allowed to will on his own and has become crippled, and is always in search of somebody to command him. (…) A humanoid is always seeking a state of slavery where he can throw his responsibility of thinking. Thinking is a burden for the humanoid; it is not a joy. He feels anxious. He cannot take any decision; he is afraid he may go wrong. A humanoid is a person who has not really become a grownup. (…) The humanoid is very much afraid of the perhaps. He needs guarantees; he is always looking for somebody to say it is so. (…) he wants somebody else to decide for him. He wants to throw the responsibility on somebody else; if something goes wrong, he can always say, "What can I do?"

Why do you call God "the father"? A search, a deep psychological search, to have a father who is always there protecting you, safeguarding you, guiding you, sending commandments – do this, don't do that. You can rely on him – and the more you rely on him, the less you are. And the tendency has become so deep-rooted, you have become so habituated to it that you are not even aware of what you are doing. This bondage has to be dropped. And that's what sannyas is all about. It's not a new prison. I am not here to function as your father.

Don't condemn any state that happens to you. Live it, in such total acceptance that there is no desire to be somebody else, something else. And out of that acceptance, great understanding arises, as a by-product. And in that understanding, many things simply disappear. (…) Through understanding, the energy is available to become joy, compassion, love; it can move to a higher realm.

You have to encounter yourself in your totality. You have to bring out all that is repressed; you have to bring out all, without any evaluation what is good, what is bad. (…) When all the parts have been expressed – your sex, your anger, your greed, your jealousy, your rage – when all parts have been expressed, a great calmness arises, the silence that follows the storm. (…) But if you go on keeping these things inside yourself, you will remain always in a kind of disease. (…) There is no other way of transcendence than acceptance.

Obsession means anything becoming your whole life – your life is hypnotized by one thing; you have lost all sense of proportion. (…) Nothing is to become your whole life; everything has its own place. Life should be an orchestra. (…) All the dimensions should be available; then you will be rich.

If you are constantly engaged in inner work, you will hear, but you will not be available.

A man divided against himself is going to remain in hell. (…) Man split remains in misery, and man integrated means bliss. (…) Man is an organic whole. And all that God has given to man has to be used; nothing has to be denied. Man can become an orchestra; all that is needed is the art of creating harmony within oneself. (…) Live life in its totality, and living life in totality brings transcendence.

Man is a three storey building: the body, the mind, and the soul. The body contains only the body. The mind contains body and mind both. And the soul contains all the three; it contains your totality. The higher implies the lower, but not vice versa; the lower does not imply the higher. This is one of the fundamental laws to be remembered. If you work on the higher, the lower will automatically be solved; if you work on the lower, the higher will not automatically be solved. (…) Awareness belongs to the spiritual realm. At the psychological level, you can only fight. (…) The more you fight, the more you give energy to the enemy. (…) You can repress, but the repressed part will find some outlet from the backdoor. (…) The repressed part retaliates with a vengeance. (…) You cannot transform this way. That's where Western psychology is lost, lost in chaos. (…) Problems are not being solved. It takes years and years of psychoanalysis; then too, nothing is solved. At the most, you can do only a kind of window-dressing, a whitewashing. You give the patient a better mask to wear, but his original face remains the same. (…) if we go on working on the surface, it may appear that you are changing, but deep down, you remain unchanged. It may appear that you are attaining to some psychological maturity, but it will only be skin-deep. Scratch a little, and you will find the same old man there. (…) The Eastern approach goes far deeper. It does not try to cut the foliage of a tree; it cuts the very roots. And to cut the roots is to destroy the tree.

Mind is something unnatural; it never becomes your natural state. But meditation is a natural state – which we have lost. It is a paradise lost, but the paradise can be regained. (…) Our real nature remains hidden somewhere deep down like an undercurrent. It cannot really be lost; it can only be forgotten. (…) You have forgotten; the diamond is lost in piles of rubbish. But if you can uncover it, you will find the diamond again – it is yours.

Meditation means becoming aware that the source of life is inside. (…) You don't depend on the outside; you depend on the inner world. These are the two directions: to move outwards or to move inwards. Mind is a process of moving outwards; meditation is the process of moving inwards. (…) Meditation is mind turning towards its own source. (…) When it brings you to your innermost core, the circle is complete. (…) You become mature when meditation has started; otherwise your remain childish. Your toys may go on changing, (…) but there is no qualitative difference; (…) it is the same game, just played on a bigger scale.

Mind knows the world; meditation knows God. Mind is a way to understand the object; meditation is a way to understand the subject. Mind is a concern with the contents; meditation is a concern with consciousness. Mind becomes obsessed with the clouds; meditation searches for the sky. Search for the inner sky. And when you have found it, then you will never die.

Your food is not just food; it is you. What you eat, you become. (…) Vegetarianism is a conscious effort, a deliberate effort, to get out of the heaviness that keeps you tethered to the earth. (…) The lighter the food, the deeper goes meditation. The grosser the food, then meditation becomes more and more difficult. (…) Vegetarianism is of immense help; it changes your chemistry.

In India, the word for the world is samsara. Samsara means "the wheel". (…) Everything is moving in a circle. Life is a wheel, and the wheel is repetitive. You will never reach anywhere if you go on clinging to the wheel. In the East, it has been a known fact that we have to jump out of the wheel; only then are we free. To be free from this wheel of birth and death is to have freedom; then you simply are. (…) Then now is the only time, and here is the only space. That is the state of nirvana, moksha, freedom – the state of witnessing, the state of transcendence. That is the real kingdom of God. (…) In that silence is bliss; in that silence is joy.

Faith means faith in oneself; faith means confidence, a respect for oneself. Belief is other-oriented; faith is self-oriented. (…) The man of faith knows no religion – except the religion of enquiry. He believes not in beliefs, but in enquiry. And his faith is so much in his own being that he goes unguarded into the unknown, that he moves into the uncharted without any fear. His faith in existence is such that he needs no other support. (…) Faith is dangerous; it will take you into the realms of the unknown. It will make you alone; you will not be with the crowd, and the crowd will not be with you either. (…) to be alone is of tremendous import, because to be alone is purity; and to be alone one has to be alert, one has to be aware. The believer falls asleep; the man of faith keeps wakeful – he has to keep wakeful, because there is nobody else to support him.

Peak experiences come and go; you cannot remain on the peak forever. (…) All peaks are the repetition of the ancient myth of Sisyphus. (…) Sisyphus has been punished by the gods, because he has rebelled against the gods, to take the rock to the peak. But the moment the rock reaches the peak, it starts falling back, slipping back, downhill. That is the story of every man. You cannot stay on the peak. You will make the journey, the long journey, to reach the peak, and once you have attained, it is finished. (…) My effort here is that of religion. I help people first to know peak experiences, so that a great longing can arise in them to abide on those peaks. But one cannot abide on those peaks. Then another effort starts in your life – how to create consciousness. Peaks are experiences; they come and go. Consciousness is a transformation of your being; it is a new birth, a resurrection.

The society is rotten, the society is ill; there is no possibility of reforming the society. Because if this society is reformed, it will be simply a modified form of the same rottenness – maybe a little bit better decorated, better painted, but it will be the same disease. In five thousand years' history, many times society has been reformed. And nothing basically changes; it remains the same in every form. It is the same illness, the same ugliness, the same sickness that continues. (…) Those who are intelligent have become aware that all revolutions have failed; all social revolutions have failed. (…) So we are not proposing any social revolution here. I am not at all concerned with the society; my whole concern is the individual.

Service comes in your life as a shadow of meditation.

You can never be grateful to a person who makes you dependent; you will hate the person. That's why children hate their parents. I am not a father figure; at the most, I am a friend. (…) I have no idea to impose on you; I have no morality to teach you; I am not here to help you to create a character; I am not giving you any commandments. (…) I am just a mirror to help you, so that you can see your face in me, so that you can see your inner core reflected in me. The mirror simply reflects you.

All your beliefs are false; they are borrowed. They falsify you; they are a block to your growth. (…) Belief is a burden; it does not liberate. Truth liberates, but truth is not a belief – it is an experience.

All that is mundane happens through effort; all that is worldly happens through effort. And all that is sacred, otherworldly, happens through effortlessness. That which is outside you has to be reached through action; and that which is inside you has to be reached through inaction.

Your conscience is nothing but the policeman that the society has implanted in you. (…) You are not free; you are not a free man; you are controlled from within. A very subtle strategy to control humanity, that's what your conscience is. (…) The real conscience does not come from the outside – it wells up within you; it is part of your consciousness. I don't say, cultivate morality; I say, become more conscious, and you will be moral. (…) If your conscience is not a consequence of your consciousness, then your conscience is ugly, dangerous, poisonous.

The real man of character has no character. The real man of character is characterless. The real man of character cannot afford to have a character, because the character means that which you have learnt in the past; character means the past. And you have to respond to the present moment. Your character will come between you and the present. It will force you to behave according to the past pattern, and when you behave according to the past pattern, you are never appropriate.

Be true; be authentic. Be a light unto yourself, that's all. That is my only message.

The enlightened person lives in no-mind; no-mind is enlightenment. Hence, the enlightened one cannot be goal-oriented; (…) for him, all is present. (…) Let it sink deep in your heart: wherever the goal is, the mind is; wherever the future is, the mind is. Tomorrow is another name for the mind. Tomorrow exists nowhere else except in the mind; they are dependent on each other. If you drop tomorrows, mind will simply evaporate; it cannot exist. (…) You can go on running and running… you will never arrive. The distance between you and the horizon will always remain the same, because the horizon exists nowhere except in your mind. It is an appearance; it is an illusion. All goals are illusory – worldly, otherworldly. To be here-now is the way of being in truth, in reality. (…) To be here-now is to attain the splendor of existence.

Your eyes are focused on the horizon. You are running after some shadow, some illusion, some dream, some desire. And when you are occupied with some dream, you cannot look within. You cannot look into the seeker when you are running after the sought; you cannot turn in. You remain an extrovert; you cannot look within, because you have become obsessed with the without. The without becomes your whole life from birth to death.

What is the situation of the ordinary person in the world? Playthings of passions; hither, thither tossed by adverse waves… You don't have one mind; you have many minds. You don't have a single self; you have many small selves. You are a crowd inside. Outside there is a crowd, and inside there is a crowd. (…) You are poly-psychic; many minds exist in you. (…) You don't have any individuality; you don't have any integrity. One moment you can be trusted; another moment you cannot be trusted at all – because one moment, one mind functions in you; another moment, another mind has come on top in you. (…) You are not one; you are not crystallized; you are not centered; you are not an individual. You are not yet one mind, one self. (…) You don't know what you are doing and why you are doing it; you simply go on doing things like a robot. You are not a master of your own self; you are a driftwood. (…) You are always half-half; you are never total in anything. (…) Totality brings individuality. But you are partial in everything. Only a part goes into it, only to a certain extent do you go, and then you stop yourself – only so far. You live a lukewarm life; you are neither cold nor hot. (…) And to live a lukewarm life is to live a very lousy life. You don't know what intensity is, what totality is. You don't know any moment in which you were drowned totally, utterly lost. If you had known that moment, you would have known prayer; your life would have changed. (…) Or if you had known total awareness, one hundred percent awareness, then you would have known what meditation is, and that would have changed you. (…) Prayer is the way of the lover; meditation is the way of the alone. (…) Prayer means: totally lost, drowned totally, surrendered totally, nothing is being held back, you have gone one hundred percent into it – anything, it doesn't matter what it is, if you can go one hundred percent into it, it becomes prayer. The quality of prayer comes by being one hundred percent into it; you have forgotten yourself utterly; you are a drunkard. (…) But as people are ordinarily, they are never one hundred percent in anything. They are hotchpotch; they are always mixed. And the mixture keeps them in a contradiction; one part going to the south, another part going to the north, and they are constantly in strain and stress. Neither can they resist, nor can they yield, and these are the two ways to attain perfection: either resist totally – that is the way of meditation; or yield totally – that is the way of prayer, the way of love. But people remain half-half, divided. And a house divided against itself is bound to fall sooner or later.

Wisdom and happiness come together; the stupid cannot be happy. (…) You have become wise; you have become happy; the moment to rest has come. But this is not the ultimate, because you are still there. Happy and wise – but you are still there. (…) Still remember, still remain alert, because the last step has still to be taken; the ego has to be transcended completely. (…) Be alert, be watchful, because you can still lose track; you can still fall – because you are, so still you can fall. You will go beyond fall only when you are not. (…) The last fragment of the ego will still keep you tethered to the earth. It is no more an iron chain; it is a gold chain – but chains are chains. First you were tethered to the earth by ugly chains of foolishness, mediocrity, stupidity, misery and pain; (…) now you are tethered to the earth by beautiful chains of wisdom and happiness. (…) The higher you move, the more careful you have to become, because the higher pleasures are more binding, naturally. (…) It is very simple to become attached and remain stuck at some stage of your growth. (…) If you attain to some psychic powers, it will be very difficult to drop; it will make your ego so satisfied, so contented. It is very difficult to resist the temptation when you can do something so special that nobody else can do. (…) One has to be aware not to use these things; otherwise you will be stuck there, and you will never move upwards. And as you move upwards, more and more subtle phenomena will happen, very subtle phenomena, which will make you immensely powerful. You would like to use them, but that will be a sheer wastage of your energy; and you will fall, and you will fall very badly. (…) beware of all kinds of siddhis, because each power is tempting. And the higher it is, the more tempting it is. And once the ego starts being satisfied with something, you will never attain the Ultimate. (…) Beware, even if you have become wise. Even wisdom is folly if you look from the ultimate peak.

The temple of God has many doors. Each door has its uniqueness, and one should not compare one door with another door. (…) Man can enter into the Divine through as many ways as there are types in the world. And each type will have its own joys, experiences on the way. But finally, when one has entered the temple, all those experiences melt and merge into one experience which it is not possible to express.

In the past, it has been said again and again by the priests that if you renounce, you will attain bliss. I tell you just the opposite: if you become blissful, there is renunciation. (…) The very seeing is transformation.

Sannyas helps you to get rid of the non-essential; sannyas helps you to negate the non-essential, to drop the non-essential. And meditation helps you to find the essential, to discover the essential. And these are the only two things that are needed; nothing else is needed. Withdraw your energy from the non-essential, and let it move in the direction of the essential. Discover your being, your individuality. In that authentic experience is the miracle.

I don't believe in anything. I am not a believer at all. I need not believe; I know. All the religions are humbug. This is not my belief; it is simply my experience. I can see it, (…) and the whole of human history proves it. And the moment you say "all the religions", you have already gone astray, because there is only one kind of religiousness.

Religion has to be chosen out of freedom. It is not a conditioning.

The moment all your outer seeking stops, the moment you have understood the futility of ambition – in that state of non-ambitiousness, desirelessness, truth is revealed.

The creative person is always leaving the known behind and moving into the unknown.

The unconscious humanity worships the established structure, because it is familiar with it. (…) They worship the dead and destroy the living.

A man who lives in anguish can be easily enslaved, because his energies are always wasted. He has no more energy to be rebellious. To be rebellious, one needs energy; one needs to be a reservoir of energy. In fact, overflowing energy is needed to be a rebel, because you will be fighting against the millions; you will be fighting against a long, long tradition. You will be fighting many, many vested interests, and they are powerful people – the rich, the religious, the political, those who are dominating the society and exploiting it, they are bound to be powerful. And you will be powerless, so powerless that you cannot even raise your head. You cannot say no; you cannot assert yourself. So creating tension, guilt, fear, anguish in man is a very subtle psychological strategy to destroy your energy. (…) This is a psychological castration. (…) Now man is weak; his energies have been destroyed. Now he can be enslaved; it is so easy.

The authentic seeker has nothing to do with God; he wants to know himself. That is the most fundamental thing, to know oneself, because out of that, all knowing, all light arises. If one knows oneself, one will know God too. In fact, only by knowing oneself does one become capable of knowing the Ultimate; because at the very core of your being, the Ultimate is present.

People die utterly disillusioned; people die complaining against life. (…) People don't seem to learn anything. They go on from one stupidity to another; from one disillusionment, they immediately start moving towards another. They never seem to learn.

Life teaches you everything that you need. Life is the only university. Take the counsel of the years very kindly, very understandingly.

Each day, one has to surrender the things of yesterday; each day, one has to die to the past. (…) Go on surrendering gracefully, and remember the word "gracefully". "Gracefully" means through understanding, through real growing. Growing in age is not growing up; that is only aging. Growing up happens only when you go on renouncing the past every day, every moment really. Each moment, die to the past that is no more. Come out of it so you can remain fresh, so you can remain clean, so you can remain clear. Only that clarity can encounter the ultimate truth.

You did not deliberately renounce your toys. You simply became a grown-up, and they withered away from your mind; they disappeared.

In sudden misfortune, that is the only moment when you can see whether you have real intelligence or not, when there is something sudden. Otherwise you are always prepared.

Trust is a mystery. (…) It is the highest form of love; it is the essential core of love. Love itself is a mystery and undefinable, but love is like a circumference, and trust is its very center, its soul. Love is like a temple, and trust is the innermost shrine in the temple, where God is situated. (…) Trust is the ultimate breakthrough; it helps you to know the truth on your own. And truth liberates only when it is yours; somebody else's truth cannot liberate anybody. It creates bondage and nothing else.

The unenlightened seeks the other out of loneliness, out of need; the enlightened seeks the other out of abundance.

The Sanskrit word for health is swasthia; it means becoming centered. It means coming to one's own self, realizing one's own self. Swasthia means getting rooted in the self.

The more stupid you are, the sooner you become knowledgeable. The more intelligent you are, the more difficult it is to become knowledgeable.

True learning happens through meditation.

Repression cannot succeed, because that which has not been lived, that which has not been experienced, remains in you in the unconscious. In fact, it goes deeper into the unconscious, and it starts spreading there like a cancer.

All your dreams are ego projections; they are like intoxicants. (…) There is no escape; there is only understanding which helps. (…) You have lived in dreams, and all dreams are bound to be broken. That has to be accepted; it is nothing to complain about.

The false knowledge de-mystifies existence; the true knowledge re-mystifies it.

Surrender is the quantum leap from mind to no-mind, from ego to egolessness. And in a single step, the whole journey is contained.

The religious person needs guts; it is only for the courageous few. Religion is not for the cowards. Religion is not a mass phenomenon; it is not for the crowds. The crowds can only be Christians, Hindus, Mohammedans; the crowds can never be religious. (…) Cowards create a pseudo-religion for themselves, a toy religion. (…) The church is not more than a club; (…) it is a social affair. (…) The church is just a meeting place where you talk sweet nothings. (…) They don't change your life; they don't transform. In fact, they prevent transformation; they make you more adjusted to the crowd.

The person who takes sannyas for any reason at all is taking it for the wrong reason. (…) Reasons are like shifting sands. Today it seems rational; tomorrow it may seem irrational. Reasons go on changing like the climate. Mind is never the same even for two consecutive moments, and mind supplies the reason. (…) Sannyas means dropping the mind. Mind cannot take sannyas, because that will be suicidal to the mind. Sannyas is something that arises in the heart. (…) That is the difference between ambition and longing: ambition is goal-oriented; longing is source-oriented. (…) Look deep into your heart; listen to the still small voice within. And remember one thing: life is fulfilled only through longing, never through ambition. (…) The heart gives you the real, ultimate values: love, bliss, truth, freedom, awareness, God. And a life without these values is valueless, meaningless. (…) Respect your longings. To respect your longings is to respect the voice of God within you. (…) Listen to the heart if you really want to grow.

The mind cannot support you; the mind can only hinder you. The mind cannot nourish your longings; it has its own projections, ambitions. It wants to put your total energy into the ambitions. It wants you to go ahead with all your dreams; they have to be fulfilled. Of course, they are never fulfilled, all dreams are bound to be broken, but the mind is immensely inventive. One dream fails, it creates another. In fact, even before the other has failed, it has already created a few more dreams. It keeps them ready, in case there is a gap, and in the gap you start thinking of the heart. It never gives you a gap. It keeps you running faster and faster.

The mind knows nothing of eternity. The heart yearns for the eternal, but the heart is continuously being interpreted by the mind. (…) Mind lives horizontally; mind cannot be vertical. That is the dimension of the heart, the dimension of meditation. (…) Mind is not alert, not aware. Mind is dreaming.

The more intelligent a person is, the more short-lived will be his love – love as you know it. (…) Disillusionment is bound to happen. How long can an intelligent person remain in a deception? That's why I say, the more intelligent you are, the quicker it slips out of your hand. Only stupid people can live a married life, thinking that it is something permanent. Intelligent people cannot live the so-called married life, or if they live it, then they will have to change their partners many times in their life. But each time the same thing will happen.

Awareness happens first, then unconditioning. Unconditioning is the outcome of awareness. Awareness functions like a key; conditioning is a lock on you. The key of awareness unlocks you; it brings you out of the prison. And then there is freedom. Without awareness, you can only dream about freedom. (…) One is only free when one is not; one is only oneself when one is not. (…) When you are unconditioned, the self disappears, because your self is nothing but conditioning, layers and layers of conditioning. (…) When the whole onion is peeled, nothingness is left in your hands. Not a self, but a nothingness – shunyata, anatta, no-self, absolute emptiness as far as ego is concerned. But the ego is very clever. If you throw it out from the front door, it comes from the back door; it goes on grabbing you again and again. It wants you to go back to the old conditioning. (…) I am here to uncondition you, not to recondition you, remember. My work consists only of unconditioning you, and then leaving you alone.

You cannot be absolutely certain who I am unless you know who you are. But the moment you are absolutely certain, you don't need me. You need me only because you are not absolutely certain. But something in you is triggered; something in you starts growing.

Feeling is the beginning, remember; knowledge will happen only in the end. (…) Feeling is half-way between knowledge and knowing. (…) To enter into the world of feeling is the beginning of disciplehood. Then, one day, you drop out of feeling, and you enter the world of being. You become enlightened.

Remember, only the dependent person wants to be independent. (…) Only the person who is not free wants to be free.

The perfect Master is one who helps you to surrender through him to God, not to him. (…) The real Master's work is to become gradually useless for the disciple. (…) The Master first helps you to create a relationship between himself and you, and then slowly, slowly, he withdraws himself; as you become capable, he withdraws. He helps you to become free of him. (…) You are to be with the Master, but not to end with the Master. The Master is like a ladder: you use it; then, a moment comes when you have to drop the ladder – you don't cling to it. (…) If you cling to the ladder, the ladder becomes dangerous.

The work of the Master is first to destroy your ego. (…) Once your ego is destroyed, then the second step is to help you to stand on your feet.

I am teaching you just to be human beings. The whole earth is one, and people everywhere are the same. They differ only in superficial things, in non-essential things.

There are no questions in existence. All questions are false, unreal, non-essential.

To suffer life today is a preparation for enjoying life tomorrow; so the more you suffer, the better. There is no reason to complain.

If you go back to the Vedas, you will be surprised: the Vedas are very materialistic. It is very rare to come across a statement in the Vedas which can be called spiritual. (…) Not only the Vedas, but all the puranas are very materialistic. Not only the so-called seer, but the Indian idea of gods is very materialistic. My own experience is that the Indians are the most materialistic people in the world. And they will remain materialistic till they understand what they have been doing: they have become hypocrites. (…) Buddhism was completely destroyed from India; it was against the Indian materialist mind. Buddha has introduced a totally new vision of life; it was spiritual. But he was against the Vedas, and he was against the whole idea of Hindu gods. (…) Hence the Hindus have never been able to forgive him; they destroyed his whole heritage. He was uprooted from India.

What I am doing here is pure Zen. I am helping you to get rid of your mind. (…) Zen is a transcendence of the mind. It does not develop any aspect of the mind; it takes you beyond the mind. And the only way to go beyond the mind is to enter into life here and now.

Unless you are really intelligent and courageous, it is impossible to have a communion with me. You need courage, courage to go into the unknown, into the unfamiliar, into the uncharted. And you need intelligence, tremendous intelligence to see the point.

Intelligence is always rebellious – (…) it will rebel against any kind of slavery; it will rebel against anything that is wrong. Intelligence is always for freedom, individuality, authenticity. It will fight all that is phony and pseudo.

Metaphysically, to fall asleep means to become a mind. And to become a Buddha, awakened, to become a Christ, is to come out of mind, to come out of knowledge, and again become innocent. That's the whole alchemy of meditation.

Philosophers are not thirsty; they are not thirsty for truth. They are not really on great ego trips. They are not exploring that which is; on the contrary, they are fabricating, manufacturing systems of thought of their own, and trying to impose their thoughts on reality.

The Upanishads are not commentaries on the Vedas, neither are they extensions of the Vedas. Hindus go on insisting that they are commentaries or extensions of the Vedas, but that is a falsehood perpetuated by the priesthood. In fact, the Upanishads are rebellions against the Vedas. Another name for the Upanishads is vedanta. The priests have been saying that vedanta means the culmination of the Vedas; the word can be interpreted that way, but in fact it means the end of the Vedas and the beginning of something absolutely new. Vedas are very ordinary compared to the Upanishads. (…) Yes, once in a while you can find a sutra in the Vedas which is beautiful, but that is only one percent at the most. Ninety-nine percent is just rubbish, while the Upanishads are hundred percent pure gold; they are statements of those who have known.

Truth liberates, but it has to be your own. If it is somebody else's, then rather than liberating, it imprisons. (…) Liberation comes by experiencing the truth on your own. It has not to be just an accumulation of information; it has to be an inner transformation. (…) Transformation means, you will have to go through a great inner revolution. (…) It is very difficult, very arduous for the knowledgeable person to become ignorant again. His whole life, he has been accumulating knowledge; he has invested his whole life in knowledge – how can he drop it?

The Vedas belong to the priests, to the scholars, to the brahmins. (…) The Upanishads are a totally different dimension. (…) The emphasis of the Upanishads is for immediate and direct experience of godliness.

Man can live in two ways: either he can follow the dictates of others, or he can live according to his own light. (…) If you choose not to follow your inner voice, but the dictates of others – they call morality, etiquette, civilization, culture – then your inner voice will start nagging you. It will continuously nag you; it will say that you are being untrue to your inner nature. And if you feel that you are being untrue to your inner nature, then your morality cannot be a rejoicing. (…) This is what has happened to man: man has become schizophrenic. My effort here is to help you to become one. (…) All that I teach is meditation. (…) I look at the transcendental self in you. (…) I am not a psychologist; I am not concerned with the superficial, but with that which surpasses you. I am concerned with your beyond.

A tradition means something of the past, and you have to become enlightened now. A tradition may be very ancient; the more it is ancient, the more it is dead. A tradition is nothing but footprints on the sands of time of the enlightened people, but those footprints are not enlightened. You can follow these footprints very religiously, and they will not lead you anywhere. (…) Buddha was unique; you are unique in your own right – so how Buddha has entered into truth is not going to help you. (…) If you simply follow Buddha blindly, that very following will be misleading. Traditions cannot be followed. You can understand them, and understanding can be of immense help, but following and understanding are totally different things. (…) A tradition has to be understood, and if you can understand many traditions, of course it will enrich you. It will not make you enlightened, but it will help you towards the goal. (…) It is dangerous to live surrounded by a small philosophy. (…) The very effort to understand the religions of the world will make you free of creeds and dogmas; (…) you don't become addicted with one standpoint. (…) So I will not say that traditions are useless; I will say that they become dangerous if you follow them blindly. Try to understand; imbibe the spirit. Forget the letter; just drink the spirit. (…) Don't become part of a religion, but visit; be a guest to all the religions.

The real Master will take you out of one prison and prevent you from entering into another prison.

Buddha's experience is of meditation. Without meditation, nobody can have any idea what Buddha is saying.

The difference between experiencing and indulging is that of awareness; there is no other difference, no other distinction. (…) The difference is not in the act; it is in your awareness.

The moment you lose your discord with the Whole, the moment you are in tune with the Whole, when you are one with the Whole, every fiber of your being, every cell of your being dances, for no reason at all. It is the dance for the dance's sake, joy which is uncaused, hence it is eternal, joy which is unmotivated, joy which is not dependent on anything. It is your intrinsic, natural music, your spontaneity.

To the seer, to the one who has come to the ultimate peak of meditation, one who has attained samadhi, all the polarities are joined together into one existence. They are not separate; nothing is separate. The existence is one organic unity, hence to say anything about it will have to be paradoxical if it has to cover the whole truth. So you will come again and again from different sides. The contradictions have to be dissolved; they have to be talked about, so that you become aware of their complementariness.

Sitting silently simply means settling at the center where all activity ceases, but it is also the source of all activity. The inactive is the source of activity; the nothing is the source of all things.

It is a very strange world. You don't know people's real lives; all that you know is their masks. (…) Everybody goes on pretending. Even parents go on deceiving their own children; they are not even authentic with their own children.

One remains in the need of the other up to the point where one enters into one's own innermost core. Unless one knows oneself, one remains in the need of the other. But the need of the other is very paradoxical; its nature is paradoxical. When you are alone, you feel lonely; you feel that something is missing; the other is missed. And when you are with somebody, you feel that the other is destroying your freedom – only for a few days honeymoon is there.

A man is absolutely free only when there is no identity left. (…) You have to become discontinuous to the past. Unless you die to the past, you cannot be reborn; you cannot be here-now. The past has to be completely dropped and forgotten; it was a dream, nothing more. If the past is dropped, the future disappears. Then the only reality is now and here. And to be here and now, absolutely here and now, is to know all that is worth knowing, is to really live an authentic, sincere life, a life full of truth and bliss and godliness.

I am nobody's disciple, and I am nobody's Master either. I am not your Master, just a friend on the way, a fellow-traveler. I am nobody's disciple, because nothing can be learned from anybody; and I am nobody's Master, because nothing can be taught. I can allow you to be with me, and something can happen which is neither done by me nor done by you.

My sannyasin represents togetherness of action and meditation. (…) A true sannyasin should be in the world, in action, and deeply rooted in meditation. (…) He should be in the world, and yet not of it. (…) Your roots should be in meditation; your branches should be in action. (…) a tree goes high only if its roots go deep, in the same proportion – the deeper the roots, the higher the branches; the higher the branches, the deeper the roots. They balance each other. Roots have to be in meditation, and branches in the world; (…) then you will be a full tree.

The only way to show our gratitude to the Master is to help others. If it has been a gracious gift to you, then give it to others as a gracious gift.

The ordinary religions live on condemning this world; by condemning this world, they praise the other world. The Upanishads have a totally different approach: they praise this world with all its beauty, splendor; through praising this world, they praise the other world. This approach is life-affirmative. The Upanishads are in tremendous love with life. They don't teach renunciation; they teach rejoicing. (…) The Upanishads have a very ecstatic approach towards life – not the approach of an ascetic, but the approach of a poet, a painter, a musician, a dancer. (…) But that vision has completely disappeared. Instead of that ecstatic vision of life, for three thousand years, humanity has lived with sadomasochistic ideas. (…) The person who tortures himself becomes a great saint; (…) we have great respect for him. This respect simply shows that our minds are in a very ill state. We are not for health, for wholeness, for joy, for bliss; we are suicidal, murderous.

Love is the hardest thing in the world, the most arduous. It needs really guts to be in love. That's why for thousands of years, people have escaped from the world in the name of religion. They were not really escaping from the world; they were escaping from love. (…) Love is real spirituality. (…) Love is a transcendence of lust and ego.

This is the first thing: a deep, total acceptance of things as they are. Then life enters into a different dimension, the dimension of joy, celebration, because then, the whole energy is available to dance, to sing, to be. Now, the whole energy is engaged into improving, into changing, into making things better.

That is the second thing to be understood: when I say, stop doing, don't misunderstand me – I am not saying, do nothing. "Stop doing" simply means stop pushing the river; flow with the river. It is already going towards the ocean.

Nothing is wrong with the physical pleasures, so don't repress them. Accept them in a simple, innocent way, and then move ahead. That is not the end; that is only the beginning of the journey. Then there are the pleasures of the mind; then there are the joys of the spirit. Meditation, silence, prayer – these are the joys of the soul. And still, there is the ultimate, the fourth, turiya – even to go beyond the self. That's what Buddha calls attaining the zero, nothingness – just being, without any idea of 'I'. That is inexpressible; it is called bliss. These are the four planes: pleasure, happiness, joy, bliss. And the higher you go, the richer you become. (…) the higher contains the lower; (…) the lower does not contain the higher. (…) the lower is good as far as it goes, but it does not go far enough. So don't stop there.

One of the greatest Christian mystics, Meister Eckhart, has said that only God can say 'I'. No individual can really say 'I', because 'I' belongs to the total.

You are not going to be here forever. You cannot change the whole world; you cannot change everybody – you can at the most change yourself. (…) Avoid unnecessary struggle, because that dissipates energy. Preserve your energy to be used for the inner work. And that work is so significant, and it needs all the energy that you can give to it, so don't waste it in unnecessary things. For the outside world, remain an actor, and don't think that you are deceiving anybody. If they like deception, that's what they need, that's what should be given. (…) That is all that is meant by right conduct. (…) Right conduct means just the right rules of behavior with others.

When thought moves to objects, to the world, it creates entanglements; it creates slavery; it creates imprisonment. When thought is not moving to objects, but starts moving within, when you become a witness, the same energy becomes liberation.

He fixes his mind unwaveringly… This is the first thing in nonattachment, because a wavering mind cannot get nonattached; only a nonwavering mind, nishkam, can get nonattached. (…) So fixation of the mind on one content is one of the essential requirements for any seeker – that he should remain with one thought for long periods. (…) And if you can retain a thought for long periods, you have become the master. Now the mind is not the master, and you are not the slave. (…) You will see that this thought is creating attachment; this thought is creating a world around it; this thought is the basic seed of all illusion. (…) And if you can remain with one thought for long periods, you can drop it also. (…) Now it is not so; you want to stop the process, but the mind continues; the mind never listens to you. The mind is the master, and you are just following the mind like a shadow. The instrument has become the soul, and the soul has become the servant. This is the perversion, and this is the misery of human beings. (…) Fix your mind on one thing; anything will do. (…) This is the meaning of concentration.

An ashram exists with a Master; it is his personal influence, his person, the atmosphere, the milieu that he creates through his being. An ashram is his being, and when you enter into an ashram, you are not entering into an institution – you are entering a living person; you are becoming part of the soul of the Master. Now you will exist as part of the Master; he will exist through you. (…) The ashram, or the Master, will accept you only when you are ready, and he will start working only when a certain thing can be done to you, when you have come to a certain state; nothing can be done before it; (…) nothing can be done when you are not ripe for it.

With a Master, you will have to move through much suffering. You have got many blocks in the body and in the mind; they have to be destroyed, and to destroy a block is painful. Unless those blocks are destoyed, you cannot flow; you cannot become spontaneous; your energy cannot rise high; it cannot move from the sex center to the sahasrar; it cannot move to the ultimate center of your being. So many things have to be destroyed, and every habit has a big pattern, its own system – it takes time; (…) it is a part of growth. And when all suffering has been passed through, only then you become capable of bliss; (…) there is no other way.

Drugs can create such a chemical situation in you where for a moment clouds disappear; suddenly you are thrown to a point from where the peak can be glimpsed. But this is no attainment, because chemistry cannot become meditation, and chemistry cannot give you enlightenment. When you come back from the trip, you are the same again. You may remember it, and that memory may disturb you; that memory may make you an addict. Then you have to take drugs again and again; (…) then you are on a path which will lead to insanity and nowhere else. So don't try chemical things. (…) Only sadhana, only spiritual discipline, will help you grow, will give you growth to the point where the glimpse is not forced, but becomes natural.

Ordinarily, mind is always concerned with the end; means are used, exploited, to reach the end. (…) You would like to reach the goal immediately. The mind divides ends and means – end is meaningful; means are just necessary, they have to be suffered. (…) Happiness is a goal, somewhere in the future; this moment is just a means to an end; so today will always be suffering. (…) This is how the ordinary mind functions, and because of this, whatsoever you do becomes a suffering. (…) So those who are on the spiritual path must be aware of this tendency of the mind. (…) Don't divide into ends and means. (…) For the meditative person, every step is blissful, and out of this step, the next step is born. (…) Vairagya is all; nonattachment is all. It is the beginning; it is the middle; it is the end. (…) Desirelessness is both the first step and the last step also. (…) Desirelessness in the beginning is with conscious effort; in the middle with unconscious effort; in the end effortless. (…) When you become capable of remembering that you are the witness, this is the first stage of nonattachment.

Every human body has three layers of energy. The first layer is only for day-to-day work. (…) It has not got much energy, just routine energy. The second layer is for emergency situations. Unless the first is exhausted, the second is not available. (…) And there is a third layer which is the real source, the source of all energy. You may call it the infinite source, élan vital. When the second layer is also exhausted, only then the third layer becomes available. And when the third layer becomes available, you are totally different; you have become divine, because now the source is infinite; you cannot exhaust it. We live on the first layer and only sometimes, in emergencies, accidents, in some dangerous situations where life is at stake, does the second become available. The third remains almost unavailable. All the effort of spiritual sadhana, discipline, is to exhaust the first. Then austerities, arduous efforts, are to exhaust the second. When the second is exhausted, you fall into the ocean, and it can never be exhausted. (…) This is what liberation means; this is what becoming infinite means; this is what Jesus used to call the kingdom of God. But remember, you cannot just slip into it; it is not available. You have to exhaust the first layer and the second layer; only then it becomes available. Effort is needed to exhaust these layers, and then effortlessness is needed to enter the original source. (…) Effort precedes, and then effortlessness follows. Effortlessness is the peak of effort; it comes only when you have reached the peak. (…) If you want only peaks and no valleys, you are mad. Only peaks cannot exist. With every peak, at least two valleys will be needed, and only between two valleys is one peak possible. (…) Effort and effortlessness, they are polar opposites. The ultimate is reached through effort and effortlessness, so don't cling to one; remember both. (…) You have to make all efforts, and then relax also. If these are both possible, only then will you create the rhythm through which every growth becomes possible.

On the path, in the search, every step has two sides: the beginning of the step, and the conclusion. The beginning will always be with conscious effort; it is bound to be so. A struggle will be there; constant need to be alert will be there. Sometimes you will fall; sometimes you will fall asleep; sometimes you will forget; sometimes you will go astray. Again and again, you will have to remember, come back to the path. Again and again, you will have to make more intense effort to be conscious. (…) Peaks and valleys will be there. They will disappear only when the conscious effort has disappeared, when the method is no more a method, when the method has become your very consciousness. (…) This is the end aspect of every step. Remember this: through constant practice, a moment comes when you can drop the practice completely; and unless you can drop the practice, you have not attained.

The Upanishads say that the Divine can be defined only by negatives; so they go on negating. (…) You can point to the Brahman only with a closed fist, so you are not pointing anywhere – or, everywhere. (…) Hinduism defines God totally negatively; they say what he is not. (…) You cannot make an idol of a negative Brahman. (…) That's why Hindus conceived their highest conception of Brahman as shivalinga. (…) Shivalinga is a symbol for zero, shunya, the negative. Shivalinga doesn't define any image; there is no image on it. (…) And the zero can be infinite. Zero has no boundaries – it begins nowhere; it ends nowhere.

You may have heard many stories that Hindu sannyasins, rishis, Zen monks, Bhuddist bhikkus, declare their death before it happens. And you may be surprised to know that that declaration is always made six months before it happens – never more, always six months. Many saints have declared that they are going to die, but just six months before. It is not accidental; those six months are very meaningful. Before the physical body dies, the bioenergy starts dying, and a person who is in deep contact with this bioenergy knows that now the energy has started shrinking. Life means spreading; death means shrinking. He feels that the life energy is shrinking; he declares that he will be dead in six months. Zen monks are known to have even chosen how to die – because they know.

Our hunger is almost ninety-nine percent habitual. (…) Those who have done much work fasting say that only after the twenty-first day will real hunger be felt. So it means that for three days your mind was insisting that you were hungry because you had not taken food, but it was not hunger. Within three days the mind gets fed up with telling you; you are not listening, you are so indifferent. On the fourth day, the mind doesn't say anything; the body doesn't feel hunger. For three weeks you will not feel hunger, because you have accumulated so much fat – that fat will do. You will feel hunger only after the third week. And this is for normal bodies. If you have too much fat accumulated, you may not feel hungry even after the third week. And there is a possibility to accumulate enough fat to live on for three months, ninety days. When the body is finished with the accumulated fat, then for the first time real hunger will be felt.

A revival of the body, a resurrection, is needed; you are carrying a dead body.

There are many books in the West, and particularly in America, which go on teaching willpower, and they are sold in millions; (…) everybody thinks that he has to conquer and create willpower. (…) Will is your impotence; because of will, you are defeated. When you leave will, only then will you be powerful. When there is no will, you have become potent; (…) then the whole universe is your power. With the will, you are a fragment fighting with the whole existence.

For experience to exist, duality is needed. (…) Experience divides. (…) If really you have become one, how can you experience? So even the experience disappears.

In videhamukti, you are living in the body, but living in the body you are no longer the body; the body has just become an abode, a house or your clothes. You are no longer attached to it in any way. You use it, you live in it, you take care of it, but you are no longer concerned, no longer afraid that if the body dies, you will die. Now you know you are deathless; only the body can die, never you. You are not identified with the body; that is liberation. A person who exists at this stage remains inwardly totally silent. There is no inner talk; he never talks with himself. Really, to talk with oneself is a sort of insanity. (…) In videhamukti, the inner world becomes totally liberated from inner talk; everything is silent within. You can talk, but only with someone else, not with yourself.

Don't cling; let your life be a gift to death. Don't create any fight and resistance. If you create fight, you will become unconscious, and you will miss an opportunity again. Give up. Give death whatsoever you have; from the gross to the subtle to the very self, go on giving. Don't create any resistance.

Whatsoever you accept becomes happiness, and whatsoever you reject becomes pain, misery, unhappiness. Nothing is happiness, nothing is unhappiness outside you; it is your rejection and acceptance. (…) It depends on you, on whether you accept or reject. (…) The real thing to learn is acceptance. (…) If you accept totally, you transcend.

There is a time to experiment – when you are young, experiment. Know many persons, allow many happenings, don't be shy, don't feel guilty, let life flow so you can become acquainted with it. And when you feel that now you are acquainted, you have known, you have a certain experience to settle with, then settle, and then settle forever.

Buddha lived for forty years after his enlightenment, so there was a question: if desires have stopped totally, then Buddha must die – how is he alive? The body has momentum. (…) You have been pedaling a bicycle, and now you have stopped pedaling, but the wheels have accumulated momentum. They will run on, and it will take a little more time for the bicycle to stop completely. (…) If you have stopped pedaling and the bicycle is going uphill, then it will stop soon. It may even stop the same moment you stop pedaling. But if it is going downhill, it may go on much longer. So if enlightenment happens before the age of thirty-five, the body may die soon. If it happens after thirty-five, then it is downhill; it may continue more. (…) With desires stopping totally, really you have stopped being a body. Now the old momentum will work, and it will depend on many things.

Body and consciousness are related by desires. That's why, if a person dies without desire, then he will not be reborn, because now there is no necessity, no causality to create a body again.

When a person becomes desireless, at least for an interim period, for an interval, he will become inactive, and how long it will depend on the individual. (…) There will be a pregnancy period. (…) The desires will have dropped, and all the actions that he had been doing were concerned with desires, so how can he continue? They will drop. But by dropping desires and actions, energy will be accumulated, and now energy will begin to move. (…) So it depends. Inactivity is bound to be there – more or less, but it will be there. And only then can you be reborn, because the whole mechanism has to change completely. The mind drops, old roots drop, the old habits drop, the old association of consciousness and desires, consciousness and mind, drops – everything old drops, and everything has to be new. A waiting is needed; patience is needed. (…) The energy will take its own course.

Lives and lives of dissipated energy… Your energy is not really energy, but a pushing and pulling.

The persons who commit suicide are really those who are very, very deeply attached to life. Because they are so much attached to life, whenever they are frustrated, they cannot do anything else but commit suicide. A person who is not too much attached to life cannot commit suicide. And suicides can be committed in two ways: they can be long-term and they can be short-term. You can take the poison just now, or you can go on dying slowly for many years. It depends on how much courage you have.

Brahma is knowledge without the known and the knower – supreme consciousness, alertness, enlightenment. (…) Ignorance is bondage; knowledge is absolute freedom.

There is a constant chain, life moving around. This limited feeling of embodiment, of these bodies, is just a fallacy; life is one. The deeper we go, the deeper the oneness is uncovered.

Bliss cannot be taken back. Whenever something else is the source, it can be taken back – it is bound to be taken back. It can only be momentary and temporal; it is not your being; it is just a happening outside. (…) When you begin to feel yourself enough unto yourself, if the whole universe just drops and goes into nonexistence, it will not make any difference – then, it will not make any difference, because now you have an inner source of happiness, an infinite source of happiness. This is your being, and cannot be taken from you, and cannot be destroyed; and therefore, there can be no anti-state of your inner bliss.

Transcendence is the ultimate goal. Unless one achieves it, one remains in misery, in the wheel of life and death, in samsara.

We go on creating illusions around us. We go on creating dreams around us. The real, that which is, is engulfed with our dreams, projections. This force to create illusions around oneself is maya; this power of the mind to create things which are not, to give qualities which are not. (…) This is the power of maya; this is the inner magic of your mind: it can create dreams, and it can believe in them. Of course, disillusionment is bound to come. It may take time, but it comes. Any moment the reality asserts, the dream is shattered. And when those dreams are shattered, it is not that one becomes aware of this whole fallacious game. When the dream is shattered, again the mind begins to create another dream. This shattering of particular dreams is not the shattering of maya. The rishi says that maya is a natural capacity to hypnotize yourself; it is auto-hypnosis. (…) for a seeker of the truth, of the real, this power, this maya, must be understood deeply, because this is our bondage; this is our ignorance; this is our insanity; this is our suffering – creating dreams, and then creating frustrations; creating illusions, and then disillusionments. And one goes on repeating, lives and lives one goes on repeating, and the power goes on working again and again. (…) The projector is within, but we never become aware of the projector; we always become aware of the projected scene, of the projected phenomenon. (…) This is maya: the capacity to project images on the screen of consciousness. (…) Brahman is the screen, but we have never seen the screen, because there is a continuous flow of images. One image is followed by another; one image is replaced by another. Slow down your projecting; slow down your projecting machinery. Meditate. This auto-hypnosis must be broken; otherwise you are never face to face with reality. And unless one is face to face with reality, unless one is in an encounter with the real, one is not. You can dream only if you are asleep, and you can project only if you are in ignorance. So ignorance means spiritual sleep, a spiritual somnambulism. (…) As we are, we are in maya; as we can be, our potentiality is Brahman. (…) Maya is hypnosis; meditation is de-hypnosis. (…) In maya, you go far away from yourself; in meditation, you come back to yourself.

We never feel that we are in the body, but we feel that we are the body. The witnessing self is never felt. We always feel some identity; we always feel some identification. And the witnessing consciousness is the reality. (…) Disassociate yourself from the false identities. (…) The host is your witnessing; be centered in the host. (…) Remember the host; constantly remember the host.

Being precedes knowing, knowledge, doing, everything; and that which precedes knowing cannot be known by knowledge. That which precedes cannot be reached by any doing whatsoever.

The Master means one who has disappeared already; the disciple means one who has to disappear.

We feel the other as the other because we are unfulfilled. Once we are fulfilled, the other is dissolved. In a fulfilled mind, there is no feeling of the other. Totally fulfilled, the universe and you become one.

A mind with no doubt is faith.

This is the right sequence: to begin with the cosmic, then to come to the self, then to the mind, then to the body. (…) Begin from the within, and then come to the without; start from the center towards the periphery, and then everything becomes easy, effortless. Effort is felt because we begin from the without. (…)

Because we are so asleep, we have to begin with the body. (…) Ordinarily, one has to begin with the body, then go to meditation, to devotion, and then to faith.

How does the mind move outward? It moves for wealth; it moves for prestige; it moves for power. Any movement means a deep desire for something outside, a deep desire for something which belongs to the objective world. Any desire for any object or experience in the world is a movement outward. Renounce this movement. (…) Don't move outward, and you will find yourself in the heart. (…) In the deep inactivity of renunciation, you will come to the center.

Your body must be in a deep cooperation; otherwise meditation will be unnecessarily difficult. Your body must be in such a state that it helps, not hinders. As it is ordinarily, it is a deep hindrance. (…) if you want to transform, you must purify the body first. First, you must not be identified with it; that is the first and the most basic impurity. One must not be identified with one's body. One must remain in a beyondness, in a transcendence.

Purify the heart by looking at the positive. (…) The heart must be purified by a positive foundation given to it.

Man lives in a deep hypnosis. Whatsoever we feel, whatsoever we think, is based on hypnotic projections. (…) This phenomenon of projection is basic to our minds. We live not in the objective world, but in a projected world. (…) there are as many worlds as there are minds. Everyone is living in his own individual world – multi-worlds, multi-verses. (…) De-hypnosis, or meditation, means: how to bring your consciousness, which has become projected on to the object, back home.

Any search, any inner search begins with elimination, begins with the negative. One has to know what one is not in order to know what one is. (…) The negative is the beginning, and the positive is the realization. (…) The negatives are the periphery; the positive is the center. So if you want to enter the center, you have to pass through the periphery. (…) And only when you are past all the nots, all the negatives, then you enter the positive; then you become aware of what you are. (…) When the negative is completed, you fall into the positive. (…) Renouncing that which you are not is the alpha and the omega, the beginning and the end.

Mind is the accumulator; meditation is the eliminator. (…) Meditation is a process of elimination; (…) if you meditate, then you go on destroying your mind.

The word veda means knowledge, authentic knowledge. (…) Veda is authentic knowledge about the inner one.

For me, there is neither virtue nor sin. (…) Totality is both and neither. (…) Virtue and sin are expressions of God, not his being. (…) Expression is inevitably dual; existence is non-dual. (…) The Hindu concept is that good and bad balance existence; they are not contradictory, but complementary. (…) Nothing is contradictory; there is no deep opposition in anything. All things are interconnected and complement one another; one cannot exist without the other. (…) The lotus is born out of the mud; the dirty mud is not against the lotus – they are two parts of one process.

To me, religious life is not only experience, but also creativity. You must know the Divine and you must express it also, because then, when it is expressed, it can create the same thirst in others. When expressed, it can hit other's sleep also; it can make them aware of a different dimension also. When someone is in a blissful state, he is creating vibrations around him. This ecstasy can be felt; others' hearts will be touched by it. And if you can create ripples around you, vibrations, you have served the world, and there is no other way to serve it; you have served the Divine, and there is no other way to serve it.

Be blissful. Don't allow yourself to be miserable; (…) don't cooperate with misery. (…) Be blissful in every state of mind. Whatsoever happens outside, don't allow it to disturb your bliss. (…) Remember, everything is an interpretation. If you want to be miserable, you will interpret it in that way. If you want to be blissful, the same situation will be interpreted in a different way.

The keys of spiritual alchemy can be handed to you only when your total being has become receptive to them. They are powerful seeds; they will grow in you; but one has to become a womb to receive them.

Samadhi means entering into yourself without the mind. (…) When you leave the mind behind, you take a jump into the ocean and you become one with the ocean. (…) Consciousness takes a jump into greater consciousness, the absolute.

A jivanmukta means one who has attained to the inner sky, but still he will have to live in the body. (…) Knowledge of the inner self is not cessation of all karmas. The past karmas will drop only when they have reached their target, when they are fulfilled. Past karmas will continue for a while, until their momentum is finished. But now, no new karmas will be accumulated. And while the old karmas are going on in their continuity, you will know that they are not related to you; you will remain in your unrelatedness. (…) The conditionings go on flowing, but there is no relationship; you remain a witness. (…) If you stop pedaling your bicycle, it will go a little while, and then it will drop. The same happens with your body, your mind. It is just a cycle, just a mechanism. It will move, but without you, it cannot move far. Unless it is fed continually, fueled continually, it cannot move very far; it will drop.

If you are unaware of yourself, then your own reality is projected onto dreams; then your own reality is transferred to the dreams. Your own existence is transferred to dreams and experiences and thoughts, and they become real. They have a borrowed reality; your own reality has gone to them. They are not real.

The world is just an interpretation of your own state of mind. Move in, and the outer layers disappear.

Mind has many types of thoughts. Every thought is a wavering; every thought is a wave. If there are no thoughts, then the mind will be non-wavering. A single thought, and you have trembled; you are not still. (…) The thought process is the process of wavering. (…) Non-wavering, standing still in consciousness, reveals to you the here and now.

Whenever a person can concentrate on any other thing, sex will not be a problem for him. (…) But if you cannot concentrate on anything else, then your mind will be flowing through the channel of sex constantly.

Continuously be aware that some integration must take place. No moment should be missed in which you have not tried to integrate yourself.

Use nature to transcend it. (…) The outward is just an opportunity; the inside creation is the thing. (…) The emphasis is on the upward flow. (…) Create the future; be for something. Then you become positive.

This is sensuality: senses prostituted by the mind, or mind having taken all the senses into itself. A really free consciousness will not be sensual, but will be sensitive.

The path of relaxation (surrender) and the path of effort (will) are diametrically opposite; you cannot practice both simultaneously. They lead to the same one point, but they are diametrically opposite. (…) So purity of path is a basic necessity. (…) So begin with will and put your whole being into it. Only then will you be able to know whether this path can work for you or not. (…) Surrender is an emergency door. The emergency door opens only when there is an emergency and total failure. (…) So either surrender totally or will totally. Be total, in any way, and the ego evaporates. And when there is no ego, for the first time you become aware of your real center. I call it centering; Gurdjieff calls it crystallization. Through this centering, you become a being; through this centering, you are in existence. Before this, you are in society; you are a part of civilization, of culture, of language, of a religion – but not of existence. (…) And once you are centered, you belong to that which is beyond, which is eternal; then you come to the source. (…) Gurdjieff used to say that you are not; you are just a construct. Unless you find something which has not come through the parents, not come through society, not come at all to you, something which you are, unless you find that, you are not a centered being; you go on living on the periphery. (…) The peripheral existence has been called sansar, the world; the centered existence is called nirvana. (…) Witnessing is the technique for centering. (…) Witnessing means a state of no-mind, no-thinking. (…) Through witnessing, identification with the mind is broken. (…) Through witnessing, you reach reality.

Your mind is a collection, a multiverse, a junkyard; your nature is unity. (…) Mind will be confusion, fragmentation, conflict, contradiction, a constant tension, anguish, a longing for happiness, and everything will be fear-oriented. (…) If you are in the real center, silence will be your nature, not dependent on any situation.

The society is not interested in your self; the society is interested in your ego – because something can be done with the ego, and nothing can be done with the self. So the society helps to strengthen the ego, and you go on living around your ego. The more you grow, the more you become social, educated, cultured, civilized, the more polished an ego you have. Then you begin to function from the ego, not from the self, because you are not aware of it at all. So your essence goes into the unconscious, into inner darkness, and a false construct, the ego, becomes the center. Ego is identification, bondage; the self is freedom, total freedom.

If you go on a lonely retreat in non-relationship, the ego cannot exist. (…) That's why this retreating into loneliness became a deep sadhana. (…) Mahavir was in loneliness continuously for twelve years, just to dissolve the ego, the social construct. He chose to be without a center for the time being, so that the real center, the authentic center, could come up. (…) Unless you dissolve the false center, you cannot reach to the real center – the ego goes substituting for it. (…) You will be thrown into chaos, because you will be, for a certain period, without any center. This chaos has to be faced. Unless you face it, you cannot be centered in your self. You have to pass through this. Christian mystics have called this "the dark night of the soul". Really, one just becomes mad. (…) You have nowhere to function from; you have no unity now. You are just fragments with no energy in them, with no center, with no focus. You are a crowd. This madness has to be faced. This is the only courage the religious revolution needs – to be mad, to be without a center; this is the real austerity – to pass through it without creating any false center again. (…) This passing through a chaos without any center, being a chaos, ultimately throws you down to the center, the real center, to the self. (…) You will have to wait. This waiting may take any length of time. Nothing can be said. Mahavir, the son of a great king, had to be in loneliness for twelve years; Mohammed, a poor man with no developed ego, was in loneliness only for thirty days; Jesus, also a poor man with nothing to help his ego, was in loneliness for only forty days. The more civilization progresses, the more difficult it is – because every progressive civilization is bound to have a solidifying effect on the egos that constitute that civilization.

Go deep in meditation, and remain with reality without thoughts.

Unless you go to worship with a witnessing nature inside, your going is futile.

You can never go beyond the mind if you go on using it. You have to make a jump, and meditation means that jump. (…) It cannot be made logical; it cannot be reduced to reason. You have to experience it. If you experience, only then do you know.

The moment the ego is surrendered, you are left with your inner self awakened.

Fasting, vigilance in the night – many are the methods to work directly to create more awareness in yourself, to bring yourself above your so-called sleepy existence. (…) The path of will is a lonely path. You cannot even have a helper with you, because then the struggle loosens, then the struggle becomes partial. Then you can depend on someone else, and wherever there is dependence, sleep comes in. One has to be totally independent; only then can one be awake. (…) All the methods of witnessing belong to this path; so when I say, "be a witness", it is meant for those who are travellers on the path of will.

Surrender is concerned with your ego, not with your self. In surrender, you have to give up your ego. Of course, you cannot give up your self; that's impossible – whatsoever you can give up is bound to be your ego. Only the ego can be given up, because it is just incidental to you. (…) The yoga sutras say that God is just a device to be surrendered to. Whether God is or is not is not meaningful; you need not bother about it. (…) Surrendering is throwing the ego, and suddenly you become aware, aware of the inner center.

The yogi is trying to be, and the bhakta is trying not to be. The yogi is trying to be aware, and the bhakta is trying to be totally lost.

Don't fight; don't indulge – both are easy. The only thing which is very uncomfortable and uneasy is to remain alert.

We live around the sex center, move around it. Whatsoever we do is related with sex, howsoever distant it may look. (…) unless we grow in consciousness, we cannot go beyond it. That is the most unconscious-rooted center, the lowest, and for that reason the deepest and the most unconscious. The higher you move in consciousness, the further you go from sex. And then, there is a flowering of a different type. The whole energy moves to the seventh chakra, sahasrar. And when the whole energy comes to the seventh chakra state of consciousness, to the state of samadhi, it becomes a flower, one-thousand-petalled. (…) With an inner flowering, you mutate, you change, you are born anew.

Anything penetrates into sleep if it has gone deep in the mind in the day.

Repeating a particular mantra without awareness will create stupidity, even madness. (…) The science of japa is not just to repeat; repetition is secondary. It is just a device to create something of which to be aware. The real thing is to be aware; the basic thing is to be aware.

A spiritual vision destroys the ego completely; a projected dream strengthens the ego. (…) If your mind is creating visions, your mind will be strengthened. If visions are coming from beyond, your mind will be destroyed.

Unless man reaches to the transcendental, man will have to be provided with toys. He will have to be provided with false meanings.

Bodhisattva means one who has become a Buddha, but is still holding himself in the world of time and space, to help others. Bodhisattva means "essentially a body", who is just ready to drop and disappear, to go into nirvana. Nothing remains to be solved; all his problems are solved. There is no need for him to be here, but he still is here. There is nothing else to be learned here, but he is still here. And he is keeping himself in body-form, in mind-form; he is keeping the whole ladder. He has gone beyond, but he is keeping the whole ladder, out of compassion. (…) When a man has reached to the seventh rung, for a few days, for a few years, he can use the six rungs. He can go back and use them, but by and by, they start breaking. By and by, they start dying. A bodhisattva can be here only for one life, at the most. Then he has to disappear, because the mechanism disappears.

Thought cannot operate in truth, but truth can operate through thoughts. You cannot attain to truth by thinking, but when you have attained it, you can use thinking in its service. That's what I am doing; that's what Buddha has done; that's what all the Masters have done.

The more you accumulate, the more penetratingly you feel the inner poverty.

Meditation is an insight that all goals are false. Meditation is an understanding that desires don't lead anywhere. (…) Meditation cannot be attained, because meditation cannot have a motive. When you attain something, you attain through a motive.

To be poor has nothing to do with spirituality, neither has being rich anything to do with spirituality. Those are irrelevant facts. The poor also looks outside, as much as the rich. (…) Security is on the inward path. (…) Clouds come and go, and the sky abides.

When the mind has come to a stop and is no longer interested in attaining anything, then it attains Buddhahood.

Only on one thing does one have to rely, and that is awareness, attentiveness. Only one thing does one have to rely upon, and that is one's own inner source, being. Through meditation, everything else has to be dropped. (…) The mind that relies on something else is the ego. The ego cannot exist without props; it wants props. Something has to support it. Once all props have been removed, the ego falls to the ground and disappears. (…) If you go on peeling, you come one day to when the whole onion has disappeared, and only nothingness is left in your hands. That nothingness is bliss. Buddha says: a bodhisattva dwells without thought-coverings. He is here, but he is nobody.

Enlightenment is always through surrender, but surrender is achieved through intelligence. (…) the path is of intelligence, pure intelligence. The very word Buddha means "awakened intelligence". (…) Intelligence is the capacity to be in the present, to be here-now. Then you are awake.

The intelligent person will go inwards first. Before going anywhere else, he will go into his own being; that is the first thing, and it should have the first preference. Only when you have known yourself can you go anywhere else. Then wherever you go, you will carry a blissfulness around you, a peace, a silence, a celebration.

The Buddha's path goes through intelligence, but goes beyond it. A moment comes when intelligence has given you all that it can give; then it is no longer needed. Then finally you drop it too; its work is finished. The disease is gone; now the medicine too has to go. (…) Sometimes it happens that the disease is gone, and now you have become addicted to the medicine. This is not freedom.

The universe is needed to transcend; otherwise, how will you transcend?

Mind is needed only because you are not really conscious. If you are really conscious, then there is insight; there is no thinking. Then you act out of insight; you don't act out of the mind.

A mantra is a spell to take away things which are not really there. (…) A mantra is just a trick, a strategy to help you drop your ghosts. Once you have dropped those ghosts, then the mantra has to be dropped too. One need not carry the mantra anymore the moment one feels the ghosts have disappeared. (…) A mantra is a strategy to take away your illusions, and when the illusions are taken away, that which remains is the truth. The mantra only takes the false. It cannot give you the real; it can only take the false. But that's enough. Once the false is taken, once the false is understood as false, the truth arises. And truth is liberation.

You are a Buddha, and unless you recognize it as that, you will suffer.

A guru is one who makes you free. A guru is one who delivers you freedom. A guru is one who liberates you.

Knowledge, the very idea of knowledge, is part of human stupidity. Life is such a mystery, it cannot be known.

Think of your mind as a bubble. Like bubbles, all mind experiences burst sooner or later, and then nothingness is left in the hands.

Life is always fresh; (…) life always brings new situations. (…) Any step which is in accordance with truth, any step which has the quality of suchness in it, is appropriate. (…) Out of mind, there is no appropriate step; out of mind, all steps are inappropriate.

Borrowed knowledge is not going to help; (…) borrowed knowledge is always false. The source may have been true, but the moment it comes into you, you are untrue, so it becomes untrue. For the truth to exist in you, you will have to become true yourself. One has to go into one's own being to find the truth.

Right-mindfulness is the flavor of understanding, the fragrance of insight, not the outcome of practice.

Philosophy is unnecessary, pointless curiosity. And you can go on and on, ad nauseam. Avoid! (…) Philosophy is abstraction, speculation, mind gymnastics, hair-splitting. (…) Philosophy is always out and about; it goes round and round in circles; it never arrives anywhere.

It is not that seekers leave their families, leave the world. It looks that way, but it is not. They are not negatively leaving something; they are not escaping. The act is positive; it is a movement toward aloneness. They are in search of being totally alone, (…) and only then is enlightenment achieved. (…) Real courage is the courage to be alone. It means a conscious realization of the fact that you are alone and that you cannot be otherwise. (…) You can deceive yourself for lives and lives, but you will just go on in a vicious circle. Only if you can live with this fact of aloneness is the circle broken, and you come to the center. That center is the center of Divineness, of the Whole.

Living with facts is the only yoga, the only discipline. Once you are totally aware of the human situation, you become religious. You become a master of yourself. The austerity that comes is not the austerity of an ascetic; (…) you feel that it is the only thing possible, that you cannot do otherwise. Then you renounce things; you become nonpossessive.

The mystic knows directly; there is no interpretation.

Ambition starts in such a way that you never become aware what poison it contains in it. The bottle of ambition contains pure poison, but the label is not that of poison; the label says it is nectar.

"Holier-than-thou" is in fact everybody's lifelong mantra, in different ways. Somebody is trying to show his ego by his money, somebody by his knowledge, somebody by his political power, somebody by his austerities, somebody by his religiousness. But it is all the same – only excuses differ, but the motive is the same: somehow to prove that "I am greater than you, holier than you, wiser than you, more virtuous than you".

The fulfilled person accepts with joy whatsoever is happening. If life is happening, good; if death is happening, good. He lives in a dance; he dies in a dance. He cannot commit suicide; suicide certainly shows that he is still incomplete. Something in him is still desiring; something in him still wants – what it wants is immaterial.

Austerity without insight is nothing but a slow suicide; it is a crime against life and existence.

In my observation, if a person is totally creative, he will transcend sex without repressing it, because his own energy will become creative. He will not need go into sex; the very need will disappear. He has now a far higher bliss happening in him; the lower is bound to disappear when you have the higher in your hands. A real poet while producing, creating, composing, forgets all about sex. A real sculptor absorbed in his work forgets all about sex. Even if a naked woman passes by, he will not look at her; his concentration is so total in his own creativity. A real dancer disappears in his dance; his ego, his sex – all are dissolved into his dance. But if sex is repressed, then just the contrary will be the result – your creativity will be repressed; (…) creativity disappears when you repress sex. If your sex life is flowing joyously, you have tremendous interest in everything you are doing; otherwise you become disinterested, everything seems to be meaningless. (…) When you repress sex, the whole energy becomes self-torture. (…) Remember that sex is the lowest pleasure. According to me, sex is the seed – the pleasure. If sex is allowed natural growth, respected, valued, then a transformation happens, a metamorphosis happens. Sex starts growing into other creative dimensions. (…) But the so-called religions crippled humanity from the very base; they destroyed the roots.

Religion exists only in the presence of a Master. The moment the Master leaves, the religion disappears.

Only stupid people are going to remain in churches; intelligent ones are bound to escape.

Everything can be used, that's why I am against renunciation; everything in life can be used. Yes, even wine can be used. You can drink it, but in small quantities in the beginning, and remain alert – just a little quantity and then remain alert. Try to be alert when the wine starts functioning in you. If you can be alert with wine, then go on increasing the dose. One day you can drink the wine just like water, and still you are alert. And if you can drink the whole bottle and remain alert, then nobody can make you unenlightened again. Impossible.

Meditation comes to you. It always comes; you cannot bring it. But one has to be in search of it. (…) So search, be a seeker, and do not be a disciple. (…) Grope in the dark. Nothing else can be done. The very groping will become the understanding that will liberate you from darkness.

When you are no more, you are in meditation.

There is no such thing as sex energy. Energy is one and the same. Sex is one outlet for it, one direction for it; it is one of the applications of the energy. Life energy is one, but it can manifest in many directions. Sex is one of them. When life becomes biological, it becomes sex energy. Sex is just an application of life energy. So there is no question of sublimation. If life energy flows in another direction, there is no sex. But it is not a sublimation; it is a transformation. Sex is the natural, biological flow of life energy, and the lowest application of it. It is natural, because life cannot exist without it; and the lowest, because it is the foundation, not the peak. When sex becomes the totality, the whole life is just a waste. It is like laying a foundation and going on laying the foundation, without ever building the house for which the foundation is meant. Sex is just an opportunity for a higher transformation of life energy. (…) When the gate to the Divine is open, all the energies that are within you begin to flow toward that door. Sex is absorbed; sex is transcended. Whenever a higher bliss is possible, the lower forms of bliss become irrelevant. They just wither away. (…) Anything done negatively with sex, or with any energy, will not transform the energy. On the contrary, it will create a conflict within you that will be destructive. When you fight with an energy, you are fighting with yourself. No one can win a fight against his own energy. One moment you will feel that you have won, and the next moment you will feel that sex has won. This will go on continuously. (…) Sex should be taken for what it is. It is just the biological foundation for life to exist. Do not give it any spiritual or antispiritual meaning. Simply understand the biological fact of it. (…) Do not do anything for it or against it. Let it be as it is; accept it. Don't take an abnormal attitude towards it. (…) Sex is so important, so compelling, so intense, because the whole of nature insists on it; otherwise man could not continue to be. (…) Sex is so compulsive, so nonvoluntary, it is so great a force, that it cannot be transcended until someone has achieved the Divine. So brahmacharya became a criterion to know whether a person has reached the Divine. The sex, as it exists for normal beings, will not exist for him. The reverse is a fallacy; this does not mean that by dropping sex, one will achieve the Divine. (…) Then you will have a suppressive mind, not a transcended one. Sex will go on bubbling inside you and will create inner hell. When sex becomes suppressed, it becomes unhealthy, neurotic, perverted. (…) Then what is to be done? Move into sex consciously. If you go into sex unconsciously, then you are just an instrument in the hands of biological evolution, but if you can be conscious in the sex act, the very consciousness becomes a deep meditation. (…) And if you can be conscious in the sex act, then there is no other act in life in which you cannot be conscious, because no act is as deep as sex. If you can become aware in the sex act, then even in death you will be aware. The depth of the sex act and the depth of death are the same, parallel; you come to the same point. (…) So use sex as an act of meditation – meditate on it; transcend it. (…) Make it transparent; anything that becomes transparent will disappear. (…) Go beyond it, because greater bliss awaits you. (…) Do not fight it; do not go against it. You cannot fight with nature; you are part and parcel of it. You must have a friendly, sympathetic attitude towards sex; it is the deepest dialogue between you and nature.

Kundalini is the focused energy of the human body and human psyche. (…) Kundalini means your total potential, your total possibility. (…) Your needs are in conflict. Society requires one thing, and your instincts require something quite contradictory. Social requirements and personal requirements are in conflict. Society has its requirements; morality and religion have their requirements. These conflicts have prevented man from being a harmonious whole; they have made man fragmentary. In the morning, one thing is required; in the afternoon, something else is required. Your wife requires something from you; your mother requires something quite contrary. Then day-to-day life becomes a conflicting demand on you, and the minute part of your total energy that has become manifest is in conflict with itself. There is also another conflict. The part that has become manifest will always be in conflict with the part that has not yet become manifest; the actual will always be in conflict with the potential. The potential will push itself to be manifested, and the actual will suppress it. To use psychological terms, the unconscious is always in conflict with the conscious. (…) These two types of conflict are why you are not in harmony. And if you are not in harmony, your energy will become antagonistic to you. The movement of energy is only possible if there is no suppression. Otherwise, your energy becomes an enemy to you; you become a house divided against itself; you become a crowd. (…) When your energy comes into harmonious unity, this is what is meant by kundalini. Kundalini is just a technical term for your whole energy when it is in unity, in movement, in harmony, without any conflict, when it is cooperative, complementary and organic. Then and there, there is a transformation.

When energies are in conflict, you want to relieve them. You feel at ease only when your conflicting energies are released, thrown off. But whenever you throw them off, your life energy, your vitality, moves downward or outward. The downward movement is the outward movement; and the upward movement is the inward movement. The more your energies go up, the more they go in; the more they go down, the more they move out. If you throw your conflicting energies out, you will feel relief, but that is just like throwing your life away in bits and fragments, in installments; it is suicidal. Unless our life energy becomes one and harmonious, and the flow becomes inward, we are suicidal. When you are throwing out energy, you feel relieved; but the relief is bound to be momentary, because you are a constant source of energy – energy accumulates again, and you will have to get rid of it again. What is ordinarily known as pleasure is just a throwing off of conflicting energies. Pleasure means that you are relieved of a burden; it is always negative, never positive. But bliss is positive; it comes only when your energies are fulfilled. When your energies are not thrown out but have an inward flowering, when you become one with them and are not in conflict with them, then there is a movement inward. That movement is endless. It becomes deeper and deeper, and the deeper it goes, the more blissful it becomes, the more ecstatic. (…) Kundalini means that energies move from the periphery towards the center. The movement inward, the center-oriented movement, is blissful, while the outward movement gives both happiness and misery – there will be momentary happiness and permanent misery. (…) The actual result is always misery.

This is the paradox: you go on creating energy, and you don't know what to do with it. When it is created, you throw it off, and when it is not created, you feel miserable. (…) The first illness is that of weakness; and the second illness is that of energy that has become a burden to you. (…) This is absurd, but this absurdity is what we ordinarily mean by human existence – constantly creating energy that constantly becomes burdensome, and that you constantly have to relieve. That's why sex has become so important, so significant, because it is one of the greatest means to rid yourself of energy. If the society becomes affluent, you have more sources through which energy can be created. Then you become more sexual, because you have more tensions to relieve. (…) So there is a constant creating of energy and throwing out of energy. (…) Kundalini means to change this absurd situation into a meaningful one. (…) The way to make energy creative is first to understand that you should not realize only part of your potential. If one part is realized and the remaining, major portion of your potential is unrealized, it is not a situation that can be creative. The whole must be realized; your whole potential must be actualized. (…) The part of your energy that has become actualized is your life; the remaining part is asleep as if it were not – but it can be awakened.

When energy flows outward, you feel exhausted. (…) When energy flows inward, you feel fresh, vitalized, fulfilled. (…) your breath (pranayama) will begin to have a different quality; it will be relaxed, rhythmic, harmonious; (…) it becomes subtle. (…) The Buddha's posture, padmasan, the lotus posture, is one of the postures in which the least amount of energy is needed. (…) It is a round posture – energy becomes circular; it is not thrown out. Energy always moves out through the fingers, hands or feet. But through a round shape, energy cannot flow out. (…) All the energy outlets are joined together in padmasan, so no energy can move outward. Both feet are crossed, the hands touch the feet, and the feet touch the sex center. And the posture (asana) is so erect that there is no gravitational pull. In this posture, one can forget the body completely, because energy is not flowing outward. The eyes are also to be closed or half closed and the eyeballs still, because eyes are also a great outlet of energy. (…) The more energy goes inward, the more harmony there is. Conflicts drop; in the center, there is no conflict – there is bliss, an organic unity of the Whole.

Asanas and pranayama are bodily helps, physical helps. If your mind is in conflict, they will not be of much use. (…) Body and mind are one energy. (…) One has to work from both polarities, body and mind. Raja yoga and other yogas are basically concerned with mental attitudes. (…) The body should be trained through yogic methodology, and the mind through awareness. You will require more awareness if you practice yoga, because things will become very subtle. (…) If people practice awareness techniques and simultaneously practice yogic methods, they will know deeper realms of awareness. Otherwise, they will be aware only of the gross. If you change the gross, but do not change the subtle, you will be in a dilemma. Now conflict will assert itself in a new way. Yoga is helpful; the other part is mindfulness. Practice yoga, so that the body becomes rhythmic and cooperative with your inner movements; and simultaneously practice mindfulness. (…) If you can become aware of your breathing, then you can become aware of your thought process; otherwise not. (…) Buddha talks about anapanasati, the yoga of awareness of the incoming and outgoing breath. (…) One should begin from breathing and never from the thought process itself. When you can feel the subtle movements of breath, only then will you be able to feel the subtle movements of thought. Asanas and pranayama will change the quality of the body; awareness of the thought process will change the quality of the mind. Then the moment comes when your body and mind are one, without any conflict at all. When they are synchronized, you are neither body nor mind. For the first time, you know yourself as the self; you transcend. You can transcend only when there is no conflict.

Pure awareness, awareness without being aware of anything, is the moment of explosion. Your potential becomes actual. You explode into a new realm, the Ultimate. This Ultimate is the concern of all religions. (…) There are many ways to reach the Ultimate. (…) But what is signified by the word kundalini is bound to be there in some way or other as inward flow of energy. The inward flow is the only revolution, the only freedom. Otherwise, you will go on creating more hells, because the more you go outward, the further you are from yourself. And the further off you are from yourself, the more ill and diseased you are. Kundalini is the original source of all life, but you are cut off from it in so many ways. Then you become an outsider to yourself, and you do not know how to come back home. This coming back is the science of yoga. As far as human transformation is concerned, kundalini yoga is the subtlest science.

Whenever you are in chaos, the brain stops working. (…) Chaotic methods are needed to push the consciousness to its roots, because only from the roots its transformation is possible. Otherwise, you will go on verbalizing, and there will be no transformation.

Wherever man has created systems to explain existence, he has created games. If you accept the first step as true, then the whole system works perfectly; but if you don't accept the first step, the whole edifice falls down. The whole edifice is an exercise in imagination. It is good, poetic, beautiful. But once a system insists that its version of existence is the absolute truth, it becomes violent and destructive.

The original source of all tension is becoming. One is always trying to be something; no one is at ease with himself as he is. The being is not accepted; the being is denied; and something else is taken as the ideal to become. So the basic tension is always between that which you are and that which you long to become. (…) Only if we accept ourselves totally is there no tension. This total acceptance is the miracle, the only miracle. (…) If this acceptance becomes total, then, in a single moment, the whole crowd disappears.

Never betray your own innermost experience. If you betray it, you are committing a deep suicide – you are destroying your very soul. It is better to suffer on the path of truth.

Gurdjieff was capable of changing his mask because he knew his original face, his pure self.

People are not really interested in getting out of prison. If they were interested, then nobody could prevent them.

The person who has only a part of his being actualized is in conflict with the other part which is not actualized. Half of him is paralyzed; he needs all kinds of crutches. He is not able to stand on his own feet; he cannot live out of his own being. He remains a beggar; he cannot be an emperor. To be whole is to be an emperor.

The moment you discover your being, there is no ego found. Ego is only a projection. Ego is not knowing your being; not being aware of your being is what ego is all about. So there is no question of dropping it.

A really religious person is not a man of will. A really religious person has dropped his will; he allows God's will to flow through him.

When you discover yourself, you become a Master. You don't serve anybody else's purposes; you start living on your own.

Sex is an animal act. That's what I mean when I say that sex for reproduction is sinful, because it is unconscious, unmeditative. You are not consciously doing it; you are forced to do it by some unconscious forces. (…) I am all for creativity, but remember, reproduction is not creativity. Creativity is meditative.

Man exists as a bridge between two infinities: the infinity of ignorance, and the infinity of knowledge.

A man unconscious of his own being, unaware of himself, is the creator of problems. Not knowing who he is, what he is, without any acquaintance of himself, he goes on creating problems – because unless you know yourself, you cannot know for what you are existing and living; you cannot know where you have to move; you cannot feel what your destiny is; and you can never feel any meaning. You will go on doing many things, but everything will ultimately lead you to frustration – because if you do anything without knowing who you are, it is not going to give you a deep contentment; it is irrelevant. The very point is missed; your effort is wasted. And, ultimately, everyone is frustrated – those who succeed more so than those who are not successful, because those who are not successful can still hope. Nothing fails like success; the case of the successful becomes hopeless.

Sex is the basic energy. Because of sex, you are born, and because of sex, you will die. Thirty-five is the peak age, and then everything declines – seventy or so will be the death age. If fifty can be the peak of sexual energy, then a hundred will be the death age; (…) now life will be lengthened.

We do not know anything about the world. We have created our own mental world. Everyone has his own world – this world of past and future, this world of memories and desires. This world is false, illusory. And when your world is no more, you will come to know the real world – that is the Brahman, that is the truth. (…) The real is hidden behind our dreams; this dreaming must be broken.

Unless you cease to be, you cannot be still. (…) Man needs continuous contact with the inner source; otherwise he will be living an exhausted life.

Suffering is not something contrary to richness; suffering makes you rich. Suffering gives you depth. Someone who has not suffered at all will just be superficial. The more you suffer, the more you have touched deeper realms. The more sensitive a person, the deeper the mind, the deeper becomes your suffering. A brutish person, a shallow mind will not suffer.

One rises into knowledge by throwing ignorance; and then one rises into enlightenment by throwing knowledge.

Remember one thing: you are responsible for whatever you are. (…) Transcend yourself; become a Master.

If you want inner growth, then acceptance is the law.

No one is born as a tabula rasa, because this childhood is not the beginning; this life is not the beginning. So every child is not just a child, but many old men are within him – many lives. He has reached old age many times, and that memory is always preserved. The mind continues with it. (…) Western psychology says that your parents, your education, your heredity, they determine everything. (…) But really, you have chosen your parents, your environment and your circumstances. They determine you because you have allowed them to determine you. So ultimately, you remain responsible. (…) Really, all yoga is concerned only with this: how you can get out of all the influences that have made you whatsoever you are. (…) But Western psychology is creating a very harmful attitude. They say that when you are seven, your attitude is fixed, and now nothing can be done. If this becomes your thought, then nothing can be done; this very thinking will become the barrier. (…) This is defeatism. If you cannot do anything, if you cannot transform yourself, you lose all human dignity. You have become just an automaton, a mechanical thing; you will run the course. This is most degrading.

Total contentment is wisdom. (…) Contentment means consciousness here and now. (…) Discontentment means comparison with the ideal, with the past, with the future.

Go on throwing your gods, creating them and throwing them. Only then can you reach that God which is not your creation. The images are your creations, so they have an instrumental value. They are symbolic; they are devices; they are necessary. Create an image, but do not stick to it. No clinging is allowed. When the worship is over, throw it; throw it back in the mud. It is again mud. Then do not retain it. This is a very deep psychological process, because to throw a god needs courage; to throw a god needs detachment. (…) Remember this: everything that is to be used will have to be dispersed; everything that is used as a device will have to be discarded. In the very process of using, one becomes attached.

Buddha talks about the way, never about the goal; (…) he has not even a single word for the goal – God, Brahma, truth, the absolute, the kingdom of God. (…) All that he talks about is the way. (…) Because he says, "What to say about the goal? It is futile to talk about it. If you know, you know. If you don't know, there is no way to know about it before you reach it."

Buddha emphasizes very much the idea of a homeless wanderer, the idea of homelessness. The idea is tremendously significant, (…) because this life is a flux; this life is not more than momentary. We are here only for a few moments. (…) Everybody is here only for the weekend. Life is really very short. (…) To make this place a home is absurd; the home is not possible here – the home is possible only in eternity. (…) Yes, you can pitch tents here, but you cannot make a home. (…) Everything is constantly slipping out of your hands; there is no way to cling to anything; there is no way to possess anything. (…) Buddha says to understand this homelessness, to understand it deep in your awareness, is to become a sannyasin.

A man who lives in passion, in desire, lives a futile life – always miserable, always dreaming, continuously clinging to that which he has and continuously desiring for that which he doesn't have.

Relationship is impossible; (…) all relationship is just an absurd effort. (…) Relationship is just a make-believe. (…) It makes life a little more comfortable, but that comfort is illusory. The other remains the other, and there is no way to penetrate the mystery of the other. We are alone. (…) in the very nature of things, attachment is an impossibility. You are trying to do something which reality does not allow. Your aloneness is eternal.

If you want to get rid of your ego, you will have to move in a very scientific way. That's what Buddha is doing. (…) There are three layers of the ego. First layer, the world – your house, your car, your bank balance. Second, attachments – your relationships, your affairs, your children, wife, husband, friends, enemies. And the deepest layer, you. And these are joined together. (…) First, no home; second, no relationships; third, no self. (…) This is what liberation is in the buddhist way. This is nobodyness; (…) this is what nirvana is.

Buddha says a real man of understanding does not even hanker for enlightenment. Because even to desire enlightenment is to desire, and desire is misery. (…) What you desire is irrelevant – you desire; that's enough to make you miserable. Desire means you are not here-now; you have moved away from reality; you have moved away from that which is. Desire means you have fallen into the trap of a dream.

Buddha says if you surrender the ego, if you surrender yourself, you come in a harmony with the law, and everything starts happening on its own. You have but to surrender. (…) The man of understanding is in a total let-go. He allows the law to function. (…) Harmony happens only when you are in tune with the Whole. To be with the Whole is to be holy.

Only a person who is on the verge of suicide can be a real sannyasin. (…) Sannyas is a transformation of life; suicide is an escape from life. (…) Suicide is useless; (…) again you will be back, again and again you will be back. (…) With sannyas, the door opens. You may not come back, or, even if you come back, you will come back in a better way, more aware. Even if you come, you will come to learn something, to mature. (…) The anagamin is the one who has committed real suicide, who has died a spiritual death, who has carried his own cross. He never comes back. He is really finished with the world; he has closed his accounts with the world. He has now far better ways of being. (…) He goes on soaring higher and higher towards the source of light.

Sannyas is not a goal; sannyas is an understanding that goals don't exist.

Buddha says unless you can see the whole nonsense of repetition, you will continue to repeat. (…) If you understand a thing, then it is your first and last. Then you have had enough of it.

Great is the heart that is in accord with the way. But it cannot happen immediately. First you will have to discipline, and then you will have to drop discipline also. First you will have to make it a point to relax, and then you will have to forget relaxation also. First you will have to fight with your old, ingrained habits, and once you have got over them, you have to drop new habits that you must have created in fighting with the old. First you have to meditate; then one day, you have to drop meditation also. (…) Great is one whose ego has disappeared, who is completely merged into the Whole. (…) Life is just a training; one has to become transcendent.

Life is not against you, but if you fight with it, you will be destroyed by your own violence. (…) The moment you decide to cooperate, you become a sannyasin.

One who does not exist as an ego is meek. (…) Meekness means the attitude of no-conflict, the attitude of harmony.

When you live in your thoughts, in identification with your thoughts, then you live in restlessness; you dissipate your energy. These thoughts take too much energy out of you; your whole energy will be wasted. (…) Meditation is nothing but absolute rest.

The whole day, the dust collects. (…) At least twice a day, you should cleanse your mind, so you have clarity, so you have transparency. (…) If you clean the mind rightly before you go to sleep, dreams will disappear.

Sense is very narrow; nonsense is very vast.

Every tension has to come to a point where you cannot go anymore. (…) When the extreme is touched, relaxation settles in. The same happens in the mind. The worry goes to a climax, a peak, and then suddenly all thoughts fall away, and the disciple is sitting there on a lotus flower – no worry, no problem, no koan, nothing. The goose is out; (…) that constant thinking was the bottle in which one was confined.

The ego goes on fishing in lakes where fishes are not. (…) In all your desires, you are seeking a state of contentment. But desires cannot bring it. Desires create more ripples on your lake; desires create more restlessness in you. (…) You are seeking in a wrong direction.

The way will manifest itself. (…) All that is needed is that you should have an innocent, pure mind. (…) By pure, Buddha means a mind which has no content. All content brings impurity. (…) A mind full of consciousness will be empty of all content. (…) That being is purity. (…) Dropping mentation is what meditation is all about.

Life is overflowing, life is blissful, but man has lost the contact with life. He has become too self-conscious. Selfconsciousness functions as a barrier, and one remains alive, yet not truly alive. Selfconsciousness is the disease.

God is the goal; to be human is the journey.

Man is expelled from one home so that he can search another.

A man who is really mature has no will of his own. He says, "Thy will be done." It is only immature minds who go on carrying their own will – and of course, they suffer. Will brings suffering; will is the way to hell.

Meditation is not a result of your efforts; meditation is a happening. (…) Wisdom cannot be found; it is an experience.

No belief is needed. That is Buddha's first step towards reality: all belief-systems are poisonous; all belief-systems are barriers. (…) Buddha denies metaphysics completely; he says metaphysics is a futile search.

The very nature of desire is that it always remains unfulfilled. (…) Whatsoever you do, ad infinitum it will go on arising again and again and again. (…) Desires cannot be fulfilled – not here, not in other worlds, not in another life, not in heaven.

Your innermost nature is to be blissful. For it, nothing is needed – no virtue is needed; no ascetism is needed; no sacrifice is needed. Just understanding is enough. The way of the Buddha is the way of understanding.

The higher you start reaching, the more you will feel the weight of the things you are carrying with you. The higher the altitude, the more heavy your luggage will become. You will have to drop things. If you want to reach the highest peaks, you will have to drop all.

A day is bound to come in everybody's life when a person realizes that "All that I have tried has failed". Courage is needed to recognize that "I have failed utterly"; only a courageous person can accept that "I have failed completely". Cowards always go on rationalizing: "maybe we have failed in this, but we will try another; once more". (…) That's what psychologists call the gambler's psychology; (…) the gambler goes on playing. (…) Courage is needed to recognize that "I have failed". The monk is one who has recognized the fact that "all my life-ways have failed", that "all my ideas have failed", that "my mind has proved impotent. Now I am going to make a drastic change in my life. I am going to bring a radical transformation. I will turn inwards." This turning inwards makes a man a monk. A monk is a rebellious person. He completely drops out of the society, out of relationship; (…) he turns away from that. Now he is trying to explore his heart; he is trying to explore his transcendental witnessing self.

The world is a temptation, a temptation you have to go through, a temptation that has to be suffered. And the devil is a partner with God; he is not the enemy. If you go wholeheartedly with him, sooner or later you will understand that he is the deceiver. And the moment you realize that the devil is the deceiver, the devil disappears.

Buddha's whole effort is to make you aware that whatsoever you are, the cause is your mind. (…) When the mind goes against the natural law, dhamma, when the mind goes against the current, then there are problems, there is misery. When the mind simply follows the stream like a driftwood, it is happy. And one day, it reaches to the Ultimate, the oceanic bliss.

Meditation is not cheap. Meditation is a total transformation of your being. A great understanding is needed; a great intelligence is needed. Buddha's sutras are only for those who are really intelligent people and who really want to get out of the misery that they have created around themselves. It is only for those who are really fed up with misery and ready to get out of the trap.

The more intelligent a person, the more bored he is in the world, the more bored he is with the whole nonsense that is called life.

A man of right intention lives a life without tension. (…) When your inner reality is relaxed, there is no tension. You are not going anywhere; you are not after anything; you are just here-now, relaxed.

If you really want your words to have value, then learn silence. Keep more and more silent; then one day, you will know what right speech is.

Right livelihood means that life should be simple, not complex; life should be based on needs, not on desires.

"Authentically moral", right morality, means that you have to be moral from within. Those false faces learned from the outside won't help.

You can walk with me to a certain extent. The disciple can walk with the Master to a certain extent, but then the paths separate. Then you have to go on your own way.

There is a hierarchy of needs, and unless you have fulfilled the lower needs first, the higher needs don't arise. (…) God is the ultimate need, and now everybody thinks he should be able to approach directly and that there should be no requirements. This is absolute nonsense. Your lower needs have to be fulfilled first. (…) I have never come across a man whose lower needs are not fulfilled who can really enquire into the truth of God; not possible. (…) Then his desire remains hanging around, his unfulfilled layer. (…) It is impossible to jump to higher needs when the lower are not fulfilled.

Your real center is not only your center; it is the center of the Whole. But we have created small centers of our own, homemade, manufactured by ourselves.

The day you become courageous enough to enter into your being, you have become a sannyasin. (…) Now you are trying to live the life that is yours, authentically.

The whole goal of discipline is to come to a point where discipline can be dropped. The whole goal of religious practice, sadhana, is to come to a moment when all sadhana can be dropped and you can be simply spontaneous. Then you have flowered.

One has to be continuously aware that one's life energy should not be wasted unnecessarily. One should not have leakages. We are leaking; we are never a reservoir of energy. Infinite energy is given to you, but you are a leaking vessel. In every way, you dissipate energy; you never sit silently. Whenever you have energy, a great desire to throw it away arises in you. You may call it "sexual urge", or you may call it something else; it makes no difference. But whenever you have energy, a great desire arises to relieve oneself.

Be a light unto yourself. Wisdom is that which is based on your own experience. Rely only on that which you have experienced; don't rely on anything else. All that you have gathered from others, throw it. (…) Don't lean on others; lean on your own experience. (…) Even a truth becomes a lie when you have not experienced it. (…) By experiencing something in meditation, it becomes part of your being.

Gurdjieff used to call people machines, and he was right. (…) Skinner has been studying men and rats and finds no difference. Rats are simple beings, that's all; man is a little more complicated. Man is a highly sophisticated machine; rats are simple machines. (…) The Russian psychologist Pavlov and the American psychologist Skinner are ninety-nine point nine percent right about man; they believe that man is a beautiful machine, that's all. There is no soul in him. I say ninety-nine point nine percent they are right; they only miss by a very small margin. In that small margin are the Buddhas, the awakened ones.

You are alive only in the proportion that you are aware. Awareness is the difference between death and life.

Consciousness goes inwards; unconsciousness goes outwards. Unconsciousness makes you interested in others – things, people, but it is always the others. Unconsciousness keeps you completely in darkness; your eyes go on being focused on others. It creates a kind of exteriority; it makes you extroverts. Consciousness creates interiority; it makes you introverts – it takes you inward, deeper and deeper. And deeper and deeper also means higher and higher. (…) But first the roots have to go downwards; only then can the tree go upwards. (…) As consciousness grows upwards, it sends its roots into your being. (…) I talk about nine states of consciousness. Your branches of consciousness will go upwards, from the so-called conscious to the real conscious, from real conscious to superconscious, from superconscious to collective conscious, from collective conscious to cosmic conscious. And your roots will be growing from so-called conscious to subconscious, from subconscious to unconscious, from unconscious to collective unconscious, from collective unconscious to cosmic unconscious. The moment your roots reach nature, your flowers start blooming in God.

Perseverance, effort, continuous effort, constant effort, will be needed. You will fall back again and again. Put your total energy into it again. Don't remain a fool; don't remain asleep; don't remain a drunkard. (…) You will have to come out of many layers of drunkenness. (…) Again and again, you will have to bring yourself to the present.

The light grows of its own accord. You simply become more silent, more watchful, more meditative, and the light descends in you – of its own accord.

Obedience is a form of stupidity, and the society wants you to be stupid. Intelligence is dangerous.

Live watchfully, and you will not be trapped. Live unconsciously, and on each step you are trapped; your life becomes more and more imprisoned.
Whatsoever you do, you do almost mechanically. You will have to de-automatize yourself. That's what meditation is all about: the process of de-automatization.

Buddha says, he never gives in to desire. Desire is an escape from the present, from the real into the unreal. The man who desires is an escapist. (…) Only a meditator is not an escapist; everybody else is. Meditation means getting out of desire, out of mind, relaxing in the here-now. Meditation is the only thing in the world which is not escapist, although it is thought to be the most escapist thing. (…) Mind is escaping from life; desire is escaping from life. (…) Meditation is not escaping from life; it is escaping into life.

Yes, meditation is fire – it burns your thoughts, your desires, your memories; it burns the past and the future. It burns your mind and the ego. It takes away all that you think that you are. It is a death and a rebirth, a crucifixion and a resurrection. You are born anew. You lose your own identity totally, and you attain to a new vision of life. That vision of life is what is meant by God, dhamma, Tao, logos.

Once the mind dies, you are born as a no-mind. That birth is enlightenment; that birth brings you for the first time to the land of peace, the lotus paradise. It brings you to the world of bliss, benediction. Otherwise, you remain in hell.

If a rich person is not religious, I call him stupid; and if a poor person is religious, I call him intelligent, really intelligent. Rare intelligence is needed for the poor man to become religious. (…) When you have not known what riches are, how can you get beyond them? One can go beyond a certain thing only when it has been experienced; it is only through experience that one surpasses and transcends. If somebody transcends without experiencing something, that simply means that he has such intelligence that he learns from others' experience; he sees the vanity and the futility of it all; he need not go into all those things on his own.

Understanding is the secret of transformation. (…) Meditation first, and then all else shall follow of its own accord.

You are not only in a jail; you have believed it to be your home, and you are decorating it. Your whole life is nothing but decorating the jail, and you are competing with other prisoners who are decorating their cells. Only somebody who is free, who has been in the jail once and is no longer in the jail, can manage to wake you, to make you aware of the reality. (…) the only hope for you is to be in deep contact with somebody who is awakened. The awakened one is called the Master – satguru.

Love has been poisoned, but not destroyed. The poison can be thrown out, out of your system – you can be cleansed. You can vomit all that the society has enforced upon you. You can drop all your beliefs and all your conditionings – you can be free. The society cannot keep you a slave forever if you decide to be free. That's what sannyas is all about.

Religion cannot be dropped, can never be dropped. Religion is not something superficial and accidental. It is an intrinsic need; it is absolutely needed.

Man is a bridge between the known and the unknown. To remain confined in the known is to be a fool. To go in search of the unknown is the beginning of wisdom. To become one with the unknown is to become the awakened one, the Buddha. (…) Man is a traveler, a pilgrim. He is not yet at home; he is in search of the home.

The path of the arhata is of pure meditation; and the path of the bodhisattva is that of pure love. Pure love contains meditation; and pure meditation contains love – but pure meditation contains love only as a flavor, a perfume; it is not the central force behind it. And pure love contains meditation as a perfume; it is not the center of it.

If you can feel your own being, your own "amness", you will find the way.

The fool is only born once, and then he goes on repeating. (…) The fool's mind is a vicious circle; (…) the fool goes on and on, living in the same desires, the same thoughts, the same memories. (…) He never endeavors to go beyond his knowledge; truth remains unknown. (…) The wise man dies to the past every moment and is born again; (…) the wise man lives every moment anew. (…) The wise man's whole life is a process of rebirthing. The wise man is not born once; he is born every moment again and again; the old never takes hold of him.

Nobody wants to live with somebody who is superior. People want to live with their inferiors, because your inferiors give you the idea that you are great.

To be with a Master, you will have to drop the idea that you are great. (…) It feels very good when you are surrounded by fools, every fool being supported by other fools. People love to be in crowds, because in the crowds, you can forget your inferiority. That's why people don't leave crowds. They cannot live alone. (…) Buddha says it is better to live alone than with fools. If you can find a Master, good; if you cannot, then it is better to be alone. Of course, it will be hard to be alone, it will be difficult, because the crowd will create so many difficulties for you. The crowd does not want individuals; it does not want anyone to be independent – it wants everybody to be dependent on the crowd. It will create trouble for you. But all those troubles are cleansing; all those troubles are challenges. They sharpen your intelligence; they will make you wise.

Nobody brings anything into the world, and nobody takes anything from the world. Alone, empty-handed, we come; alone, empty-handed, we go. The wise knows it; hence the wise claims noting as "mine". He uses things, but he does not possess them. (…) The world is a gift from God – use it, but don't possess it. The moment you become a possessor, in fact you are possessed by your things – you become a slave.

It is easy to see other people as fools, but to see your own foolishness is a great step towards wisdom. To see your own foolishness is already transforming your being, your consciousness.

The question is how deep you have loved the Master, not how long you have lived with the Master – how intensely, passionately you have become involved with the Master; not the length of time, but the depth of your feeling. (…) A single moment of awareness, and there is transmission beyond all scriptures. (…) Transmission needs a great love affair between the disciple and the Master. Knowing is possible only when the love affair is total, when the commitment is total, when the involvement is total.

Sannyas is not withdrawing from the world; it is withdrawing from the lies that you have been living up to now. It is not renouncing the world; it is renouncing the lies that you have based your life upon. The moment you withdraw yourself from the lies, they start falling, start dying, because they depend on you, they nourish themselves on you – they cannot live without your support. Withdraw your cooperation, and all lies disappear. And when all lies disappear, what is left is truth. Truth is your innermost nature.

Renounce all that is untrue. Truth is bliss; misery is an indication of untruth.

There are only two ways of living in life: the way of the mystic, and the way of the ego; the way of meditation, and the way of desire and identification.

People cling to the ego, because ego gives you a certain idea of who you are, gives you a certain clarity. But the ego is false, and the clarity is false. It is better to be confused with reality than to be clear with unreality. (…) Great chaos is bound to happen; (…) one has to pass through such chaos – that is part of spiritual growth. You have to lose the false to get to the real. But between the two, there will be an interval when the false will be gone and the true will not yet have arrived. Those are the moments, the most critical moments – these are the moments when you need a Master.

Buddha defines wisdom as living in the light of your own consciousness, and foolishness as following others, imitating others, becoming a shadow to somebody else. (…) The real Master throws you back to yourself; his whole effort is to make you independent of him. (…) The false master persuades you to follow him and to imitate. (…) A Buddha has not to be followed, but to be understood. (…) He is a mirror who reflects your original face – but don't cling to the mirror!

The ordinary human being does not want to be free; he wants to be dependent. He wants somebody else to guide him. (…) It is responsibility, the challenge of responsibility, that creates wisdom. One has to accept life with all its problems. One has to go through life unprotected; one has to seek and search one's way.

Knowledge is superficial – it does not go deep; it cannot go deep. (…) wisdom is always of the heart, remember; it is never of the head.

For a while, the fool's mischief tastes sweet, sweet as honey. But in the end, it turns bitter, and how bitterly he suffers! (…) Everything turns bitter; (…) everything finally proves to be poisonous. One who is wise will become aware while there is still time and something can be done.

Whatever a fool learns, it only makes him duller. The more knowledge he gathers, the more stupid he becomes. (…) The dull person cannot enquire; he cannot risk. He is afraid. He knows that he is not capable of knowing the truth on his own; he has to believe somebody else.

It is only awareness, the state of an awakened consciousness, that brings freedom. Intelligence is freedom; meditation is freedom; awareness is freedom. (…) Freedom is the ultimate value of life.

The ego is very sensitive and very fragile, and it is afraid of criticism. The ego depends on others' opinions. It has no reality of its own. It is not a real entity; it is not substantial – it is just a collection of others' opinions.

Truth has such clarity that once understood, it transforms your life. Once heard, it is understood. Truth has a very simple process: once heard, it is understood; once understood, it transforms your life. If rightly heard, you never ask how to understand. If rightly understood, you never ask: "Now what should I do to transform my life according to it?" Truth transforms; truth liberates.

Knowledge is a way for ignorance to protect itself, and it protects itself very cunningly, very efficiently, very cleverly. (…) To know that you don't know is the first step towards wisdom.

A wise man is always hated by the world, is bound to be hated by the world. His presence is a disturbance, a provocation to those who are fast asleep and snoring.

The wise man directs his mind to truth, to the ultimate law of existence, to the awakened people. (…) He becomes more and more silent and serene and tranquil. He becomes a silent lake, all waves gone, not even ripples to be found. Only then is truth reflected in him.

Man lives in misery, not because he is destined to live in misery, but because he does not understand his own nature, potential, possibilities of growth. This nonunderstanding of oneself creates hell. To understand oneself is to be naturally blissful.

Mind is the constant process of desiring, more and more. Mind remains eternally in discontent. Nothing satisfies it, nothing at all. You may attain to whatsoever you wanted to attain, but the moment you attain it, it is finished; your mind is no longer interested in it.

Remain unidentified. Walk on untouched, unattached. (…) Get more and more rooted into watching, vipassana, insight.

To clear the mind is a psychological work; to drop the mind is a spiritual revolution. Clearing the mind, you remain attached to the mind; and howsoever you clear it, it remains. (…) And the clear mind will give you great insights, great visions, and you may start thinking that you are having spiritual experiences. No experience is ever spiritual; all experiences are psychological. To go beyond your psychology is what I mean when I say, drop the mind. (…) My effort here is not to give you a clear mind; my effort here is to give you a state of no-mind, because only through no-mind will you be able to know the reality, the reality within and the reality without. No-mind is the door, the only door.

Fulfillment is only a mirage. It only appears to be there, very close, alluring, enchanting, inviting. You go on moving, and you waste your whole life; and by the time you are dying, you have not even moved a single inch closer to fulfillment. People die on the same spot where they are born. People die in the same stupid state in which they were born.

Life in itself is empty; unless you are creative, you will not be able to fill it with fulfillment. You have a song in your heart to be sung, and you have a dance to be danced. (…) It is deep down hidden in the innermost core of you being – it has to be brought to the surface; it has to be expressed. That's what is meant by "self-actualization". Rare is the person who transforms his life into a growth, who transforms his life into a long journey of self-actualization, who becomes what he was meant to be. In the East, we have called that man the Buddha; in the West, we have called that man the Christ – one who has come home. We are all wanderers in the search of the home.

It is easy to be accidental, because you never feel responsible for anything that happens. You can always throw the responsibility onto something else: fate, God, society, economic structure, the state, the church, the mother, the father, the parents… To be conscious means to take the whole responsibility on your shoulders. To be responsible is the beginning of Buddhahood. (…) The religious dimension simply means the dimension of being conscious, of being alert, of living a life with self-remembrance.

When you come closer to Buddhahood, when all is being lost, all ties, all desires, great temptations arise. There is no devil to tempt you; it is your own mind, your own past experiences. Your whole loaded past tries to pull you backwards, but now nothing can pull you backwards. The call has been heard; the invitation has arrived.

The disciple surrenders; the disciple destroys all distance between himself and the Master; the disciple starts melting into the Master. (…) A disciple is the rarest flowering of human consciousness, because beyond the disciple, there is only one more peak – the Master. And one who has been totally a disciple one day becomes a Master. Disciplehood is a process of becoming a Master.

The Master is an excuse to drop the ego. You can drop your ego only if you come across a person who catches hold of your heart so tremendously that his being becomes more important than your own being, that you can sacrifice all that you have for him.

Outward poverty prevents the inward journey.

Self-control gives you the subtlest ego; self-control has more self in it than anything else. Control is cultivated, practiced; with great effort you have to manage it. It is a long struggle; then you arrive at it. Mastery is not a cultivated thing; it is not to be practiced. Mastery is nothing but understanding. It is not control at all. (…) The man of control is the man of repression and willpower; the man of mastery is the man of meditation, the man of consciousness – in his very understanding, he transcends.

Contemplation is the purest form of thinking. (…) Dhyana, meditation, no-mind, is going beyond thought, beyond the purest even, coming to a state where all thought ceases.

Priests wanted you to worship the scriptures, not to understand them. Because if you understand the scriptures, sooner or later, one thing is going to become clear to you – that the scripture is not the real source. Sooner or later, you are bound to stumble upon the truth that, "Krishna is speaking from a meditative state; Christ is speaking from a meditative state – what he is speaking is secondary; from where he is speaking is primary. Unless I reach to that state of consciousness, I will not be able to understand the words, because those words in themselves are empty; the meaning can only come through experience."

Philosophy goes on moving in a vicious circle. The philosopher remains inconclusive, and to remain inconclusive your whole life means not to live at all.

Religion has nothing to do with character. In fact, the really religious person is absolutely characterless. "Characterless" does not mean without character; it means with fluid character. He lives moment to moment, responding to new situations, new challenges, with no ready-made answers.

Except in deep meditation, one never comes across religion.

Love is for those whose energy is naturally extrovert, and meditation is for those whose energy is naturally introvert. (…) Meditation is the shortest way possible; meditation is coming to yourself directly, immediately.

Consciousness is intrinsically blissful, and unconsciousness is intrinsically miserable.

I am all for individuality and the freedom of the individual, because if the freedom of the individual disappears, then there is no possibility of enquiring into the reality of God. And that is the whole purpose of life.

It is through decisiveness that the soul is born. If there is no intensity, if you are lukewarm, you cannot experience truth. Living accidentally, knowing truth is impossible. One has to be so decisive, so committed, so consciously involved with life, so intensely adventurous, that all is at stake at any moment.

Life plus consciousness, and you start becoming a Buddha.

Real revolution happens through transcendence. (…) Neti, neti – neither this nor that – is the formula of transcendence. Neither positive nor negative; but it does not mean not to live the positive and the negative. (…) The positive and the negative continuously balance each other. (…) Transcendence does not mean indifference, (…) becoming lukewarm, living a very dull life. (…) If you avoid living, you will become dull, very dull; you will lose all intelligence. (…) Live totally, but at the same time remain silently alert, aware. (…) The real sannyas means: laugh deeply, but remember you are not the laughter; and cry and weep deeply, let the tears flow, be total in it, and yet alert, a flame inside watching it all. (…) Live in the world, in the thick of it, in the dense world; renounce nothing. (…) Live as totally as possible, because if God has given life, it means there is something to attain through it. Only by living life is there something to be learned; transcendence has to be learned by living life – that is the great gift of life.

The best way to let the "I" disappear is not through austerities, yoga, fasting – no. It is through creativity. I teach you the yoga of creativity, because to me that is the only yoga. (…) The more you create, the more you become capable of creating. The more you create, the sharper is your intelligence. The more you create, the more you become available to infinite sources of creativity – that is, God. The more you create, the more you become a vehicle, a vehicle for the magic to flow through you.

That is the beauty about religion, that it never becomes a commodity in the marketplace. (…) Religion cannot be taught at all; you cannot be informed about religion. You have to discover it on your own.

The religious man, the mystic, tries to explore the mystery of death. In exploring the mystery of death, he inevitably comes to know what life is. (…) Religion is founded in the search into death, and to understand death is to understand all. To experience death is to experience all, because in the experience of death, you not only experience life at its highest, love at its deepest; in experiencing death, you enter into the Divine. Death is the door to the Divine; death is the name of the door of God's temple. (…) The mystic dies voluntarily. The mystic dies before the actual death; he dies in meditation. (…) Meditation is total death, voluntary death. One dies into oneself. (…) slowly, slowly, as meditation becomes natural, the mystic starts living death. Then each moment of his life is also a moment of death. (…) The mystic dies continuously, each moment, and remains as fresh as dewdrops or lotus leaves in the early morning sun. His freshness, his youth, his timelessness, depend on the art of dying. And then, when actual death comes, he has nothing to fear, because he has known this death thousands of times. (…) because he dies joyously, he dies without becoming unconscious, and he knows the total secret of death. (…) Death is going to come sooner or later. Before death comes, learn how to die in meditation.

All knowledge is cunning, and all knowledge corrupts. Living from a state of not knowing, this is purity.

Quietness means meditation, thoughtlessness, no thought disturbing, the lake of consciousness absolutely without any waves and ripples. And the consequence of such silence is virtue. Virtue is not something practiced by you; you cannot practice virtue. If you practice virtue, on the surface you will wear a mask, but behind the surface you will go on living in your old vicious ways. That's what happens to your priests, your so-called saints; their whole life becomes very cunning; they have double lives – they say one thing; they do a totally different thing. They are bound to be so, because their virtue is cultivated, imposed by themselves on themselves. (…) They are repressive, and all kinds of repression make you pathological, not whole, not healthy.

This is real renunciation – the old world is gone, because the old being is gone. The transformation has to be inner.

Desire is unquenchable. (…) Satisfaction is not possible in this world. (…) Life is always frustrating; even in success, you will be frustrated. (…) Contentment is possible only when you move into a state of being, when you become no-mind. Contentment is the flavor of no-mind.

Buddha says beware of the false imaginings. (…) The mind can seduce you into anything, into any stupid thing. And once anything gets into your mind, it tortures you, it haunts you.

The greater work starts when you start disidentifying yourself from your heart. The heart is not your soul; certainly it is better than the head. It is closer to being, but even though it is closer, there is still a distance. You have to fall still deeper. You have to come to a point, to a center, from where you can see thoughts and feelings all separate from you, where you become just a mirror. That moment is the moment of enlightenment; you become a Buddha. Less than that will not help; less than that will not be worthwhile.

People are so foolish. Not only the younger ones – the older you get, the more foolish you become. The more experienced you are, it seems the more stupidity you accumulate through life. It really happens rarely that a person starts watching, observing his own life and his own life patterns.

That is Buddha's meaning of nirvana – to be free from life and death, to be free from desire; to be free from all desires, the spiritual desire included.

If you have understood the futility of desire, the utter stupidity of desire, if you have seen it through and through – that no desire can ever be fulfilled, that it promises and it promises greatly, but it never delivers the goods, that all desires are deceptive, that it is because of our unintelligence that we go on being victims of desires; if you have seen it through and through and you die with no projection in the mind, with no seed of desire, then all seeds are burned. It is because of this that Patanjali has called the ultimate state of samadhi, nirbeej samadhi, seedless samadhi – if you can die with all the seeds burned, there will be no sprout anymore; there will be no other births. (…) to attain to the state of seedless samadhi, one has to be absolutely awake, one has to be a Buddha, because the seeds of desire are burned only in the fire of awakening. So if you die without any desire, you die in utter awareness, you see death happening; (…) you see the disconnection happening – slowly, slowly, the soul is becoming separate from the body. Slowly, slowly, it is becoming uprooted from the body; it is becoming freer from the prison. And one moment comes when you are totally free from the prison, outside the prison cell called the body-mind mechanism. Then you remain eternally awake.

Your own experience will be a real transformation. When you have truly known, doubts can never come back.

When you have lived for centuries in prisons, even if you are allowed freedom, you will soon enter into another prison, because that has become your habit. You cannot live without chains. All the chains have been broken; now you create new chains of your own making.

Meditation means putting the mind aside, so that it no longer interferes with reality and you can see things as they are.

The experience of wonder is such that everything stops.

I cannot say to you what is right or wrong. I can say only one thing to you: be conscious, that is right; don't be unconscious, because that is wrong. (…) Whatsoever the conscious goes on pretending, the unconscious is the real source of your acts, and unless the unconscious disappears totally from your being, you can't do right. Only one tenth of your being is conscious; nine tenths are unconscious. (…) The conscious is at the service of the unconscious; this is a wrong situation. Let the unconscious be at the service of the conscious, and you become a sannyasin. That is what sannyas is all about: making consciousness more and more the center of your being, and transforming more and more chunks of unconsciousness into consciousness, bringing more and more light into the inner darkness. A day comes when you are full of light; your whole being is conscious.

Man can either be in hell or in heaven; it is his choice. Hell and heaven are not places outside you, but spaces within you, and both alternatives exist in each individual. Man is like a ladder – you can go up, you can go down; it is the same ladder. (…) It is the same energy that becomes hell and that becomes heaven. Just a deep understanding is needed of your energies, or your possibilities, of your potential. Heaven or hell are not when you die; they are possibilities right now. (…) the greatest mistake a man can commit is to think that his inner climate is created by outside forces. It is not created by outside forces; it is your inner decision, your inner will; it is your choice. It happens on the outside, but it arises from the deepest core of your being. (…) A real religious person is born the moment you accept your responsibility for yourself. (…) Once responsibility is accepted, slowly, slowly, you become aware of the great potential and the great freedom that it brings. (…) The moment you take total responsibility, it is a great redemption; it is freedom. You are suddenly out of the jail, just by taking responsibility. It is difficult to accept, very difficult, hard to accept, that "I am responsible"; it hurts the ego. But there is no other way.

There is no God to give you punishment; each act of mischief (done unconsciously) intrinsically brings sorrow to you. If you put your hand in the fire, you will be burned; (…) there is no need for anyone to declare any judgment. (…) Mischief is yours; virtue is yours; bliss is yours. And beyond all is purity, Buddhahood, awakening, transcendence.

No one purifies another. (…) Buddhas can only point the way, but you have to walk. Nobody can walk for you; nobody can carry you to paradise. (…) It is arduous to transform yourself from wrong patterns to right patterns, and from right patterns to transcendence. It is a great, arduous pilgrimage; it is an uphill task. Don't go on believing and deceiving yourself that somebody is going to come; that the messiah will come and deliver you from your sins and from your bondage. This is just hoping, wishful thinking. Nobody can purify you, unless you take the decision, unless you become committed to transforming yourself. Don't look for any shortcut; you can't cheat existence. Nobody can carry you on his shoulders; you have to go to the ultimate peak on your own.

Christ is a state of consciousness. (…) Christ means the crowned one, one who has come home and is crowned with the glory of becoming one with God. (…) You can be a Christ; everyone can become a Christ. (…) In fact, ultimately, each individual has to reach to the state of christhood. (…) But the priest has to call it a blasphemy. He cannot allow you to become a Christ, because if you become a Christ, the priest is not needed anymore. (…) The very idea that you can become a Christ is dangerous to the priesthood; that's why it is blasphemy.

First be selfish, utterly selfish. (…) First become enlightened, be full of light; then do whatsoever happens through that light. (…) First you have to pour your whole energy, total energy, into self-growth. Once you have become a grown-up, mature, alert, aware, then you can serve people and only then, because then you will have something to share: love, compassion. Then you will have something to really help them: understanding, wisdom. (…) Right now, you yourself are in such a mess that if you serve somebody, you are bound to create more mess. (…) Buddha says, Never neglect your work for another's, however great his need. (…) You can help others only if you have helped yourself first. (…) But this is happening in life every day: you start helping others without ever becoming aware that you yourself are in need. Be altruistic only when your own self is fulfilled. Selfishness and unselfishness are not opposite to each other. A really selfish person is bound to become unselfish one day, because the really selfish person is one who comes to discover his inner self. A really selfish person cannot be interested in money, power, prestige. If he is really selfish, his first interest will be: "Who am I?" (…) I teach you real, authentic selfishness, because my own observation is, out of it arises altruistic love. (…) And the first step of your work is to discover your work: Your work is to discover your work, and then with all your heart to give yourself to it. (…) First find out what your path is (love or meditation); then don't wait a single moment and don't withhold any energy from it. Get involved totally, absolutely, because transformation is possible only when you are boiling at the one-hundred-degree point. Being lukewarm won't do; you have to be totally in your work.

After meditation, after sannyas, whatsoever happens is going to give you more fulfillment, more maturity, more rootedness, more centering. It will become a rich life which does not only grow old but also grows towards heights and depths. You will start living not only a horizontal life, but a vertical life also. You will live on the horizontal as far as it is needed; otherwise ninety-nine percent of your energies will start moving in the vertical dimension, towards heights and depths. Then this earth, this world, becomes only an opportunity to grow. Then you live rightly, rejoicing, being grateful to God.

Challenge brings integrity; otherwise a person remains hollow, empty. (…) God gives life with all its dangers. Sannyas is to accept this challenge; sannyas is to live dangerously. (…) The more dangerously you live, the more risks you take, the more you grow, the more you become integrated, crystallized, the more your soul becomes a clear-cut, well-defined phenomenon. Otherwise, it remains vague, cloudy, doubtful.

A few people come to me because they are on the verge of going insane; psychology, psychoanalysis and psychiatry have not been of much help. It can help only up to a point. It can help a person to be normal if his madness is ordinary madness; but it cannot help a person if his madness has something spiritual in it. (…) If a person's madness is because he is too sensitive, too alert and too aware of the misery in which people are living, and he himself is living, if he becomes aware of the meaninglessness of this whole life that we have created on this earth, he is bound to go berserk. He will not be able to bear it; it will be unbearable. Those people cannot be helped by psychiatry or psychoanalysis; those people can only be helped if something like meditation starts happening in their being.

Those who have something significant growing in them are bound to remain with me – those who are courageous enough to move beyond the boundaries of the mind, beyond all boundaries and limits. Those who are not courageous will leave on their own accord. Many will be called; few will be chosen. Thousands will come, but only a few will be transformed.

It is arduous to conquer oneself. It needs integrity, awareness, strength, will, trust, surrender. It requires all the great qualities of consciousness. (…) One can master oneself only if one is absolutely alert; otherwise you remain dominated by your desires – you are a slave in your own house.

Unless you make a great effort to get out of your conditionings, you will not be free. Unless you make a great, concentrated, determined decision that you have to get out of these conditionings – even if life itself needs to be staked, you are ready to stake your life for the freedom from all kinds of conditionings – there is not much possibility. (…) This is what sannyas is – a determination, a decision, a commitment. (…) Master yourself – because mastering yourself, you enter into the kingdom of God; you enter into the real world of peace and bliss. You enter into your own treasures; they are inexhaustible. You come to know for the first time the richness of your being, the beauty of your being, the ecstasy of your being.

Either you will be consumed by your desires, or you have to consume your desires. (…) Either you live in desire, or you live in gratitude, remember this. The man who lives in desire cannot be grateful to God – he can only be complaining and complaining; he will always have some grudge against God. But the man who has no desires has only gratitude. (…) In thankfulness is beauty and benediction.

Life can be lived in two ways, either consciously or unconsciously. (…) The unexamined life, the unconscious life, is nothing but sorrow. (…) That is the first noble truth. (…) The second truth: the cause of sorrow is desire, desire for more. (…) The third noble truth: the noble eightfold path. The steps of the noble eightfold path are nothing but applications of awareness into different aspects of life. Don't do anything unconsciously. (…) And the fourth noble truth: nirvana, cessation of sorrow. If you follow awareness, you will attain to nirvana. (…) Life is like walking a tightrope: each moment there is danger; awareness and right effort are needed so that you cannot fall – right effort for everything, a balanced effort which does not disturb your tranquility.

The really awakened is neither for the world nor against the world. He lives in the world and is absolutely free of it. He lives in the world, but the world does not live in him. He is in the world, but not of it. (…) Once you become awakened, there is nowhere to escape; in fact, there is nobody to escape.

Life unexamined, unobserved, unenlightened, is nothing but a river of sorrow – and we are all drowning in it. There is only one boat to get to the other shore. The name of the boat is awareness.

I would like my sannyasins to live life in its totality, but with one absolute condition, categorical condition, and that condition is awareness, meditation. Go first deep into meditation, so you can cleanse your unconscious of all poisonous seeds, so there is nothing to be corrupted and there is nothing inside you which power can bring forth. And then, do whatsoever you feel like doing. (…) Without awareness, even if you do something good, it is going to turn into something harmful.

People are not one piece; they are many fragments, somehow holding themselves together. They can fall apart at any moment. They are all Humpty-Dumpties, just bundles of many things. Any new situation, any new danger, any insecurity, and they can fall apart. Your wife dies, or you go bankrupt, or you are unemployed – any small thing can prove the last straw on the camel's back. Everybody's boiling; the difference is only in degrees. You can go insane at any moment, because inside you are already a crowd. (…) You are living inside in a very confused state. And not only young people; even when they become old, the same state continues – not only continues, it becomes more and more confusing, because as you accumulate experience, your confusion becomes greater. (…) As you grow old, you go farther and farther away from Buddhahood. It is really a very strange state; it should not be so. One should grow towards Buddhahood, but people grow in just the opposite direction.

Your dreams simply show that you live partially, and the unlived parts have to be lived in your dreams. If you live totally each moment, then there is no possibility of any dreams.

Use, but don't possess – because the moment you become attached, you have fallen asleep. (…) The possessor really becomes possessed by his own possessions.

Live in the world without any idea of what is going to happen. Whether you are going to be a winner or a loser, it doesn't matter. Death takes everything away. Whether you win or lose is immaterial. The only thing that matters, and has always been, is how you play the game.

Lust is madness; lust is fire; lust is poison. It keeps people blind to the truth. It keeps them foolish; it keeps them unaware; it keeps them drunk. (…) A man who lives through lust lives absolutely unconsciously. Whatsoever he is going to do is going to be wrong.

No sorrow like separation. The only thing that is making you so sad is the separation from existence. In your unconsciousness, you have believed that you are separate. You have started living a life of the ego. You are not following the ultimate law, the dhamma. You are not flowing with the river; you are resisting, fighting.

The greatest joy is pure consciousness, the joy of freedom. (…) It is within everybody's grasp. You just have to grope for it a little. The groping will be in the dark, but it is not far away. If you try, if you make an effort, you are bound to find it. It is your birthright.

If you are fortunate to keep company with the awakened, with the wise, with the shining ones, then nothing better than that can ever happen to you. Because it is only in the company of the Buddhas, the awakened ones, the wise, that there is a possibility of your change, of your transformation.

The mad people are happy with another mad person. The fools are happy with other fools. And when you are with fools, you feel very good, because they are not superior to you; your ego is not hurt. But when you live with a Buddha, sometimes you feel very disturbed, because he is so superior to you. And if you start feeling hurt, you will have to escape from him, or you will have to kill him.

Unless you are very alert, you are bound to be deceived by your own mind. To keep company with your mind is to keep company with a fool.

There is no going back. Going back is not possible at all; it is not in the nature of things. One always has to go forward.

Life is an eternal pilgrimage. There is no goal to it; it is pure journey. Hence the joy of it.

Man as he is, is not sane, cannot be called sane. But because insanity is so widespread, it is so normal that we don't become aware of it. Once you become awakened, then you are surprised how people are living, what they are doing to themselves and to others. Their whole life is nothing but sheer madness. Somebody is mad after money; somebody is mad after power; somebody is mad after fame – and all these things are futile. Death comes, and the whole edifice that you have built with such labor collapses. Death comes and takes you away, and all that you have created has been in vain. The sane person is one who creates something which even death cannot destroy. Let this be the definition of the sane: one who knows something of immortality, deathlessness, eternity – he is sane; he is a Buddha. (…) Otherwise, you go on moving from one nightmare into another.

The poor and the rich, the ignorant and the knowledgeable, the famous and the anonymous, are all in the same boat. Whether you ask God for two dollars or fifty thousand dollars does not make any difference. To go to God desiring is not to go to Him at all; (…) to desire is to create a wall between you and the total.

Desire means, "The way things are is not right; they should be different, according to me." Prayer is just the opposite of desire. Prayer means, "The way things are is absolutely perfect; they are as they should be. Hence, I have nothing except a deep gratitude." Real prayer is bowing to existence in tremendous thankfulness, because whatsoever is, the way it is, is the most perfect way it can ever be. A prayerful heart knows that the universe is perfect each moment; it is moving from perfection to perfection.

To carry likes and dislikes is to carry prejudices; (…) that's why nothing ever makes you happy; that's why you are never contented with anything. (…) Likes and dislikes simply say that you think yourself separate from existence. A man who has dropped his ego has no likes and dislikes. Then whatsoever is the case, he rejoices in it. (…) He makes no conditions on existence. He lives unconditionally, rejoicing whatsoever happens.

The more meditative you become, the less ambitious you will be. There is no question of fulfilling ambitions; ambition will start disappearing from your consciousness.

Remember always, the goal is to become a pure witness. By purity, Buddha never means moral purity; by purity, he means childlike innocence – someone who is functioning from a state of not-knowing. (…) When a knowledgeable person comes to a Buddha, the Buddha can see that what he is saying is not his own, that his knowledge is nothing but stupidity masquerading as knowledge. The so-called knowledge has no roots in his being; it is superficial, borrowed, empty.

People are lazy; laziness is one of the problems. (…) the outer circumstances don't need so much effort to be changed, but the inner lethargy is centuries old. The unconsciousness is so primitive, its roots are so deep, that it needs a total determination on your part, a tremendous determination, a commitment, a deep involvement. You have to risk all. Unless that happens, it is impossible to change yourself; you will remain the same. (…) Great effort is needed; otherwise you are missing a great opportunity. This life is going to disappear soon. Why not bring all your energies to such a point of integration where you can take a quantum leap from the known to the unknown, from time to eternity? (…) That's what sannyas is all about: a determination, a commitment to transform oneself, not holding back anything. (…) Nobody can help you from the outside. (…) Once the determination is total, transformation immediately starts happening. In fact, to be totally determined is almost half the journey.

Those who are wise accumulate that which will be theirs forever, and those who are foolish accumulate the momentary, which will be taken away from them, which is going to be taken away by death. (…) Before life disappears, use the opportunity to find that which never dies. (…) Find the source of existence, of your own being, of all that is. That source is God; that source is nirvana.

Never compare two Buddhas; otherwise you will create great confusion for yourself. Although their experience is the same, their expressions are different, bound to be different. They have different individualities; they have different forms of expressing their experience. (…) My effort here is to make you aware of the varieties of Buddhahood, of the multidimensionality of enlightenment. The world is rich because there are so many birds and so many trees and so many flowers. And the same is true about the inner world; so many possibilities of growing, so many different, unique expressions when you become mature – different flowers.

A man like Buddha knows the falseness of the whole world; he will not weep, he will not laugh, he will not even look back. That is his way of expressing his experience of the total.

Gurdjieff used to do many things just to get rid of unnecessary people. Sometimes he would behave so absurdly that the person who had come to see him would never come again, thinking that he was mad. (…) One never knows how an enlightened person is going to behave, with what devices.

The higher you rise, the higher your consciousness is, the more aware you become of freedom. At the lowest point, everything is determined; at the highest point, nothing is determined.

Your mind is continuously on. (…) Your mind is tuned to so many radio stations! All kinds of things are going on inside the mind. (…) You look so tired, for the simple reason that you don't know how to turn your mind off. The mind has not to be thrown out; the mind has to be put in its place. The mind is a beautiful servant, but an ugly master. You take the reins in your hands; you be the master. And the first act, the first step is to become detached from the mind. See that it is not you; create a distance; the greater the distance, the more is the capacity of turning it off. (…) And when you turn the mind off, the mind too remains fresh and more intelligent, because the mind too is tiring. (…) The mind has to be put in its right place – when you need it, you use it; when you don't need it, you put it aside. (…) A meditative person becomes more intelligent; he becomes saner. (…) Mind is a blessing with meditation; otherwise it is a curse.

You can attain to the soul only by becoming more watchful of all that is happening in your body and in your mind. Unless and until the witness arises in you, you are a robot.

There is not much difference between a rat and a mouse, a mouse and a man, a man and a machine. The only difference that makes a difference arises in meditation. Otherwise, all differences are only formal. That's why psychologists study rats, because they are simple people, and it is easier to understand them. Once you have understood the mind of the rat, you have understood the mind of man too. They infer all their knowledge about man through studying rats. (…) And that information works; it is perfectly applicable to you – you behave in the same way. The information will not be applicable to a Buddha, to a Jesus, to a Krishna. But where is B. F. Skinner going to find a Buddha? (…) The Buddha will study Skinner, not vice versa. Skinner will not be able to study a Buddha; (…) a Buddha will be absolutely incomprehensible to him. And when something is incomprehensible, the ego simply denies it; that's the ego's way of protecting itself. The incomprehensible, the mysterious has to be denied, overlooked, bypassed. One does not take note of the incomprehensible, because to take note of the incomprehensible means you are taking note of the limitation of your mind, and that hurts the ego. Hence, Buddhas are born once in a while, but nobody takes note of them.

Don't fight with darkness; bring light in. (…) Don't fight with the negative; bring the positive in. And the positive comes through watchfulness.

The experienced people, the people who have lived life – they appear wise. They are not wise; they are only mature fools. And mature fools are more dangerous than the immature fools, because the mature fool has all the arguments to support his foolishness, all his experience at his disposal. (…) These people are wise in the ways of the world. They can give you good advice; they are experienced – but foolishness does not disappear with experience. They are as foolish as you are.

Your consciousness is your reality; to be disidentified is to be the Master.

By risking all, you become worthy; by risking all, you become a soul.

Slowly, slowly, when there is no anger, no greed, no jealousy, no possessiveness, no sexuality, when you have totally accepted and digested all these phenomena in you, you are becoming greater and greater, and you have energies available to rise higher; you have fuel enough to keep your fire burning bright without smoke. (…) Ordinarily, you are taught such stupid ways that your own energies become your enemies, and you are constantly fighting with yourself. (…) You will remain quarreling with yourself; you will destroy yourself in quarreling your whole life. (…) Tathata, acceptance, is a method of transforming your energies into friends.

All believers are ignorant people; belief is ignorance.

An accidental understanding is not liberation; understanding has to be deliberate and conscious. (…) Hence on the path, it is absolutely necessary to be a disciple, so that a constant source of light remains available to you; so the Master can go on forcing you to see things as they are, and helping you to become deliberately conscious. It is a long, arduous process; much hammering is needed on your head. (…) The first thing you can do is, start uprooting the weeds of desire, all kinds of desire, worldly and otherworldly.

Don't be greedy. Many times it happens; you become spiritually greedy; you start asking too much without any inner capacity to receive it. You start demanding too much – that too is desire and greed. Don't be greedy – go slow; go steady. Be persistent in your effort, but be ready to wait too.

If you don't listen to the Buddhas, you will be consumed by your own mischief.

Zen is unconditionally value-free. Let it sink in you very deeply, because that is my standpoint too. (…) Accept existence as it is. By not accepting it, what has been changed? Nothing has been changed. It makes no difference anywhere.

The whole life is non-utilitarian – it has no purpose; it is not going anywhere. It is simply being here; it is not going anywhere. It has no goal to achieve; it has no destiny. It is a cosmic play, what Hindus call leela.

There is no one inside; in fact, there is no one inside at all, and the moment the inside falls, there is also no outside. The moment you are not, inwardly, then there is no outwardness. Then the whole world becomes one Whole. Then existence is one Whole, not divided into the dichotomy of I and thou.

What exists? There are so many layers.

The word "self-realization" is contradictory, because realization always means a transcendence of the self. (…) There was a self; that was only up to the door. The moment you enter the temple of realization, you don't find it no more. It is a shadow which follows you up to the door, and not only follows you, but clings to you – but only up to the door; it cannot enter the temple. (…) The self is the last thing one has to throw.

Oneness is important, not relationship. Relationship is sansar, the world, and because of relationship, we have to be born again and again. (…) Ego is the source of all relationships.

The path of devotion, as it exists, cannot lead you to the transcendental, to the cosmic, to the one. To me, it is not a question of surrendering to someone; it is just a question of surrendering the self – not at someone's feet, just surrendering yourself.

The words are always dead; the meaning is always living.

A no-desiring mind is one that is in spiritual seeking. A spiritual seeker is one who is completely aware of the nonsense of desire and is ready to know what is. (…) So first, be aware of the whole process of life as frustrating. Not a single illusion should be there; otherwise you will be tethered to it. Go deep in each experience of life; do not escape from it. Know it so deeply that you know its disillusionment. (…) Only then this part is complete, and you can take the jump into the here and now. (…) A sannyasin is one who has known the world as frustrating; (…) he knows this world is dukkha; (…) he knows the nature of the wheel of sansar, the wheel of infinite desires. (…) He is stepping out; he is composed, at ease.

A mature spiritual seeker is one who has gone without any fear in life, and knows every nook and corner. He has known it so much that nothing has remained unknown. Then meditation is easy, because there is no one to create thoughts; there is no one to create desires.

Begin from where you are, and the more you will go deep, the less you will be. The more you will know yourself, the less a self you will be. And once you have come to total understanding about yourself, you will be annihilated; you will go into nonexistence.

One who understands stops fighting. He is not even trying to swim; he simply goes with the flood. This very current he uses as a vehicle; he becomes one with it and moves with it. This is what I call surrender, and this is what the old scriptures called the attitude of the devotee. Surrendered you are not. Then wherever the wind leads you, you will go. You don't have any will of your own.

Allow yourself to be empty, and this is the golden age. Allow yourself to be too much filled with desire, and this is the darkest age possible, the kali yuga. You create your time and age around you; you live your own time and age.

Every age thinks that things are reaching to a crescendo, to an ultimate point, to an omega point, where everything will explode and a new being will be born. But these are hopes, ego-trips, not very meaningful. You will be here for a few years, then others will be here, and they will think the same. The crescendo is reached not with the age, but with the individual being. The climax is always reached with individual consciousness, not with a collective unconscious.

All hopes are false. To hope is to be false. (…) Hope comes out of your falsity of being. (…) And the ego is all false hopes combined together.

Your body is a dynamo. The more you use it, the more energy from the infinite source is supplied. If you don't use it, there is no need for any new supply. Then by and by, the supply stops. Be more active, and you will have more energy. Be less active, and you will lose much energy. Through activity, energy is not lost; through activity, you renew it. You use the energy; then from the source more energy becomes available.

Dropping all your old patterns is a great death, greater than the ordinary, physical death, because when you die ordinarily, you only change the body; you change the garments. Your old habits, old patterns of thinking and feeling, continue in a new life, in a new body. Just the surface changes, nothing else. So the ordinary death is really ordinary; it is not much of a death. (…) But the death that happens in a love affair with a Master is absolute, irrevocable. It is a point of no return. You cannot go back; you cannot fall back to the old patterns again – that becomes impossible.

In the Vedas, there is only one percent of statements which are worth keeping; ninety-nine percent is only worth throwing away. So is the case with the Old Testament; so is the case with the Koran, because Mohammed comes across all kinds of people. And these are the basic categories: the stupid, the mediocre, the dreamers, the sleepy, and the wise.

The most firmly established in the path appears the most remiss. That's why one who is really a Buddha will always be condemned by the ordinary people: because he appears to be the most remiss, because he fits in no category, because he fits in with no morality. You cannot predict anything about him; he is unpredictable. Why? Because he is so established in his being that he cares nothing about anything. He lives spontaneously, whatsoever the consequence. He will look careless to you, but he is so conscious, he need not care. He will look negligent to you; he is not. He is so conscious, there is no question of negligence. He will look lazy to you, but he is not – there is no question of it. He is so conscious, laziness cannot exist in his consciousness. But to the outside world, he will not fit into any category.

Coming out of unconsciousness into consciousness after many, many lives is a painful process. Growth is painful. (…) We are in the grip of our old habits, patterns, structures, strategies. (…) You have a gestalt; it has penetrated in the body; it has gone deep in the mind – it has even reached your very essence, your very core. Now, uprooting it all, shaking you, shocking you into awareness is a hard task. (…) It is like snatching away toys from a child.

It is all meaningless. The hope and the joy that hope creates, the fantasies and the joy that the idea of their fulfillment creates – it is all meaningless. (…) It is all preventing true meaningfulness.

We can create a thousand and one hallucinations about ourselves, we can pour our reality into them, and they look so real. (…) We go on worshipping our own creations; this is the way of the stupid mind. (…) The intelligent person stops creating, stops projecting and watches the mind so clearly that the mind cannot project anything. As the projections disappear, the world disappears. One day, when the mind is no more there to project anything, all is transparent. (…) Emancipation is emancipation from your tiny mind and its games.

Cut off the roots directly. Don't be worried with the branches and the leaves.

The man of Zen contains all contradictions. He is vast enough; he can contain contradictions.

When you realize the totality of your nature, you are nothing. (…) This nothingness is the ultimate truth.

Real victory is never through conflict; it is always through integration. (…) Everything has to be accepted and absorbed. (…) Through witnessing, absorb the energy. (…) Fight is not right, never right; it dissipates energy; it creates division; it makes you split. (…) So be aware, that's all, and through acceptance, a transformation happens, and a real mastery arises. Nobody is defeated and yet you are victorious; that is the real art.

Every real change first has to happen in the deepest core of your being. Hence I teach meditation and consciousness.

Not to be a follower is the real way of following; then one day, you will be a Christ on your own.

Sannyas means a one-hundred-and-eighty-degree turn, so that one can face oneself, and the moment one sees oneself, all darkness, all misery, all hell, simply disappears. It is found that it was false. It is found that it was just an illusion. It was our own shadow, and we were creating it by keeping our back to the light.

To know the truth, one has to learn the way of rebellion; one has to learn the art of rebellion. It is the most valuable thing to learn. It is not blind reaction; it is not destructive. It needs tremendous intelligence to be in rebellion and to be alive, to be in rebellion and not to be in unnecessary conflict.

Man is not a beggar; man is born to be a king, but he never makes any effort, he never tries to be that which he is destined to be. He remains fast asleep; he never wakes up. In his dreams, he begs – and he is a king! (…) One is a king and has fallen asleep and dreams that one is a beggar. You need to be shaken; you need to be awakened. That's what sannyas is all about – your willingness to be shocked; your readiness to be awakened.

Initiation into sannyas means that you are taking a vow to wake up, that enough is enough, that you have slept enough, that now it is time, that the dawn is coming closer, that you should gather your energies and you should make all possible effort to wake up. Yes, it takes all possible effort – your total surrender, total action – to wake up, because we have been asleep so long that we have completely forgotten that there is something like a state called enlightenment, awakening, samadhi. (…) This has to become a deep longing, such a deep longing that one can risk all for it, only then does one wake up. And that's what the meaning of sannyas is: the color orange is the color of the morning, of the rising sun, the time to wake up.

My work here consists in helping you to find your song.

People are mutual slaves: both are masters and both are slaves. And whenever there is slavery, love simply disappears. It cannot exist in that small space. It needs the whole sky to exist. (…) True love brings freedom to you and to all those you love. True love leads you slowly, slowly towards the ultimate freedom. The name of the ultimate freedom is God. (…) Love brings light into the soul; otherwise the inner world remains in darkness, and the darkness is dense, very deep, and very ancient. (…) Bring love into the heart, and everything else follows. (…) Love is the only commandment to be followed. (…) Hold fast to love and drop anything that goes against love. That's true sannyas; that is true renunciation – renouncing all that goes against love.

Clean your inside completely; empty yourself totally. In that emptiness, clarity is born. (…) To be aware of confusion is the beginning. Soon all these conflicting ideas will be gone.

We are asking for the impossible; no lover can penetrate to the innermost core of our being. That is available only to God. And to open yourself to God is sannyas. To be available to Him is sannyas; to be non-resistant to Him is sannyas. (…) Having no will of one's own is the door to God. Let Thy kingdom come, let Thy will be done.

To accept oneself as one is, is a great step towards growth. Not trying to improve upon oneself is the best way to improve – just relaxing, accepting, and leaving it to God. (…) A blissful acceptance of yourself, a deep acceptance of humanity, desiring no perfection – then suddenly a transformation happens. The imperfections start falling into a hole; the jigsaw puzzle itself, of its own accord, starts settling. All discord starts disappearing, and a great harmony arises. That harmony is God. Sannyas is a search for God.

Rebel against the crowd; rebel against the extrovert life – that is the first part of sannyas. And the second part: turn in, meditate. Start moving deeper and deeper into your very core of being, so that the potential can become actual, so that the paradise lost can be regained.

Sex is an opening downwards; love is an opening upwards; and the heart is the field of both. In old tantra mythology, there are seven energy centers. Each center of energy is represented as a lotus flower, but hanging downwards. When the love energy starts moving upwards, in that flood of energy those lotuses turn upwards. And the moment your inner wheels start turning upwards, you are entering into religious experience. That's what mysticism is all about.

My whole teaching is that there is nothing bad in you. And if something appears bad, that simply shows that you have not been capable to use it in a right way. Rightly used, even poison becomes nectar; wrongly used, even nectar is bound to become poison.

Man is a great experiment, an experiment in tremendous transformation. Man has been given all the potential to be a god, but it has to be arranged rightly, used rightly. The instrument is there, but one has to learn how to play upon it – only then the melody, only then the music, only then the benediction.

The first lesson of a sannyasin is not to fight with himself. Drop all fighting. Accept yourself; accept yourself as a great gift of God, with great reverence and gratitude, and then the journey starts; then transformation is possible. Transformation is possible only in the milieu of acceptance, never when you are in conflict. Become harmonious; be in accord with yourself. (…) The real art of life is to transform even the thorn into a rose – but what we have done with man is just the opposite.

The so-called sanity is nothing but normal madness. Always remember, never become part of the mob; protect yourself.

Not to become identified with any part and to remain a witness to all that comes and goes, all the changes, is sannyas. Slowly, slowly, one knows that "no face is mine". And when there is no face that you can call yours, who are you? The 'I' also starts disappearing. Then only a certain kind of 'amness' remains, a very silent 'amness', a pure feeling of being.

The work demands your total being. It demands surrender, dedication. Not even ninety-nine point nine percent will do – exactly one hundred percent, and then the ego starts evaporating. And the evaporation of the ego is the whole goal of all meditations, of all methods, of all spiritual exercises. When the ego is gone, for the first time you arrive. The death of the ego is your birth. So keep that in mind: go totally into everything, no strings attached, no conditions, unconditionally, and great is the possibility, great is the opportunity.

Life is in adventure; life is in constant enquiry. Life is not in belief, but in deep exploration for truth. And life knows no confinement, no limitation. It constantly goes beyond; it breaks all the boundaries and all the limitations. Then there is ecstasy, bliss and the thrill of being.

Love, but don't make love a relationship.

All religions, except Buddhism, have fallen in a trap. The trap is: they try not to desire the things of this world, but then they start desiring things of the other world. But it is the same; desire is the same. It does not matter what you desire. It makes no difference at all what the object of your desire is; desire is the same. You desire money or you desire meditation; desire is the same – only the object has changed. And the object is not the problem; the problem is the desire itself, desiring itself. (…) This is why your so-called spiritual people are very greedy; (…) they are asking for eternal gratification.

Don't dispossess things; dispossess yourself, and then things are automatically dispossessed.

The East is concerned with the witness, not with what it witnesses. You may be seeing a real tree, or you may be seeing a dream tree – it makes no difference. For the Eastern approach, it makes no difference whether the tree is real or just a dream tree. In both cases, it is the object; in both cases, you are not it. So what difference does it make whether the tree is really there or you have just imagined it? The only thing that makes any difference is the one, the mirror, in which the tree is reflected. (…) Pay attention; emphasize the witness; go deeper into the witness. And that's my purpose here in order to help you, not to analyze your dreams. (…) The East says, all is dream, so what is the point of analyzing? And there is no end. If you go on analyzing and the source that creates the dream is there, it will go on creating new dreams. They will be coming and coming and coming. That's why nobody is ever totally psychoanalyzed. (…) The projector is working, and you go on analyzing the film on the screen, and you go on thinking how to analyze it. (…) Witness, don't analyze; (…) forget the dream, just look at the watcher.

Gurdjieff used to say to his disciples, "Make one thing constant in your dreams, and sooner or later you will get rid of dreams." (…) And when dreams disappear, reality comes closer and closer every day. It is the dreams that are hindering you from seeing that which is.

Jesus says, man reaches to God through love, love is God – but this is only half of the truth. The other half is: man never reaches through love – man reaches only by transcending love. When both are understood together, you have understood the phenomenon of love. Love is God, and love is not God. In the beginning it is; in the end it is not.

Relationships can go a long way, but no relationship ever succeeds. All relationships break at some point.

Goals are misery-creating. The achieving mind, the constantly achieving mind, is the original source of all illness, of all disease. (…) First you create the goal, and then everything follows… then heaven and hell are created, then saints and sinners are created, and then fear is created – the fear of losing the goal, of missing the goal – and then ego is created, the ego of creating the goal. You have created the whole mess, the whole neurosis of mind. (…) The goal means the future; then you start becoming more interested in the future; you start forgetting about the present. The goal creates tension, anguish, fear – "am I going to make it or not?" – and competition, jealousy, conflict, and the hierarchy. Those who are coming closer to the goal are higher; those who are not coming closer to the goal are lower. (…) Buddha strikes at the root; he says there is no goal. Just this simple statement can become a liberating force: there is no goal. Then one is not going anywhere. (…) There is nowhere to go, and there is nobody to go. All has always been here, and all has always been available. (…) Life has no goal as such. Life itself is its own goal; the goal is intrinsic. The value of life is in itself; it does not come from anything else. Life is not a means to some end in the future. Life is its own end, its own means. (…) Life is its own meaning; you need not create any other meaning. And all created meanings will just become sources of anxiety. (…) Buddha says, there is nowhere to go – relax. (…) Then life becomes religion.

The mediocre man cannot find any security in himself. He lives through goals. Only an absolutely intelligent person can live without goals; only intelligence can live here-now. Only intelligence can live in the moment, without bringing anything from the outside.

The Master, the real Master, simply throws you back to your own utter naturalness. He does not make you an achiever. He does not give you great dreams, that you have to become this and you have to become that. He simply says, you relax; you be in a let-go; you be a light unto yourself.

People suffer because they have forgotten their innermost no-self, because they have forgotten their innermost presence. They have forgotten that they are one with the Whole.

Buddhism is not interested in general policy. It is not interested in philosophical speculation. It is interested in the details of life, its sufferings and their causes. It does not give you outlandish solutions. It does not provide you with new dreams. It simply looks face to face into life. It does not bring God in, or heaven and hell. It does not create a theology at all, because all theology is an effort to escape from the real problems of life.

Life is a journey from nowhere to nowhere – a vicious circle, a dream-journey. Nothing is attained through it. Nobody has ever attained anything through life. People run, and they run fast, but they never reach anywhere. They work, and they work hard, but nothing ever happens out of that work. Millions of people have lived before you, and where are they? Disappeared into the dust, dust unto dust. And we will disappear into the same dust sooner or later. All our achievements will fall into dust and disappear. Thousands of civilizations have existed and disappeared with no trace. Life seems to attain nothing; it is much ado about nothing, much fuss about nothing, a tale told by an idiot, full of fury and noise, signifying nothing. This is the first encounter that one has to go through. If you want to understand Buddha, you have to look eye to eye into life. Don't shirk, don't look sideways – look direct into life. What is the meaning of life? What does it attain? What does it come to finally? To nothing, just like a great dream.

Suffering is a reality; joy is a hope – and the hope never happens. The hope is just like the horizon; (…) you go on rushing towards the horizon, and the horizon goes on rushing away from you. It exists not; it exists only in your idea. To be bitterly frustrated with life is the beginning of wisdom. To see the futility of life is the beginning of a new journey, the inward journey. Otherwise, you go on being enamoured of one thing after another. Just look: you have lived thirty years, forty years, fifty years, sixty years – what is the gain? Look into your hands; they are empty. (…) To recognize it in the middle of life is of great import, because then radical change becomes possible.

People go on pretending to others that they are happy. (…) Deep down, they are suffering and they are full of tears, and on the surface, they go on maintaining a smile. (…) It is a very, very mutual deception. (…) The majority consists of very, very mediocre people, but one starts believing in the crowd. (…) A great thinker, Ruskin, has said that in life there are only two disappointments: to desire a thing and not to get it, and to desire a thing and to get it. (…) What is keeping you together? It is not life that is keeping you together; life has been hitting you hard from every nook and corner; from every direction life is hammering you. It is hope. Hope functions like a buffer. The shocks of life are absorbed by hope, and one goes on living and waiting for the tomorrow. And the tomorrow never comes.

One should think, when life is such a failure, people would start turning inwards easily. That is not the case. And there is a strange mechanism at work. (…) To deny suffering, they create bigger hopes. (…) To deny suffering, to make suffering look small, they create bigger mountains of hope, and those hopes go on pulling them outwards and outwards. (…) The big hope is going to become a big misery again – and then, to come out of it, you will have to create a still bigger hope. This is how one goes on and on, away and away from oneself. (…) To drop hope is to become religious. To attain to a spiritual hopelessness is to become free of misery. (…) And then only does one come to know one's inner sky.

Emptiness frightens people more than misery, and the innermost core is empty. Nothingness scares people more than suffering. Nobody wants to be a nothing – and our innermost nature is nothing; hence we cannot accept it.

Keep it in mind: pleasure always disappears, so we have always to search for it. That is the original sin. Don't taste an apple, because you are going to have to go looking for another one right after, and then there is no end to it. One thing leads to another, and so on, and so forth. And you become entangled in ten thousand things; then it becomes very, very difficult to come back home. You have invested yourself in so many things that it becomes almost impossible to get out of those entanglements. The religious person is one who is not entangled anywhere, who has no hope, who has no future, who does not live in the tomorrows, who lives now, here. With the religious person, life becomes a journey from nowhere to now-here. (…) That's all meditation is about – turning nowhere into now-here.

Witnessing, a silent awareness, uncontaminated by possessions, uncontaminated by desires and longings – this awareness is Buddhahood; this is awakening.

Man without woman is a wanderer, a vagabond. Hence, sooner or later, he needs to get rooted. The woman becomes his earth. Unless a man finds something in him that can become his earth, unless the man finds his own inner woman, he will have to look for the outer woman. The outside is a substitute.

When you are empty of yourself, you will be filled by truth; truth will descend into you. So all that a Master has to do is to kill you utterly and completely; to destroy your ego utterly and completely; to cut your head, so that you become the heart. And then, the whole energy moves into the heart. (…) Head is the barrier; and heart is the opening.

Anything that is complete drops, because then there is no meaning in carrying it; anything that is incomplete clings – it waits for its completion. (…) The whole existence has a basic tendency to complete everything.

It has been happening always, that a Buddha moves to the mountains, a Jesus moves to the mountains, a Mahavira goes into the mountains. Why do they move to the mountains, to the loneliness? Why do they become solitary? Just to face their inner mountains immediately and directly. In society it is difficult, because the whole energy is wasted in day-to-day work and routine and relationship; you don't have enough time, you don't have enough energy to encounter yourself – you are finished in encountering others! You are so very occupied – and to come face to face with oneself, a very unoccupied life is needed, because it is such a tremendous phenomenon to face oneself. You will need all your energies. It is such an absorbing job; it cannot be done half-heartedly. Seekers have always moved into solitary existence, just to face oneself, to make it uncomplicated – because in relationship it becomes complicated. You are already loaded – and then comes the other! And then you clash; then things become even more complex; everything becomes entwined. You are already a riddle – it is better to solve it first, and then move into relationship.

Unhappiness is the incapacity to understand life; the incapacity to understand oneself; the incapacity to create a harmony between oneself and existence. Unhappiness is a discord between you and reality; something is in conflict between you and existence. (…) Happiness is harmony, a relaxed flowing without any conflict. (…) Happiness is when you disappear; unhappiness is when you are too much. You are the discord; your absence will be the accord. (…) For happiness, you need tremendous intelligence – intelligence, not intellect. (…) Happiness is possible only with great understanding, an understanding like the peaks of the Himalayas. Less than that won't do. (…) If you are intelligent, your life will be of happiness. Why is intelligence needed? (…) Because life has no meaning in itself; you have to bring meaning into it. Life is just raw material; you have to create your meaning out of it. You have to create your God; God is not there waiting for you. You have to create meaning with your heart, within the innermost core of your being. Only then will you be happy. And to create meaning, you will have to be a creator. Painters paint, create paintings; poets write, create poetry; dancers dance, create dance… but these are all just fragments. A religious person creates himself; the religious person is the greatest artist there is. All other artists are just finding substitutes, and one day or another, they will become frustrated. (…) Unless you feel a point of immortality in whatsoever you are doing, you cannot be happy; and that point of immortality is felt only when you create immortality within yourself. Gurdjieff used to say, and very rightly, that man is not born with a soul. All other religions say that man is born with a soul, but Gurdjieff's saying is tremendously significant – man is not born with a soul. And unless you create it you will not have any soul; you will exist empty, and you will die empty. You will have to create it; that's why I say that great intelligence is needed. (…) To be intelligent is arduous; it will need tremendous effort on your part. You will have to destroy much that is rubbish within you; you will have to create almost a fire of consciousness, so that what is useless is burned, and only that which is pure gold is saved. Very few people are ready to go through that hardship, through that discipline which creates intelligence. (…) It costs so much; you have to put at stake whatsoever you have. It is a cross. In fact, you have to die to be intelligent, because only when you are reborn will you be intelligent, not before. And the cross has to be carried on one's own shoulders; nobody else can carry your cross. You will have to carry your cross to your own Golgotha; there is no other way. (…) Many times you will stumble; (…) many times doubt will arise; (…) many times you would like to go back to the world; many will be the temptations. But if you can stick to it, if you can remain on the path against all odds, one day intelligence flowers. It is almost like a seed: the seed cannot know what is going to happen; the seed has never known the flower – and therefore, the seed cannot even believe that he has the potentiality to become a beautiful flower. Long is the journey, (…) and nothing can be guaranteed – (…) many are the pitfalls; thousand and one are the hazards of the journey. (…) It is arduous; much courage will be needed.

Except awareness, nothing changes a man, nothing at all. (…) People who try to control themselves have chosen a very foolish way. Control will not happen, but they will become repressive and cold. That is the only way a man can control himself – to become frozen, so that the energy does not arise.

The religious person accepts whatsoever is on the outside as it is. He is not disturbed; he is not distracted by the outside. His whole work consists of moving inside. One moves through love; another through meditation – but both move inside. The religious world is the world of the within. (…) Sin means to be without, to be outside yourself; virtue means to be within, to be inside yourself.

People go on repeating old tapes to the very end. (…) To the very end, they go on playing games continuously.

Mind is conditioned from the outside; it can be ruled from the outside. You have to grow into no-mind; only then can you not be ruled from the outside. Only a man of no-mind is a free man, an independent man.

Whenever a man becomes enlightened, he has no biography. He is no more the form; so when he was born, when he died, are irrelevant facts.

Mind is a disease. This is a basic truth that the East has discovered. (…) No psychiatry will help; at the most, you can make it normally ill. (…) The East says that the very nature of mind is such that it will remain unhealthy. (…) The mind cannot be healthy, because it can never be whole; mind is always divided. (…) Fixedness is the nature of mind, and fluidity is the nature of life.

Remember, fear is goal-oriented. If you are not going anywhere, what is the fear? When you are no more there, what is the fear? (…) In the Ultimate, the goal-oriented mind is a hindrance, the greatest hindrance. You simply be!

When you are filled with thoughts, the mind is blurred; your vision is not clear. But what to do? Thoughts are there; they go on changing. Let them be there; you be unconcerned; you don't get involved. They move on their own; let them move. They flow like a stream; let them flow. You sit on the bank and rest. (…) And if you are unconcerned, by and by, the energy withdraws itself. They become less and less. Then a moment comes when thoughts come only when they are needed. Thoughts are not a burden – unneeded thoughts are a burden; they create a blurred vision. (…) Mind is a function, and a function is useful at the right time.

Tao says that one who feels that he has achieved has missed already. Life moves in circles; success and failure are two parts of one circle, one wheel, and success is the beginning of failure. The moment you feel that you have achieved, the wheel has moved, and you are already losing. It may take time for you to recognize this – intelligence is needed; clarity is needed. (…) Try to understand it; whatsoever you desire will go wrong. (…) Simply see the reality, that the opposite is implied everwhere. (…) Nothing is to be done. You have to become more aware in your doings; become more conscious.

The man of Zen moves through the world, uncontaminated, unpolluted by it. The world never enters him; that's why he is not worried about getting out of it.

Doing nothing simply means: no effort, not going anywhere, not desiring anything – not even nirvana, God, samadhi. (…) With effort, the whole world enters in. (…) Not doing anything means not desiring. There is no movement in you, in any direction; no ripple is arising. That is non-doing; that is the greatest that can happen to human consciousness.

Empty your boat. Go on throwing out whatever you find in the boat, until everything is thrown out and nothing is left. Even you are thrown out; nothing is left; your being has become just empty. (…) Emptiness is going to be the path. (…) Meditation is nothing but emptying, becoming nobody.

The mind has always the opposite within it, and that opposite goes into the unconscious and waits for its moment to come up. If you observe minutely, you will feel it every moment. When you say to someone, I love you, close your eyes, be meditative, and feel – is there any hatred hidden? You will feel it. But because you want to deceive yourself, because the truth is so ugly, you don't want to face it. You want to escape from reality, so you hide it. But hiding won't help, because it is not deceiving somebody else; it is deceiving yourself. (…) All relationships are love/hate relationships. No relationship is of pure love, and no relationship is of pure hate. It is both love and hate. (…) To be meditative means to be aware of the fact that mind is hiding something from you; you are closing your eyes to some facts which are disturbing. Sooner or later, those disturbing facts will erupt, overpower you, and you will move to the opposite. And the opposite is not there in a distant faraway place, in some star; the opposite is hidden behind you, in your mind, in the very functioning of the mind. If you can understand this, you will stop in the middle. If you can see, I love and I hate, suddenly both will disappear, because both cannot exist together in the consciousness. You have to create a barrier – one has to exist in the unconscious, and one in the conscious. Both cannot exist in the conscious; they will negate each other. The love will destroy the hate; the hate will destroy the love. They will balance each other, and they will simply disappear. The same amount of hate and the same amount of love will negate each other. Suddenly they will evaporate – you will be there, but no love and no hate. Then you are balanced. When you are balanced, mind is not there – then you are whole. (…) Meditation is a state of no-mind.

There is time; in time, everything changes. And there is eternity; in eternity, nothing changes.

Whenever you have too much, life becomes a dance, a celebration. But society doesn't allow you to dance, to celebrate; so society has to see that you never have more energy than necessary. You are only allowed to live at starvation level. You are not allowed to be too much, because once you are too much, you cannot be controlled, and society wants to control you. It is a domination, very subtle.

Mind is the dead part of you; it is the excreta. And just as there are constipated people who suffer very much, so there is mind constipation, accumulated excreta. You never throw it out. In your mind, things only go in; you never throw out. Meditation is throwing the mind out, unburdening yourself.

Tathata, acceptance, total acceptance, means no desire. Desire arises out of nonacceptance.

The sage does not live in the body or as the body – he lives through the body. (…) The body is extrovert; the psyche is introvert – and when you transcend both, Tao arises. (…) In transcendence is Tao.

A religious man has found his own law. If it fits with the society, good. If it doesn't fit with the society, then still he lives his own law. A religious man is free; a religious man is freedom. He lives through his innermost core. He has no outer imposed discipline on himself; he lives in no cage. He lives like a free being, whatsoever the cost. Even if his life has to be paid for it, he is read to pay, but he is not ready to curtail his freedom. (…) A traditional man is ready to lose freedom for cheap things: respectability, social honor.

To me, intelligence is the basic morality, the basic virtue. (…) That's what intelligence is: to live life so totally that there is no repentance, never. One is always contented. One knows that one has lived to one's uttermost.

Meditation is an inner bath; sannyas is a total cleansing.

Memory is what roots you in the past. Unless you become so free of memory that you need not look back – memory no longer disturbs you, memory no longer clouds you – you will not be able to live in the present. (…) Your imagination, your future, is nothing but a modified past. This is how people are living. The past is no more, and the future is nothing but a desire to repeat the past, the same past. They want to repeat. The mind is a repetitive mechanism; the mind continuously hankers for the same. And every moment, the reality is new; it is never the same; you cannot step in the same river twice. Life is constantly moving, changing. Only change is permanent; everything else is changing. Only change is not changing; that is the reality. But then you create a false, pseudo-reality of your own invention, fabricated in the mind, manufactured by your desire, and you start living in it.

Taoism says that to be in reality, a man has to get out of his mind; a man has to become a no-mind. To be in reality, a man has to uproot himself from the past; he has to forget the past. To remember that which is, the eyes have to be completely unclouded from the past – only then can you see the reality. Eyes that are clouded with the past are eyes that are blind. (…) You cannot see directly because of so many screens covering your eyes; those screens have been created by the past. (…) All these thoughts will be there, and you will not be able to see what is; you will miss the reality. (…) A man who has clarity never carries the past. He simply looks into reality with no interference from the past. (…) Dropping the memory means dropping the mind. Dropping the mind means dropping the whole world. Dropping the mind means dropping the ego. (…) Then you live a life with no mind of your own; that is the meaning of Tao. Then God's mind functions through you; then you don't have your own mind. (…) Now the center of the Whole becomes your center. You act, but you are not the doer anymore. God acts; your surrender is total. (…) The moment is all; the now and here is all; there is no then and there is no there. (…) This is the first satori, when a man becomes loosened from the grip of the past, the hold of the past, as if a snake has slipped from the old skin. He has become absolutely new. (…) It is a totally new way of life – the way of Tao, the way of Zen, the way of sannyas. (…) To live in memory is to live in sansara; to live without memory is to live in enlightenment.

An absent-minded person is not a man of Tao; the man of Tao is very much present. In fact, he is so present that his memory cannot interfere. He functions out of the present; you function out of memory.

The greatest training that is involved and the most difficult problem that arises is that tantra allows a man to make love to a woman only when the man has lost all sexual attraction towards the woman.

You become auto-hypnotized with your own ideas.

The very idea that the world can be made better is the very root of all ego trips. The world is perfect; there is no way to make it better. If you try to make it better, you will make it worse. Things are in perfect rhythm – nothing is bad; nothing is good. The good and the bad are man-created concepts. Nothing is right; nothing is wrong – those are our conceptions. Reality simply is neutral – neither good nor bad; neither beautiful nor ugly. It simply is. This 'isness' is Tao.

The more disciplined a child, the more stupid he will be; the more intelligent a child, the more rebellious he will be. Rebelliousness and intelligence are synonymous; stupidity and discipline are synonymous. (…) Your schools, your colleges, your universities all teach discipline; they have succeeded in killing the child's intelligence. (…) In fact, sensitivity and intelligence have to be destroyed. It is dangerous to allow a child to be sensitive and intelligent because, if the child remains sensitive, then society will not be able to force the child to do foolish things throughout his life. For example: a person goes on being a clerk his whole life, just piling up files. To do such a thing, you need to be very insensitive. If you have a certain sensitivity, you will want to break out of this nonsense. (…) It will not be possible. Society has to kill your intelligence, your sensitivity, so that you can be put into any nonsense job. And when you do a nonsense thing for your whole life, naturally, by and by, you lose all possibilities of being intelligent. (…) Brutality, violence, insensitivity is taught; only then can millions of people be turned into slaves. You think you are free people? Slavery has just become more sophisticated, that's all. Slavery still exists. No society up to now has ever been a free society. All societies have been slave societies. Slavery changes its forms – first it was very gross; now it is very subtle. And subtle slavery is far more dangerous than gross slavery, because you can rebel against gross slavery, it is so apparent, so obvious, but when slavery is very subtle, then you are not even aware of it. Your mind has been conditioned, and you have never even thought about it. (…) If you are doing things which others want you to do and you never do the thing that you want to do, you are a slave; you are not a free man. A free man is one who claims back his intelligence, who claims back his sensitivity. To me, that is what sannyas is. (…) To find a grown-up person who is still intelligent is very difficult, very rare. You can become intelligent only if you become very conscious about what has been done to you, about how your intelligence has been destroyed or covered up. You will have to rediscover it. (…) Look into your life, and you will find that you have turned everything upside down. That which is valuable has become valueless, and that which is valueless has become valuable. (…) Everything is upside down. You are living for the non-essential, for the artificial, and you have forgotten the essential. (…) Plastic flowers – yes, that's where you have settled.

A man who is free will live in the world; he will not drop out of the world – there is no need. You cannot drop out of one madness by creating another; you are simply changing your madness. (…) A person becomes intelligent when he starts living moment to moment totally. Then there is a great passion, a great intensity; one becomes aflame with life. In that aflame state of consciousness, one is intelligent; otherwise one is dull, dragging. (…) Only that person who lives in such a way that death cannot destroy anything, who creates his inner being in such a way that death cannot take anything away from him, who lives in an eternity which death cannot touch, who lives in consciousness – that man only is intelligent.

You have not lived at all; you only carry a few ideas. So if you are feeling unnourished, if you are feeling weak, if you are feeling death-like, it is natural.

The mind always looks for the Confucian; it comes across the Lao Tzu only accidentally. (…) Mind always looks for power, for some technology so that it can become more powerful in controlling – a principle, a structure, an ideology. (…) For example, you have come here. You were not looking for me; you were looking for a mahatma. You have come across me accidentally. You were not looking for me; the mind cannot look for me. For the mind, to look for me is simply for it to commit suicide. The mind looks for something that helps it to become stronger.

What is harmful, and what is beneficial? Sometimes poison becomes beneficial, and sometimes nectar can prove poisonous. Sometimes the person who wants to do good to you may do harm, and sometimes the person who wanted to do harm to you may do good. Things are very complex; in fact, almost incomprehensible to the human mind. Life is so deep and so complex, and we are so small, so tiny. There is no way to figure it out. (…) Lao Tzu says that the distinction between right and wrong is not possible. (…) Lao Tzu says that the mind is confusion. The moment you start thinking about what is right and what is wrong, you will be confused. The moment you start thinking about what is harmful and what is beneficial, you will be confused. (…) The moment you think, you are confused. Thinking is confusion; hence nobody can go out of confusion by thinking. Thinking will make you even more muddled. One comes out of confusion by non-thinking, by dropping all thought.

All that is significant remains indefinable.

All humanity is pseudo. Everybody is wearing a mask, and all people have lost their original faces.

Moralists and do-gooders are self-appointed dictators; they are ready to change everybody.

You have come across life for the first time; now don't lose this contact whatever the cost. I know it is costly to be alive, and it is very cheap to be dead. It costs nothing to be dead; it costs much to be alive. One has to pay for it.

Self-knowledge is not the knowledge of a dead self; self-knowledge is the knowledge of the process of the self. The self is not a thing – it is an event; it is a process. Never think in terms of things; the self is not in there inside you just like a thing waiting in a room. The self is a process, changing, moving, arriving at new altitudes, moving into new planes, going deeper into new depths. Each moment much work is going on, and the only way to encounter self is to encounter it in relationship. Love is the mirror of meditation. (…) Go on meditating and go on loving. Let love and meditation be two wings; let them help each other.

You would like to remain with the familiar, because there you have become very efficient. My whole effort here is to push you again and again out of the familiar into the unfamiliar, because wherever you have become efficient, you have become mechanical. (…) So when you become efficient, know well that now you have to move. Now this is no longer of any value; you have to move on and learn something else. If a person remains a learner each moment of his life, from birth to death, only then enlightenment comes; otherwise not. So never stop anywhere. God is infinite; there is no end to eternal growth. You go on arriving and arriving and arriving, but you never really arrive.

God only comes to you when you are totally lost. When you are really helpless, totally helpless, absolutely helpless, help comes. In your absolute helplessness, ego is completely gone. (…) And a moment of transformation will come where you disappear and the Whole takes everything in his hands.

A Buddha becomes enlightened in his own way. The enlightenment is the same, the experience of the light is the same, the experience of truth is the same, but the experiencer has an individuality, a unique individuality.

Being unique, being individual is everybody's nature; being special is relative. Uniqueness is everybody's nature, but specialness is comparative. When you start feeling that you are special, you are comparing yourself with somebody. (…) Each individual is so different from any other individual that there is no possibility of comparing. (…) To carry the idea of comparison, inferiority and superiority, you are carrying seeds of illness which will create misery, and nothing else. Comparison creates hell. (…) Never try to be special. In the very idea of being special, you are feeling inferior. In the very idea of being superior to somebody or inferior to somebody, you have lost contact with yourself, with your uniqueness. In that very idea, you have become your own enemy. Now you will be in trouble; you will create more and more misery for yourself and for others; you will create ripples of misery around you. A man who simply relaxes in his uniqueness is a man who creates ripples of bliss around him. He lives in bliss, and he creates pulsations of bliss for others also. If you are around such a man, you will be showered with great peace and love and silence and happiness. (…) Drop all comparisons; they are stupid and meaningless.

Ambitious persons become cruel and hard. How can you be joyful when you have to fight and struggle? It is a very difficult world then, cut-throat competition everywhere.

Forget about improvement; forget about transformation. (…) You are not here to improve; you are here to die and to be reborn. My whole effort is to destroy you utterly, so that you can be created in a totally new way. I would like to create a discontinuity in your life.

Only when the mind is in a deeply settled state will you be receptive. Otherwise, if the mind is stirred and there are clouds and dust arising all over, you are in a sort of storm.

A man is rich when all the polarities meet in him. When all the contradictions have lost their contradiction and have become friends, when you can befriend the contradictions, then you are really rich. This is the state of a religious man. The moral man chooses; the religious man lives in choicelessness. (…) The capacity to be all is the capacity of a religious man. He is capable of being all, whatsoever the situation may demand. (…) He is a free man; he has freedom. He uses all; and he is not used by anything. (…) A virtuous man is a man of many climates. A virtuous man is a man of tremendous richness. He has a whole orchestra, all possible notes, in his being. (…) He's always new, never old.

The reality cannot be deceived, and you have to suffer the consequences.

Miserable people cannot tolerate any happy person. Miserable people are so deep in misery that any happy person creates great jealousy, creates great restlessness in their being – they cannot tolerate it. The very presence of a happy and rebellious person shows them how unreal they are. The happy, the true person becomes the comparison.

To become a meditator means to drop out of the wheel of activities. I am not saying, don't do anything – I am saying, let God do it; just be a vehicle. That is the meaning of cutting off your hand.

A man of real self-confidence never carries much luggage. (…) People who don't have any self-confidence create a false self-confidence as a substitute. They are trembling inside; they are afraid inside. Deep down is cowardice, but on the surface they pretend that they are brave people, very courageous. Deep down is ignorance, but on the surface they are very knowledgeable. (…) If you are really self-confident, self-confidence will be like a shadow to you; it will follow you. (…) Self-confidence is always there when you have become a self.

The other is not the other. (…) Love means only this experience, that the other is not the other. (…) Love is an experience in which you feel that the other is no longer the other – the other is me; the other is my being. Maybe on the bodily plane you remain separate; on the mental plane you remain separate – but further down the centers start overlapping, merging, losing definition. That's what love is. (…) The other is hell if you are only pretending love. (…) Misery does not come out of love; it comes out of playing games, exploiting others, pretended love, false love. Love, and then you will know that the other is not the other. If you can love deeply, infinitely, you will by and by become aware that even the trees are not the other; even the stars are not the other. This is what I call becoming a sannyasin, to fall in love with the total. That's what Lao Tzu calls Tao. (…) When the other is not there as the other, there is heaven – paradise regained; when the other is there as the other, there is hell – paradise lost.

Tense people fit with other tense people; but with a non-tense person, they are simply at a loss. What to do?

When a person goes mad or neurotic, it simply shows that he was the weakest link, the most vulnerable, the most sensitive, in the group in which he used to live – so he became affected first. (…) You force the person into a mental hospital. The moment you force a man into a mental hospital, you fix the idea that he is mad in his mind absolutely, irreversibly. (…) You are hypnotizing him into madness.

My sannyasins are not an organization. Each sannyasin is related to me.

The realized person is one who has gone beyond the mind, but who cannot relate again to the people who are lagging behind. The Master is one who has gone beyond the mind and has become again capable of using the mind. Now the mind is not using him; he uses the mind – he is the Master.

Life is the first step; death is the second. Death is a higher phenomenon. Those who are not able to live rightly cannot die rightly.

Man is born in ignorance. The darkness is tremendous. We are born in darkness, not knowing who we are, from where we come, where we are going. We are just groping somehow, drifting somehow. We are accidental. We are unconscious. We don't yet have a destiny. We have not yet attained to the light of inner being which can enlighten our path. In this darkness, if frustration happens, if failure happens, if you only die and never live, it is natural.

Unless you know yourself, all knowledge is useless; unless you know yourself, all knowledge is pseudo-knowing – you appear to know, but you don't really know. It is deception. If the knower himself is in deep darkness, all his knowledge is just superficial; it cannot even be skin deep. Scratch the man of knowledge, and soon you will find ignorance coming out of him. You will find as ordinary and ignorant a person as any other. (…) Bertand Russell knows more than you, but the knowledge is quantitative; the knowledge is not yet qualitative. As far as your being is concerned, he is the same as you. He has more information, but not more knowing. More information is not more knowing, and more knowing does not necessarily mean more information.

Buddha was destroying two basic fundamentals of Hindu society: ashrama, the four stages of life, and varna, the four-caste system. Buddha was destroying this system because he said that one who knows Brahma is a brahmin – not by birth, but by knowing, by being. He said that everybody is born as a shudra, as an untouchable – brahmins included. By birth, nobody is higher, and nobody is lower. By birth, everybody is born as an animal. Then, if you work, grow, seek, search and refine your consciousness, by and by, slowly, you move higher. (…) The shudra, the lowest human being, is one who thinks only of the body; eat, drink and be merry – that is his whole life cycle. A vaishya means a businessman. He is a little higher, has a few more values in life, thinks sometimes about music, sometimes about poetry. The businessman is not courageous; if everything goes well, he may enjoy poetry, he may sit in his home – centered, secure – and think about God too. But he will not undergo much danger; he will not take risks. He thinks first about the profit, and he only goes so far. Then comes the third stage – the kshatriya, the warrior. He becomes a little more interested in higher things; he starts searching for truth, for beauty, for love. And he is ready to stake his life; he is ready to lose his life for these higher values. He is ready to gamble; he is courageous. The warrior takes risks; he puts his life at stake. And the fourth, the brahmin, is the highest, the one who goes deeper into the mystery of life, reality, existence. And he is never satisfied unless he comes to know what ultimate truth is. That is what brahmin means – one who comes face to face with the ultimate truth, the absolute truth. (…) Buddha said that these are not divisions of birth; these are divisions of qualities that one has to evolve. Everybody evolves from the shudra, and everybody has to go to the brahmin. And he said that a sannyasin has nothing to do with age, with how old you are. Sannyas is not concerned with time; sannyas is a movement into timelessness. Buddha said that sannyas can be entered whenever somebody is ready; sometimes a child will enter into sannyas. Buddha allowed young people. And there are different qualities of people, different intensities, different passions.

In knowing, one does not know who is the knower, who is the known, and what is knowledge. Knowing, a man becomes a mystic; knowing, a man becomes one with reality; knowing, one loses all distinctions, differences, boundaries, definitions; knowing, one becomes undefined, as undefined as reality itself.

Tao says that any activity done with full awareness becomes a meditation. (…) Each activity can be turned into a meditation.

When the archer takes his bow and arrow and aims at the target, there are three things: the archer, the arrow, and the bull's eye. (…) You can become technically expert in hitting the target, but that is not much – not much if you are trying to get into deeper waters. You are an expert, you are a man of knowledge, but not a man of knowing. (…) Taoists say that the real thing is to see the source from where the aiming comes, from where the arrow takes the energy. (…) That is the real target. If that is the target and sometimes you miss the outer target, nothing is wrong. (…) Look deep into the source of your energies; penetrate into the source; the periphery is not the point. You may succeed or you may fail, but that is not the point at all. The real thing is: have you succeeded in getting centered in your being? (…) To succeed with the outer target is masculine energy; to succeed with your inner source is feminine energy. To succeed with the outer target, you have to be aggressive, ambitious, concentrated, attentive, outgoing, extrovert. (…) To move into your center, one needs to be feminine, passive, inactive, non-doing, non-interfering, meditative. Meditation, relaxation, not concentration, is needed. One has to relax oneself completely and utterly. When you are not doing anything, then you are at the center; when you are doing something, you have gone away. (…) Coming closer means that you are dropping your activities; you are learning how to be inactive; you are learning how to be a non-doer. (…) Learn the real thing – you have to take your bow without being a taker; you have to pull your arrow without being a puller; you have to aim at the target without aiming. There should be no tension, no effort, no doing on your part. You have just to be passive; you have to let it happen rather than doing it. Then you will be centered. (…) Watch these moments of let-go, because they are messages from God. (…) Welcome them, so that they become more and more available to you. Receive the guest gratefully, so that it starts coming more and more often. Tao says that the real happens only when you are in such a state of diffused relaxedness that you cannot say "I am". "I am" means you are tense.

By learning, you know the world; by unlearning, you know yourself.

Each activity has to fall back into the original source.

A person who is aware that he is mad is already on the threshold of sanity.

Tao is the vision of the total, the vision of the Whole. Parts don't matter; parts don't have any meaning in themselves. The meaning belongs to the Whole, to the unity; if you look for meaning in the parts, you will look in vain. Not only that – if you insist on looking for meaning in the parts, you will destroy meaning rather than find it; it will be a destructive attitude. (…) The taoist vision is to look at the part through the Whole so that the Whole can give a meaning to the part, make it meaningful. (…) Take things out of their context, and they lose all meaning; they lose all beauty; they lose all truth. Truth is with the Whole – so is beauty; so is goodness. This is the first thing to be understood about Tao – it is a vision of the Whole.

Tao says, look for the unity that existed before analysis began. Go to the primordial, the primitive unity, the original. (…) The wholeness precedes analysis. (…) The vision has to be total, and you have to see things in their totality. You are not to put them together. If you put them together, it will be a false unity; it will be a synthetic synthesis; it will be artificial, plastic. It will not be true.

Explanations are concerned with the parts; understanding is concerned with the total. (…) Tao is not interested in understanding anything in separation, because that understanding will be false, rooted in falsity.

When you come to me, you are mad; you are neurotic. I am not worried about it. My whole function here is how to make it creative. Madness is great energy. (…) Everything is potential; (…) everything can be used; (…) everything can serve meditation.

A Buddha leaves no footprints.

Self-consciousness is the disease.

If you want to be happy, then there is no other way than enlightenment. If you want to be ordinary, nobody has ever been ordinary without enlightenment. (…) Every mind is seeking some extraordinariness – and thereby creates misery; that's what the ego is, and misery is the shadow of the ego. (…) Enlightenment is to be ordinary, healthy, aware, whole, total. (…) Nobodiness is your very nature. You are nobody; (…) God doesn't allow anybody to be somebody. (…) He gives you the freedom of nobodiness, infinite, nonending. (…) Enlightenment is a man who is fully aware of his inner emptiness.
The ambitious mind is never here-now; the ego is always running.

To live a life of no problems is to live an enlightened life.

The mind is always searching for perfection; the mind is a perfectionist. (…) understand these two dimensions: the dimension of perfection, and the dimension of totality. With perfection, the ego can exist; in fact, it cannot exist without the dimension of perfection. The ego is always trying to be more and more perfect, and when you want to be perfect, you have to choose – you cannot be total. If you want to be wise, you have to choose – you have to drop foolishness; you have to fight against ignorance. And if you want to be perfectly wise, you have to cut out all possibilities of ignorance, of foolishness, of madness. But a total man is different. He is wise in his foolishness; he is foolish in his wisdom. He knows that he is ignorant; that is his wisdom. In him, opposites meet. (…) Buddha is wise; Mahavir is wise. You cannot find a single bit of foolishness in them; they are perfection. Lao Tzu is not; Chuang Tzu is not; Lieh Tzu is not. They are contradictory, paradoxical, but that is where their beauty is. (…) The more total a person is, the more incomprehensible he becomes, because the more he becomes like God. (…) No one knows his ways; no one knows who he is. (…) He is not clear-cut; he is a wilderness – that is the beauty.

Buddhahood is not an achievement; it is just a recognition of who you are. It is just a remembrance.

'Isness' is the nature of the inner emptiness; consciousness is the nature of the inner emptiness; bliss is the nature of the inner emptiness. (…) You don't know how to be empty; you only know how to be filled. You don't know how to die, how to die to the personality, how to remain in inner emptiness. (…) When you come inwards and thoughts start moving away from you, suddenly fear takes possession. Where are you going? You feel like you are disappearing; you feel like you are dying. A sort of non-existence grips you – as if you are standing at an abyss and you are looking down, and it is bottomless. (…) Death is encountered.

If you escape from this point, you will never be able to meditate. Hence, a Master is needed.

The devil is absorbed by the Divine. (…) If you live a part life, you will be the devil, because the devil is nothing but a part claiming to be the Whole. (…) When you accept it, it is absorbed by the Whole. If you fight with it, then you will be fighting with yourself, and you will always remain divided. In division, the devil exists; the devil cannot exist if you are whole and total. (…) When you accept the whole of life as it is, without judging, without denying, whatsoever it is, whatsoever the case, when you accept life in its totality, then the devil disappears – it is absorbed by God; it is absorbed by the Divine.

Life has no conclusion; it goes on and on without a conclusion; it is without any beginning and without any end. (…) Life is a balance between opposites; it never comes to an end. The balance goes on and on; it is eternal. A man of understanding never comes to any conclusions; he cannot. When life itself is non-conclusive, how can a wise man be conclusive? (…) He lives according to life, and the most basic note, if you live according to life, is balance. Never move to one opposite; never cling to one polarity. (…) You have to walk in life, and see how you fall; you have to watch yourself, and observe how you go astray. And the mind will insist on going to the very extreme. Whenever you feel an imbalance, immediately balance it by moving to the opposite. (…) The middle is an alive situation; it is not a fixed and dead point that you achieve forever. Moment to moment, you have to achieve it, again and again and again, like a tightrope-walker – being statically in the middle, he will fall. He is never for a single moment static. He is dynamic, constantly changing, a flux, but the flux has a balancing center. Sometimes he moves to the left, sometimes he moves to the right; he is very contradictory, he is not consistent. If you ask for consistency, he will fall and die. (…) Any static position kills – to be static is to die; to be static is to miss life. (…) To remain in the middle, you have to constantly move and balance. Every moment, life is changing; nothing remains the same – how can you remain fixed? (…) You cannot step in the same river twice; neither the river remains the same, nor you. (…) Flux is reality; sameness is illusion. In such a changing world, in such an alive world, if you cling to a position, you are dead; you are seeking suicide. That's why all those who have reached and concluded are dead. (…) A moment comes when fame becomes defame, when success becomes failure. Remember always to remain in the middle; a constant alertness is needed – otherwise the tendency of the mind is to become obsessive; whatsoever it gets, it becomes obsessive about; it will not allow you to rest. (…) The nature of the mind is obsession. (…) Do, but don't do too much, otherwise the same energy will become the undoing. (…) Rest is needed. (…) When you are moving according to Tao, you are happy, blissful, celebrating. Every moment is a joy; (…) life is a benediction if you move according to the law. (…) If you move against it, if you go contrary to the law, you lose balance. (…) It simply shows that somewhere you have gone against the law. Find the balance again; come back to the path. (…) And this has to be done continuously. (…) By and by, it will become natural; that is right. By and by, you will go less and less against the law.

Don't conclude; life has no cause-effect relationship. Even if something appears for nine hundred ninety-nine times, don't conclude; the thousandth time may be the exception.

Don't try to find meaning. Meaning and a constant obsession with meaning is a disease of the mind. (…) Don't bother about meaning.

It is a very difficult training to read Gurdjieff; in fact, no more than a few dozen people exist in the world who have read this book All and everything completely. It is difficult. It is a one-thousand-page book, and Gurdjieff is a master of hiding things. He goes on saying irrelevant things, useless things, spinning tales within tales – hundreds of pages, and then one line of truth, but it is worth seeking; it is a diamond. A hundred pages of rubbish, but then comes a diamond – it is worth it. If you can find diamonds in Gurdjieff, it will be a great training for you. And then you can find elsewhere what is true and what is not true. Otherwise, you can become a victim of fiction.

The deepest core of being is non-being. The foundation of 'isness' is nothingness. And when I say nothingness, I don't mean nothingness – I only mean no-thingness. Form exists on the base of the formless; form comes out of the formless. (…) Jesus says to his disciples: Unless you lose yourself, you will not gain yourself. If you cling to yourself, you will be destroyed; if you don't cling to yourself, you will be saved. He is saying that if you move into non-being, only then is the being saved.

When you work with the hands, no shadow of the head arises; a person remains humble, innocent, natural. When you start using cunning devices, the head comes in.

A man of knowledge lives on the circumference; a wise man lives at the center. A wise man lives in the depth. (…) There is only one way to reach a wise man – you will have to come to your own center. Center to center, there is communion with a wise man. Head to head, mind to mind, there is communion with a teacher, a man of knowledge. The wise man has by and by disappeared from the world.

A wise man falls in love only once; then he knows everything about it. He penetrates the whole mystery; he lives the whole mystery of it; he moves into its world, but so totally that not even a corner is left unlived. Then, he comes out of it; then, there is no question of falling in love again – he has lived, and he has known. He has become wise through experience. A foolish man will repeat the same thing again and again and again; and he will never be able to learn anything from it. Awareness and courage to live have to be there, so it will happen only rarely that a child or a young man will be wise – ordinarily, a man will become wise when he is old. (…) Young men can be beautiful as far as the physique is concerned. (…) But as far as the soul is concerned, which evolves, grows only through much experience, only an old man can be beautiful. Rarely it happens, because rarely are people aware; rarely do people live through life with meditation. (…) An old man is like a snowcapped peak of the Himalayas, silent. The storm has passed. All that was needed to know, he has known; nothing more is left to know. The ego has been dropped on the way somewhere because it was a burden; with such a burden, you cannot reach the peak. When one moves towards the peak, one has to leave everything by and by, by and by; the final peak is when you have to leave yourself too. You reach the peak as a non-being, because even being becomes a burden in the final stages.

What is depth of understanding? Depth of understanding is when you can stand in others' shoes, when you can see from others' eyes, when you can feel from others' hands, when you can stand in the other's being, at the other's center, and look through him – how he feels, what he feels, what he says. (…) A man of knowledge is always blind, argumentative; he is always right, and the other is always wrong. (…) For a man of deep understanding, everybody is right – because he can penetrate to the very depth of your being and can see your viewpoint also.

The more profoundly you move inside yourself, the more incomprehensible you become to others, because they live on the surface. If you live on the surface, everything is okay – they understand you; the surface they know. But if you start moving downwards, deeper into your profundity, then a moment comes when you become incomprehensible. You have gone beyond them; they cannot understand you. (…) You can understand only to the extent that you are aware. You cannot understand more than your awareness; your understanding is bound to remain confined to your alertness. If you want to understand a wise man, you will have to grow into awareness. The more your awareness, the more you can penetrate him. When you are perfectly aware, only then is a Lao Tzu open to you. Not that he was closed, he was always open – but you could not enter him; you were not yet capable of it.

The wise man is not irresolute; he is without conclusions. (…) A wise man is neither open-minded nor closed-minded – he is a no-mind.

The wise man is not grave, but he appears so, because he is not shallow. His smile, his laughter is not that of a shallow man.

A man of wisdom lives in oneness; that's why he mixes freely. There is no barrier for him.

Remember always that life is a togetherness of opposites, a deep harmony.

It is for you to feel your desire: total desire – enlightenment is sudden; partial desire – enlightenment is gradual. It has nothing to do with the nature of enlightenment.

Desire means rejection of something – you would like to be something else; desirelessness means acceptance – you are happy as things are. In fact, things are irrelevant; you are happy, and nothing else is needed. (…) In deep acceptance, the ego disappears. Ego exists through rejection. Whenever you say no, ego is strengthened, but whenever you say yes, a total yes to existence, that is the greatest meditation you can enter into. Once you enter, you are no more.

You are violent, and you need a catharsis.

Listening to me, by and by, you will come to a point where you will understand that all questions are futile, that questioning is useless. When this realization arises in you, questions disappear. When all questions disappear, the answer arises. And as many as there are questions, there is only one answer – and that is self-knowledge. So I am helping you to become aware.

This is my experience, that in the end, one finds that everything fits together. (…) This is what acceptance is. (…) Live life in its totality, move in all its dimensions, totally, and in the end, you will find that everything helped. Everything! Failure and success, pain and pleasure, right and wrong, going astray and coming back home – everything helps. And out of this chaos arises a harmony. But one has to live life totally. (…) That final harmony, that crescendo, is a cumulative effect. So enjoy wherever you are; be grateful, whatever you have. Feel deep gratitude; let that be your only prayer. (…) The incomplete life cannot become a crescendo; this life remains always incomplete, fragmentary; it cannot create harmony. Then you will die a chaos, and that's why you are always afraid of death. When death knocks at your door, you will tremble, because the life harmony has not yet been achieved, and death has come. You are as yet incomplete, in fact unborn, and death has come. You have not lived life, and death has come. A man who has lived his life, one who has lived his day, always accepts death beautifully, because there is nothing left to be done anymore. He has done all, he has lived all, and he moved in all directions. Now he is ready to die; there is nothing else.

Do you know? – for one spoonful of honey, a bee has to visit five thousand flowers – for one spoonful of honey, five thousand flowers! And for one pound of honey, they say thousands of miles have to be traveled by bees. One spoonful of honey, five thousand flowers! One spoonful of harmony, and five thousand experiences, thousands and thousands of experiences… And remember one thing – wherever you are, be totally there, otherwise you will visit the flower and you will come away without the honey. That is the only misery that can happen to a man, and that happens to almost ninety-nine percent of the people. (…) Don't come back empty-handed. When you visit a flower, really visit it. Be with it as totally as possible. Then you accumulate life's honey, and when you die, you die blissfully, ecstatically. You lived; there is no complaint in your heart, no grudge.

The mind can never ask any fundamental question, because whatever the mind asks is bound to be superficial. When a question arises out of your being, not out of your mind, it will not be verbal; it will be existential. You will be the question – then it is fundamental, foundational, radical; it comes from the very roots. (…) And when that fundamental question is asked, only then can the Master give you himself in his totality, can he pour himself into your being. (…) When you ask a question, the quality of the answer is already contained in it.

When I say, I cannot do anything, I only mean that no 'I' exists within me; the doer is dissolved. So without the doer, how can you do anything? But things happen. I cannot claim the authorship of them or the doership of them; I am not the doer. In fact, I am not. I am just a presence, just an opening, and much is possible if you are in my presence, if you allow my presence to move into you, melt into you, become part of you. (…) I am a no-mind; the only way to be with me is to be a no-mind, and then things will happen. Nobody is doing them; they simply happen on their own accord.

Nothingness is the only temple.

If death is destiny, as it is, then the whole of life becomes a preparation, a training for it; a discipline in how to die rightly and totally and utterly. The whole of life consists in learning how to die.

There are two stages in the final disappearance. The first one is not to be afraid of death. And once you are not afraid of death, the second step is not to have any deep lust for life. Then you go beyond. (…) Hold firm to the basis of quietude.

Whenever a man who has not lived well, who has lived half-heartedly, dies, there is agony. (…) So whenever you die, your death will show how you lived, whether your life was a real life, authentic, or an ugly, dishonest life.

There is only one religion in the world which has given permission to commit suicide – that is Jainism. Mahavir, who is the greatest propounder of non-violence, has given permission to his disciples to commit suicide – but only to those who have lived life completely, perfectly, totally, who have known everything that life can give and who have experienced it. Now they are fulfilled. They are not destroying themselves against life – they are fulfilled; the work is done. They are returning to source. Mahavir is really very courageous; no other religious teacher has been courageous enough to allow suicide. But Mahavir has made conditions for it: it should not be committed in any negative mood, because then you miss the point and you will be thrown back. It should be absolutely positive. And one should fast, fast unto death. Millions of times, there will be a possibility for you to think again and again and again. And if you have remained a little unfulfilled, you will come back. To remain with a decision for a hundred days is difficult for the mind; only one who has no mind can remain with a decision for a hundred days continuously and move towards death happily. To commit suicide in a single moment won't do, because in a single moment, you can be deluded, you can be in an illusion, in a sort of madness. (…) I can allow you and I can admit you to total suicide; that's what I am all about, that's what I am doing here – preaching total suicide. Total means no coming back, and that is possible only through deep meditation. A point comes when all desires disappear. (…) But you are not finished with life; you are fed up with the struggle, not with life. You desired and you couldn't reach, so now you feel frustrated. (…) You cannot come across a man of average intelligence who has not sometime or other contemplated committing suicide; life is such a struggle. (…) If you want to commit suicide, think whether it is because of desirelessness or not. If it is because of desirelessness, then from where is the desire to commit suicide arising? (…) I say: If you really want to commit suicide, then do it – but then, why are you here to ask me?

Suicide means: what a rotten life you have given me; take it back. (…) Suicide is the greatest complaint that you can lodge against existence and God. (…) Suicide can never be a flowering if it is out of frustration. If it is a flowering, if you have simply grown out of life, you have reached a point where life has nothing else to offer you, you have learned the whole thing, then your schooling is complete, your training is over. Then there is a possibility, as in Mahavir's discipline. He allows – but even then I will not allow, because my feeling is that if you have really learned everything, what is the point in committing suicide; why can't you wait? What is the hurry? If you are so fulfilled, what is the hurry to finish yourself? If you can't wait, you have not learned at least one thing – that is patience. (…) A man of enlightened consciousness accepts life, accepts death. (…) Whether death comes today or tomorrow, it is the same to him. This patience is the final flowering.

A man possesses only that thing which he has renounced. (…) If you cling to your property, the property possesses you; (…) if you can renounce, only in that renouncing are you above your property, above your possessions. Things are left behind.

The Buddha is your destiny; the fool is your reality.

Just by trying hard, nobody achieves, but by trying hard, one by and by comes to feel that the effort itself is the barrier in the final stages of transformation. By trying hard, one comes to know that even trying hard is a barrier, and one drops it. (…) All efforts are of the ego; even the desire to achieve truth comes from the ego. (…) But remember, one can drop effort only when one has made the effort to its utmost, with one's total being. (…) To become artlessly artful is not possible for those who have not moved through any discipline.

Inner conflict makes you mediocre; (…) immediately division enters; you are split. The whole of humanity is schizophrenic. To be one is to be blissful; to be divided is to be in misery. The more divided, the greater the hell.

Gratitude follows like a shadow when you have an inner blessing, a feeling of constant benediction.

Live dangerously; live according to your own self, whatever the cost. Whatsoever is at stake, live according to your own consciousness, according to your own heart and feeling.

Untruths can be dropped only when you have become mature enough to drop them; otherwise they are needed.

I have been observing thousands of people, seekers, non-seekers, this-worldly, that-worldly, and every day I come across the phenomenon that I don't see that people are really interested in being happy. (…) I see them continuously trying to be unhappy, trying to find ways and means of how to be unhappy.

The more you participate in existence, the more healthy you will be; the more you remain standing on the bank uncommitted, non-participating, just a spectator, the more unhealthy you will be. To be healthy is to be whole, to be with the Whole, to participate.

A man of totality allows the lower to be there, because that is the only way for the higher to be there also; then he creates a harmony between the lower and the higher. In that harmony, lower is lower no more, higher is higher no more – they have become one, one unity.

Monastery means a place where people live alone; even if others are there, everybody lives alone.

The enlightened man, even while he is alive in the body, has already dissolved. He knows that he is no more; he knows that he is nothingness. The dissolution has already happened. In fact, nothing has dissolved, because nothing had been separate from the very beginning. Separation was an illusion. (…) Only the dream dissolves, nothing else; only the ignorance is lost, nothing else; only sleep dissolves, nothing else.

Gurdjieff has given a beautiful classification of man. He had seven types, and he was perfectly right. The man who lives in his body, for his body is type number one. Type number two is emotional; he lives through his emotions. The third type of man is intellectual. He lives through his intellect; he is a great controller from the head. This third type of man controls the world. But these three types are all on the same level and available everywhere. You cannot find these types in their purity; they are mixed, a hotchpotch. If you can find a man who has these three things absolutely separate, he is the fourth type of man: the yogi, the fakir, the mystic. He has separated his being into different layers; he does not allow head, emotions and body to interfere. The fourth type of man is the man who has separated his being, who has given to each center its own work. Unless he does this, everything is intermixed and nothing functions well; everything is a confusion and a smoke; no clarity exists in you. The fourth type of man comes into existence when the centers start functioning in their own territory and they don't trespass. This takes long effort. The fourth type of man will be rare for you to find; still the fourth type exists. The fifth type is even rarer; the fifth type is the man of awareness. The fourth man can work without awareness; the fourth man can work through a teacher or through a discipline or through a methodology and sort out the three layers. Much awareness is not needed; a little understanding will do. The fifth type becomes aware of the whole phenomenon – the three different centers and the fourth's effort to bring them to their own territories. The fifth becomes a watcher, a witnesser. It is very rare to find a man of the fifth category. But he is only aware – awareness will sometimes be there and will sometimes be lost. He cannot be constantly aware, because for constant awareness, an integrated center, which is lacking the fifth type of man, is needed. The sixth type of man is very, very rare. The sixth type of man is one who is not only aware, but who has become centered, who has attained to his center. The fifth type of man watches; the sixth type of man watches from an eternal center – he has attained to a tower inside. And his awareness is never wavering; his inner flame remains unwavering. And then, there is a seventh type of man about whom nothing can be said. There is only one way to know the seventh type; Hindus call it satsang.

Sannyas is the ultimate game, the last, the final. Beyond it there is no game; beyond it the world of game disappears. Then there is reality. (…) Play the game as beautifully as you can, but it is a game – don't get serious about it. And even if seriousness is sometimes needed, let it be a game, nothing more. Be serious, but never become serious; let that also be a game. Let everything be a game.

Don't be violent with life. Everybody who has been violent with life will repent.

Prayer is the meeting of spirit with Spirit.

Mind is always after the extreme. It exists because of the extreme; mind is the extremist. (…) The mind is always overdoing, either on the left or on the right. Whenever you are overdoing a thing, you are becoming a slave to the mind. When you are balanced, non-extremist, you are going deeper than the mind; you are moving in the heart. That's why I say, don't renounce the world; (…) be in the world, but not of it. Be in the world, but don't allow the world to be in you – then, an equilibrium is attained. (…) I am not telling anybody to move to the monasteries. I am insisting, remain in the market. If the market and the meditation can both go together, there will be an equilibrium attained. Lao Tzu says, Never too much. Even too much of God is bad thing; too much of meditation is a disease. Too much of anything is wrong. (…) In Zen monasteries, they are doing eight hours, ten hours, per day. (…) Their whole life seems to be just sitting. (…) They don't enrich themselves by life experiences. (…) They don't move in the world; they are afraid, fear-ridden. And all their meditation is nothing but a deep suppression. Meditate, but go to the market, because there is the test – whether you have been meditating rightly or wrongly.

Ambition is insanity. Ambition shows that you are not at ease with yourself, that you are not at home. Ambition shows that now you want that others should know you are very great. That is just to hide your smallness; inside you feel inferior. Only an inferior mind is ambitious. A superior mind need not be ambitious; there is no point in being ambitious. He is so fulfilled, if you put him last, he will be happy there. Wherever he is, he is happy. (…) A non-ambitious mind is religion incarnated. (…) Around him, you will find an aura of fulfillment. He is not competing with anybody else; there is no need. He feels enough; he feels grateful. (…) The inner riches are such, there is no need to compete. That is the meaning of inner treasures. (…) That's the difference between religion and politics. Politics attracts inferior people, people who are filled with inferiority complexes. To be religious is to drop the inferiority complex. (…) I say, you are gods. Realize it – it is not to be attained; you are not to achieve anything.

One who loves deeply becomes deathless; one who loves deeply goes beyond death. One who knows love knows also that death does not exist, because in deep love, you come to know death – you die, and you resurrect. The cross and the resurrection both happen in love; that's why people are afraid of love; (…) your love remains superficial.

The temptation is strong to be attached to a Master, to cling to a Master, to become a shadow – but that won't help; that will be suicidal. Don't cling to me; I am here to make you free. I am here to help you to be completely, authentically yourself. (…) If you have accepted me as your Master, then the only way for you is to know yourself. Forget about me; move inwards. One day, when you will be standing in your own total glory, in the magnificence of your inner being, in the inner light – there you will find me. Not as a separate being, not as an object, but as the very innermost core of your own self. (…) The outside is the world; your own innermost interior is the transcendental. Move inwards, and you come closer to me.

If you wish to be devoted to God, if you really want to know the truth – live unattached, but live. Unattachment should be a way of life, not renunciation. Live unattached, but emphasis is on being in the world – live! Don't try to commit a slow suicide; live life through and through! Live unattached, homeless – live in the home, but be homeless. Live with the family, but as if alone. Move with the crowd, but never become a part of the crowd. Be in the marketplace, but never lose your inner meditativeness.

The head belongs to the world; the heart belongs to you. The head is trained by the world; it is the world put within you. That's why it misleads. It always says things which go against the innermost flow. It goes on diverting your energies, diverting your energies according to the society in which you have been brought up. The heart is natural; the head is social. The head comes from the crowd; the heart comes from the universe.

Once you have become a Buddha, you know the Buddhahood of the whole of existence. Then you never meet anything which is not part of Buddhahood, enlightenment. (…) Once you are alert, aware, enlightened, the quality of the whole existence changes for you.

Ordinarily, the disciple bows at the feet of the Master. But that is in the visible world which can be seen by the eyes; in the invisible, the Master is bowing down at the feet of the disciple. When Jesus was leaving his disciples, the last night, when he was caught, and the next day he was murdered, he bowed down and touched the feet of all his apostles; even the feet of Judas he washed and kissed. And they were all surprised; this had never happened; what was he doing? He was bowing down to the future Buddhas. Even a Judas some day or other will become a Buddha, a Christ.

Fear is darkness; it is absence of love. (…) If you fight with darkness, you will be defeated; you will become more and more afraid, and a new fear will enter into your being – fear of fear. (…) Do something with love; forget about fear. If you love well, fear will disappear. (…) If you feel there is fear in your being, love more. Be courageous in love; take courage. (…) Love more, love deeply and love unconditionally; the more you love, the less will be the fear. And when I say love, I mean all the four layers of love, from sex to samadhi. (…) Sex, love (people, relationships), prayer, meditation – these are the four stages of love, and on each stage, there will be a disappearance of fear. (…) If sex happens beautifully, the body fear will disappear; the body will not be neurotic. (…) If love happens, fear will disappear from the mind; you will have a life of freedom, ease, at-homeness. (…) If prayer happens, then fear completely disappears, because with prayer you become one; you start feeling a deep relationship with the Whole. From the spirit, fear disappears; the fear of death disappears when you pray, never before it. (…) And when you meditate, even fearlessness disappears. Fear disappears, fearlessness disappears; nothing remains. Or, only the nothing remains – a vast purity, virginity, innocence.

You are not your brother's keeper; nobody is meant to be anyone's keeper. You are here to be yourself. Your only responsibility is towards yourself. (…) First be selfish; only then can you be unselfish. Be rooted and centered in your being, so overflowing that out of your overflowingness you share. Never become a martyr; never become a sacrifice – otherwise you will never be able to forgive those people who forced you to become a sacrifice.

Nobody has any mission to fulfill, but ego always wants such things, that you have some great mission to fulfill. (…) Be ordinary; just the effort to be extraordinary is a sort of madness. Just be ordinary, and you are divine; try to become extraordinary, and you are mad.

I don't think of the morrow at all, of what will happen tomorrow. People who will be here tomorrow, they will think about it. This moment is enough for me. (…) You have a small life span; (…) just see how you can live so you can be fulfilled. Whether in the future there will be wars or not, who are we to decide? And why should we bother? (…) But there are utopians who go on thinking about the future; they miss their lives in thinking about the future, and that future never comes. The word utopia means: that which never comes. Go on thinking about it: a world without wars, without famine, without poverty, but what is the point? You are dreaming! Rather, be more realistic. Create a human being inside who has no warring tendencies, no conflicting tendencies, no violence, no aggression – that's all that can be done. (…) You can do something for the human being that you are. (…) Be loving, prayerful, meditative. Create at least one human being as you would like the whole humanity to be; at least create a model in you, so that your fragrance spreads and gives a vision to people. (…) You are not a missionary; you are not a do-gooder. You simply live your life in the small corner that you have got. Whatsoever you can do for yourself, do it.

Love me only to drop me one day. And love me so deeply that you can drop without any grudge, without any clinging, without any complaint. (…) The last step has to be taken in the Divine, in God, and the Master has to be dropped. The Master is naught but a door.

You try to solve one problem, and a hundred and one problems arise out of your efforts. (…) This mind that you already have is not the mind which can solve. Whatsoever you do with this mind, it complicates it more; it is a vicious circle. When it complicates a thing more, you try to solve it more; then it complicates it even more, and this goes on and on. If this mind is allowed to go to the very logical extreme of its capacity, you will become mad. Insanity is going to be the logical outcome of it. You don't become mad because you don't go to the very extreme, that's all. Between mad people and you, there is a difference of degree, nothing else. One step more, and you will become mad. You don't go to the extreme, that's all. You cling to the middle, so somewhere you manage your normalness. (…) Life is not a problem to be solved; so any effort to solve it is foolish. Life is a mystery to be lived. (…) This is the basic standpoint of religion, that life has to be lived. It needs not a knowledgeable mind, but a wondering heart.

The first time you listen to a symphony, it is absorbing, fulfilling; you are lost in it; it takes possession of you; you move into another world. The next time you hear the same symphony, it is not so beautiful. And the third time, it is already getting a boring phenomenon. And the fourth time… and the fifth time, you are completely bored. Now, is boring a quality of the symphony? Is boredom part of the symphony, or is it something you bring to it? (…) Knowledge creates boredom. (…) If you want to create boredom, become more knowledgeable, and you will be completely bored, dead bored. Know more, and you will be more bored; know less, and you will be always filled with wonder. Don't know at all – that is innocence. (…) Don't become knowledgeable; don't gather dust. Remain clean; make sure that your mirror remains fresh.

Unless man comes to a higher state of understanding and innocence, which no drug can give, drugs will continue. (…) If Buddha and Mahavir and Krishna and Lao Tzu are against drugs, they are against drugs because they live on such a high peak of consciousness that if you drug that consciousness, it falls low, it comes down.

Understanding is intelligence moving in depth; knowledge is intelligence moving wider and wider. (…) Understanding moves vertically; intelligence moves horizontally – understanding is a totally different dimension. (…) Intelligence is quantitative; it can be measured – but no one can measure how much understanding you have. It is not a quantity at all; it is a quality, in depth. And understanding is not in any way dependent on knowledgeability; it is dependent on awareness. (…) It is not a question of memory; it is a question of seeing the truth. And understanding is neither for nor against; it is simply understanding. (…) To be more is the way of understanding; one gathers being, not words and concepts and philosophies. (…) Understanding is virtue. (…) In fact, understanding is practice. If you really understand, practice simply happens; there is no need to do anything for it. (…) Understanding is practice itself. Once you understand, transformation happens immediately, naturally; (…) no effort is needed. (…) If effort is needed, it is not understanding. And through effort, no one reaches truth; only through understanding.

Unless you raise your awareness to a different plane, problems will not change. It has been my observation, working with thousands of seekers, that no problem can be solved if your plane of consciousness remains the same. (…) Change the plane of your consciousness, and problems start changing.

Man is identified with his body. Too much identification with the body will give you constipation. You cling; you don't allow the body to have its way. That is the meaning of constipation. Constipation is a spiritual disease; get disidentified with the body. (…) Keep an awareness that you are a witness. And never say, "I am constipated", just say "The body is constipated; I am a witness to it". (…) If you are identified with the body, the body cannot flow well. That's why whenever you are ill, deep sleep is needed, because only in deep sleep do you forget the body, and things start flowing.

People are not simple, but very complicated, puzzles. They don't even know themselves, how much complexity they go on carrying within them. And that complexity will not allow them to understand a simple phenomenon, a simple principle – that you are a part of life, a wave in the ocean. Don't fight with the ocean. Rise with the ocean; fall with the ocean – don't create any separation between you and the ocean.

When falsity is known as falsity, it drops. When untruth is known as untruth, it drops. When a dream is known as a dream, it disappears. The moment you know that it is a dream, it has already started disappearing.

What I say to you, for me, this is my understanding. For you, this is just information. Somebody has told you. (…) truth cannot be taken for granted; one has to grow into it. It is not something that can be transferred from one hand to another. Even if I try to transfer my truth to you, the moment it reaches your hands, it will be a falsehood. That is the very nature of truth: untransferable. You have to grow into it – it is your own maturity; it is your own realization. (…) And this is the intrinsic nature of knowledge: borrowed, it burdens; it never makes you free. Only knowing frees you, liberates you. Jesus has said, truth liberates – but not another's truth. Otherwise all Christians would be liberated already. But a Christian is not liberated; in fact, the truth of Jesus has become his bondage. A Christ is a liberated soul, but a Christian lives in a prison, decorated in a Christian way – he is not liberated. From religion to religion, prisons differ; fetters can be different, but the bondage is the same. (…) You have created your bondage out of your ignorance; you have to create your own liberty out of your realization of truth. Nobody else can liberate you – only you, and only you. (…) Truth has to be individual. It has to be basically your own; only then it cuts the knot – otherwise not.

I go on talking to you; while I am talking to you, I am not really giving you some information. In fact, I am just creating a device around you, so that in that device, in that situation, you can become more alert.

When humanity becomes more aware, marriage will disappear. Not that people will not be together; really, only then people will be together. Now they live together, but they are not together. They live in the same house, but they don't live in the same home. They are physically together, spiritually far apart.

When love is only physical, it is as if you have an aeroplane with four engines, and one engine only is functioning. Lopsided it goes, and always in danger of falling. When all four engines function (sex, love, prayer, meditation), when all the four function in tune, in a deep harmony, then you know what it is to be here, what it is to be. Then you become religious; then you feel gratitude; then you simply bow down. You simply bow down in deep gratitude before the Whole.

When you suffer for freedom, that suffering is good. When you are comfortable because of bondage, that comfortableness is bad. (…) Society lives for comfort. Only rare individuals choose suffering, to grow. Society is a collective death; dragging somehow.

Mind is a guilt-creating force. And you have been trained to create nothing but guilt. For all the past centuries, priests, politicians, they have been dominating humanity by creating guilt. (…) Religions have taught and preached that sex is bad – a sin. Now, sex is a natural desire, a very natural phenomenon. You have nothing to do with it. But they have been conditioning the mind that sex is bad, and every child is taught this, so when the sex urge arises, he feels guilty. And then both ways are difficult – if you don't move into sex, the natural urge becomes a nightmare; if you move into sex, the cultivated mind makes you feel guilty. So, either guilt or repression, this is the choice that has been given to you. (…) Things go on changing, ideas change, but still the original guilt-creating force remains the same. (…) I am here to make you guilt-free, to make you natural, flowing, accepting and not denying – because by saying a total yes to life, by affirming it and not negating it, that's how I have come to know the Ultimate. (…) Do whatsoever you want, and do it totally. Don't create guilt; if what you do is wrong, you will come to understand that it is wrong. If what you realize is beautiful, it will grow. There is no other way.

Don't create ideals. Once you create ideals, you will always be in difficulty, because you will always be thinking in terms of should, ought, and you will always feel crippled, guilty, a sinner. You will always feel ill; you will never be able to accept yourself. You will never be able to love yourself; and a person who cannot love himself in spite of all the mistakes that a human being is prone to make, if you cannot love yourself in spite of all things, you will miss the whole point of being here in life. To love oneself in spite of everything that is here, that gives you a base. Only on that base you love others; only on that base the edifice of higher love is erected. Remember, experience is always good; I say always unconditionally. Even if it is bad, it is good, because you know this only through experience. Once you know, it drops; nothing to worry about. Mistakes drop by themselves.

If you are really sincere towards yourself, you are sincere towards me. If you become yourself, you have followed me.

To become religious, one needs a dancing heart; to become religious, one needs to be celebrating.

To reach the absolute, you will have to pass through an interim period where everything will become a chaos. That has to be passed. Before you become absolutely normal, you will feel that you have become absolutely abnormal. Because that which you call normality is nothing but a social face. Society has to be dropped. Then you have to drop your past samskaras, past conditionings of the mind. Then only you come to the purest source, the very source, the very ground of being. We call that ground of being God, an experience of absolute virgin purity, innocence, that is hidden behind you. (…) Buddha, Mahavir, Jesus and Mohammed retire from society to face their ugliness. But once that ugliness has disappeared, they come back again into the world, beautiful, supremely beautiful. But this passage has to be passed; this much cost has to be paid.

Man is like an onion – layers of layers of personality; and behind all those layers is hidden the essence. (…) Unless one goes on peeling his layers of personality to the very end and rediscovers the essence, one remains sick minded. (…) The very understanding of the layers is a healing force.

Life should be a rhythm between opposites. That's why I say, remain in the house, remain in the market, and become a sannyasin. Move sometimes to the lonely world; again come back to the market. Between meditation and market, there should be a rhythm. Then you will be nourished by both; you will thrive; you will attain to abundance of life.

Madness has to be passed through and through. You have to move through it, remaining alert.

Chuang Tzu says, it is better to drop effort in the beginning. It has to be dropped: either you drop it in the beginning, or you will have to drop it in the end. (…) So there are two ways: either make a total effort, so total that all hope is shattered, and you come to realize that nothing can be achieved through effort; there is not even a single small fragment somewhere in the unconscious lingering still saying: "do a little more and this will be achieved…" Either make a total effort, then it drops by itself, or don't make any effort at all. Just understand the whole thing; don't move into it at all. Remember one thing: you cannot come out of it if it is incomplete; once entered, it has to be completed, because the mind has a tendency to complete everything. (…) Anything incomplete gives you tension. (…) And in your life, everything has been left incomplete! You have never laughed totally; you have never cried totally; you have never been angry totally; you have never hated totally; you have never loved totally. Nothing has been done totally; everything is incomplete. Nothing is total. It lingers on, and then there are always many things on your mind. That is why you are so ill at ease; that is why you can never feel at home. (…) Chuang Tzu says, it is better not to start, because once you start, it has to be completed. Understand, and don't move in a vicious circle. (…) So don't be concerned about what you are doing – do it so wholeheartedly that the very doing becomes a bliss. And don't think of great things; there is no such thing as great or small. (…) Easy is right. (…) Begin right, and you are always easy; begin right, and you are always at rest – that is the criterion. (…) And then, live in such a way that you are always easy.

The more cultured and civilized, the more dead (…) – the man inside is dead. (…) Culture kills you; culture is a murderer; culture is a slow poison – it is a suicide. (…) Chuang Tzu and his old Master, Lao Tzu, are against culture. They are for nature.

If you really want to become a meditator, first go to the past. If you have taken a wrong route somewhere at some crossroad, the only way is to go back to the crossroad and move again on the right path. There is no other way. Wherever you are now, from here you cannot suddenly take the right path; you have to go back. And when I say relive, I mean allow it to happen in the body.

Unless you are ready to drop yourself totally, nothing can be done.

Live, but don't make your life a demonstration. All such demonstrations are lies. (…) Don't demonstrate yourself; don't live through public opinion. (…) What others think or say is irrelevant; what you are is the only relevant thing. (…) Don't make your life a piece of showmanship; once you start, there is no end to it – then you will always be making yourself false. (…) Once you become interested in what others say about you, each new act of yours will be a failure. (…) You never come to the fulfillment of your destiny. (…) You may attain much of the rubbish of this world, but you will lose all of the real. (…) There is only one sincerity needed of you, and that sincerity is towards Tao, your inner nature, your authentic being. No other sincerity is needed; let the whole world say that you are insincere. (…) You are here to fulfill yourself; others are here to fulfill themselves. If they expect something from you, this is their problem; you need not become false because of it. (…) Be sincere to your inner nature, and help others to be sincere to their inner nature. This is what I call a religious man. (…) Don't expect anything from anybody, and don't fulfill others' expectations of you. (…) This is what sannyas is; this is what it is all about. (…) Be true to yourself, and don't look at what others are saying. This is the only way to reach to the Divine, because it is the only way to be natural.

Chuang Tzu says, be the last, so nobody can push you further back. Don't move to the front of the queue, because then everybody will be your enemy, and sooner or later, they will punish you. Everything has its opposite with it. If they appreciate you, they will punish you; if they respect you, they will insult you. (…) A man who is wise never asks for your appreciation. When you come with garlands for him, he says: 'Stop here and now, because later I will have to pay.'

Fulfillment comes through nature, not through society.

All ideologies, all ideals are condemnatory, because then an image is created in the mind. And when you go on comparing yourself with that image, you will always feel that something is lacking, something is missing. Nothing is lacking, and nothing is missing; you are perfect as far as there is any possibility of perfection. Try to understand this: (…) This very moment, why can't you enjoy and be blissful? Where is the block? The block comes through the ideal, through the goal. (…) The ideal is created, and because of the ideal, you become condemned. Compare yourself with the ideal, and you will never be perfect; it is impossible. Then bliss is impossible, because the ideal becomes the greatest disturbance. (…) This is how you have been missing life for many lifetimes. You create an ideal, and then you want to be that ideal; then you feel condemned and inferior. Because of your dreaming mind, your reality is condemned; dreams have been disturbing you. (…) you say, "If those conditions are fulfilled, then I will be blissful". Then, even if these conditions are fulfilled, by that time, you will have lost the capacity to celebrate and enjoy. And when these conditions are fulfilled, if ever, your mind will create further ideals. (…) How can you enjoy? (…) You are filled with so much greed, passion, anger, fear; first they have to go. Then you will be like gods. (…) Be like gods this very moment; (…) celebrate life. (…) Then you have hit upon the right path; it is not otherwise. When a person can celebrate life in its totality, all that is wrong disappears; but if you try first to make arrangements for the wrong to disappear, it never disappears. (…) Celebrate, become a blissful flame, and all that is wrong disappears.

A mind is a social function. (…) And there exist many types of human minds, because there are so many societies on earth. (…) Everybody has settled for a mind, and every mind is a fragment. (…) The fragmentary mind is just a method, a function for society. (…) One has to throw away this mind; only then the cosmic mind, the universal mind, happens to you.

Mind is activity, and being is absolute inactivity. Mind is running; being is sitting. The periphery is moving; the center is not moving. (…) Don't fight with anything, and don't try to escape from anything. Let things take their own course. You simply close your eyes and move inside to the center.

Don't create any ideal; otherwise you will create conflict and condemnation and escaping and fighting.

The mind goes on finding ways and means to be outstanding. If you cannot be anything else, at least you can be the tallest dwarf. (…) A man of Tao drops all distinctions; he burns all certificates; he destroys all bridges; he remains in himself; he becomes a flower. And this flowering is purposeless; it has no utility. Many are benefitted by it, but it is not for them; it is for one's own self. He has attained his own destiny. Then there is fulfillment.

The real thing is how to change your being. Not your behavior; not your words; not your clothes – how to change your being. A man of rules changes himself on the periphery. A man of understanding changes himself; then the periphery changes automatically. When the center changes, the periphery changes automatically – it has to. But when the periphery changes, there is no necessity for the center to change with it. (…) What can rules do? (…) they can only change your actions, and actions are not you. Actions come from you, but you are deeper than your actions. Rules can change your behavior, your relationship with others – but they cannot change you. Only in total aloneness are you your being; not in relationship.

A wise man receives you not according to him; he receives you according to you.

Always give the opportunity to the other to be himself – that is what understanding is; that is what love is. Don't force yourself on others. Your wishes may be good, but the result will be poisonous. A good wish is not enough in itself; it may turn poisonous. The real point is not your good wish; the real point is to give freedom to the other to be himself or herself. (…) we are all sea birds, unknown to each other, strangers. Nobody knows who you are. At the most, all we can do is to help you to be whatsoever you are going to be. And the future is unknown; it cannot be forced. And there is no way to know it; no astrology will help; these are all foolish methods. (…) If you are a little understanding, give others around you freedom to be themselves, and don't allow anybody to interfere with your freedom. Don't make anybody a slave to you, and don't become a slave to anyone. This is what sannyas is; this is my meaning of sannyas. It is a man who has decided not to enslave anybody and not to be enslaved by anybody; a man who has decided to remain authentically true to himself, and wheresoever this truth leads, he is ready to go. This is courage.

Understanding is not temporal; it is not experience. (…) A man can live for a thousand years and remain stupid. (…) It is not the quantity of experience that makes you wise; it is the quality. A single experience can give you more wisdom, if you bring the quality of awareness to it, than you may gain in many lifetimes.

The knowing will come from your totality, not from the intellect. (…) This is what salvation is.

Tao does not create any 'ought'. Chuang Tzu says: Don't say to anybody that you ought to do this, you should do that, you ought not to be like this. Chuang Tzu says these things are dangerous; you are poisoning. There is only one thing to be followed, and that is your nature; wherever it leads, trust it.

Ego would like to pretend even about wisdom. Hence, Chuang Tzu says: Don't say anything about what you are, who you are; just hide yourself. Those who have eyes, (…) they will come to you; you need not go and knock at their doors – the very phenomenon will attract them.

Remember one basic thing always: there cannot be anything more than nature; nature is the Whole. So you have to find a way to fall back from the cultured pattern of your life into the natural flow.

There are so many people around, and they are all expecting you to do this and to do that. So many people, so many expectations, and you are trying to satisfy all of them? You cannot satisfy all of them. (…) you will get neurotic; that is how everybody has gone neurotic. (…) The whole effort will end in your own deep dissatisfaction, and nobody else will be satisfied. You cannot satisfy anybody; the only satisfaction that is possible is your own. And if you are satisfied, then a few people will be satisfied with you, but that is not your concern. You are not here to fulfill anybody else's expectations, their rules, their maps. You are here to fulfill your own being. That is the whole of religion, the all of religion; you are here to fulfill your own being! That is your destiny – don't waver from it; nothing is worth it. (…) You have to seek your own, and it differs from individual to individual; everything differs from individual to individual. There is no rule that you have to fix and fit into; you have to find your own rules. Just try to understand – whatsoever gives you happiness and blessings and peace and silence, seek in that way; more will be coming soon. (…) Don't follow anybody, otherwise you will be unhappy. And you are unhappy enough, because you have been following your father and mother, teachers, religion. You have been following so many voices, and all those voices are so different, contradictory, inconsistent. You are being pulled in all directions; how can you be together? You are a disintegrated phenomenon, a crowd, one part going to the East, another part going to the West. (…) Be together! (…) Only listen to your own voice, even if you have to err sometimes, even if you go wrong sometimes, don't bother. (…) Meditation is a deep listening, listening to the inner voice. (…) Listen to the inner voice, and then follow it; (…) that is your way to God. And all a Master can do is to bring you to your inner voice. The Master should not become the substitute; otherwise you will become even more crowded than you were before. (…) Once you can feel your inner voice, then no rules are needed; you have become a rule unto yourself.

Religion is rebellion – rebellion against others; rebellion against well-wishers; rebellion against do-gooders. It is the greatest rebellion, because you are alone; nobody else is there, and you have to travel the path alone. It is the rebellion of the individual against the crowd. The crowd is very, very powerful. It can crush you; it has already crushed you. You are crippled and crushed; you are almost dead. To leave you alive is dangerous for the crowd, because then you will follow your own path – and the crowd wants you to follow. The crowd wants you to become a clerk in a post office, a teacher in a primary school, a nurse in a hospital, and your inner voice may not be ready for it. Your inner voice may be moving you to become a Buddha or a Chuang Tzu. But the society does not need a Buddha; it needs a perfect executive. What is a Buddha needed for? He is a useless economic burden.

Mind is never in any danger, except in the presence of a living Master. Then it is just on the verge of death.

Religion has to be discovered again and again and again. It is an individual discovery; it cannot become a tradition.

The distance between you and your desire always remains the same. (…) You just be here and now. This moment is enough; don't ask for more. This is the real sage – the one who lives in the moment, for whom this moment is enough. He is fulfilled. There is no heaven for him; he is heaven himself. There is no God for him; he is divine himself.

Duty is the ugliest thing, I tell you. Love is the most beautiful; duty is the ugliest. (…) Duty is a social by-product.

Now everything is done by machines; technology has relieved you of much work. You become aggressive; you fight; you get angry. (…) that is why I insist on active meditations, not silent meditations. Because your energy needs acting out; it needs catharsis. You have too much energy, with no action for the energy. And rich food is available, and food creates even more energy – and there is no physical work. (…) Man is physically a hunter; he needs much activity to be relaxed. So choose, but according to your bodily needs. Don't force the body, don't compel it; just feel the body and what it needs. (…) Meditate and be active; let the energy flow. (…) Action can lead you to Tao; inaction can also lead you to Tao. (…) In action, you give; in inaction, you receive – and a balance is needed. And the more you give, the more you will receive, because the emptier you are, the more will you be able to receive. A small river will receive little; a big river will receive much. When the Ganges pours herself into the ocean, the ocean has to return the same Ganges – again and again it happens.

God always comes to you the same way you go to Him; it cannot be otherwise. Because God is just the returning – if you reach Him dancing, he reaches you dancing; if you are acting as a martyr, because of duty, then God will come the same way to you. (…) if you go dancing in your life, He will become a flute. Remember this – God is a response; it is a resounding of your being. The whole existence resounds in you. (…) Whatsoever you do will be returned to you; this is the law of karma.

Society needs yes-sayers; it does not want anybody who is individual. It wants people who are only personas, just pseudo, individual for the name's sake, otherwise not, people who dress in the same way as everybody is doing, who go to the same church as everybody is going, who want to live a life which is everybody's life. (…) To be discontented with the world is the beginning of the search for God, for something higher. (…) Unfortunate are those who are satisfied with the world, with their job, their wife, children, the car and the house – they are unfortunate. They have settled very cheaply; they have sold themselves very cheaply. They have sold out; they are no more alive.

The moment you stop celebrating, you start taking yourself too seriously. (…) In celebration, the self disappears. That's the beauty, that's the divinity of it. When you are celebrating, you are not; celebration is. (…) To make effort is the false path; this creates the ego, crystallizes the ego. (…) The only real path is when you start dancing and singing – you start losing yourself; you abandon yourself; you become drunk.

To me, a real man has to live in all the seven chakras together, balancing them as complementarities. Then, life becomes tremendously rich. Then you have the tranquility of the introvert and the excitement of the extrovert. That's what a rich life has to be – the silence of the introvert and the joy of the extrovert; the center of the introvert and the periphery of the extrovert. That's what I call an abundant life. (…) No center has to be sacrificed for another, because every center is autonomous, has its own world. It does not exist for another, no; it is not a means for another. It exists for itself; it has intrinsic value.

Sing and dance and do things without consideration of others. A person who is continuously considering others never grows.

If you can enter into a zero, you will become spiritual. Then you will live a totally different kind of life – you will live in the world, and yet you will not be of the world, because continuously you will live in your inner void. You will be in the world, but untouched by it, unspoiled by it. You will do everything that is needed, and yet you will not be a doer. You will talk when needed, but deep inside you will remain silent. You will carry a zero inside you always and always. (…) If a man carries a zero within his heart, he is a virgin. (…) Christ-consciousness is born only out of zero.

One should die to the past each moment, so that one can be in the present totally. Dying to the past is the only way to live rightly.

We need an external order because we are lacking the internal; we need external discipline because our innermost core is undisciplined. When the inner discipline is born, then one can simply throw all external discipline; there is no need for it – now, there is no need for crutches.

Self-knowledge is the goal; use everything as a means towards it. To know oneself should be the base of one's life; everything else is secondary.

Sannyas means allowing God and existence to happen to you.

The only illusion that man has to drop is the illusion of separation.

When we are beggars, desire is all that we have. (…) We forget all about our kingdom, the kingdom of the within, and the moment we forget the within, in the without we are beggars. Then we can become even emperors, Alexanders, still the begging remains. One goes on asking for more and more and more, and there is no end to it.

There are two kinds of realities: the reality that is created by sleep, and the reality that is revealed by wakefulness. The whole effort of sannyas is to change sleep into wakefulness, to shock you, to shake you into awareness.

Character is a kind of pseudo-life, because deep-down you are one person, and on the surface you are pretending to be somebody else. It creates a split – you are never one whole; and there is constant conflict between the real and the false. The false is appreciated by society, and the real is condemned by society, but the real has power, and the false has no power.

Never cultivate peace. We are not to cultivate peace positively; we have just to withdraw all the barriers between us and the Whole.

My sannyasins have to live, truly live, and whatsoever the cost has to be paid. Live truly; be authentic to your very core. On that point, never compromise; because to compromise on that point is to sell your soul. Then all is lost.

Misery is a kind of shrinking of the soul. (…) Misery is a compromise with the society. One has to be ready to accept condemnation from the society; then only can one live a blissful life.

Learn the ways of being blissful. Don't miss a single opportunity; and they are coming every moment. (…) Slowly, slowly, the art is learned.

Unless bliss is achieved, a man has lived in vain; his life has been nothing but a failure. He may have all the riches of the world; that will not make any difference. If his heart is not overflowing with bliss, nothing is going to make any difference; his life remains a tale told by an idiot, much ado about nothing.

It is the intensity of the search that breaks the ice; it is the intensity of the search that creates the fire. In that fire, all that is not needed is burned, and all that is needed is purified. (…) Put your whole energy into being true, authentic; just be that which you are, and risk everything for it.

Salvation is not something that man can do. It can only descend as a grace; it can only come as a gift. Salvation is so vast and man is so small that it is not possible for man to manage it. The more man tries to manage it, the more entangled he becomes in new kinds of chains, in new imprisonments. He moves from one cell of the prison into another cell, that's all. To be really free, to be totally free, to be absolutely fee, can only be a gift from God. That is the meaning of elisha: God is salvation.

Bliss is the rock of eternity; everything else in life is a constant change. (…) The search for truth is the search for that rock which is timelessness. One has to go within oneself until one finds that point, that unmoving point on which all movement depends. (…) Time exists as a wheel around the center of eternity.

Truth has to be realized and love has to be lived. (…) The ultimate synthesis only happens when love starts flowing from the experience of truth.

One has to learn what is valuable in one's being, and what is worthless. And one has also to learn to sacrifice the worthless for the valuable. Only then, slowly, slowly, are energies transformed; the alchemy happens. (…) Awareness is the vehicle for transforming the lower into the higher.

Prayer is the ultimate expression of love. (…) The day your love becomes universal, it becomes prayer.

Never think in terms of the part; always think in terms of the Whole. This existence is one single unity, one wholeness. That's exactly the meaning of the word God. (…) The moment the illusion of separation disappears, one is back in paradise.

Love brings wisdom. Wisdom is the shadow of love; without love, there is no wisdom.

Life is only an opportunity; love is the fulfillment.

If the heart follows God, and the heart is followed by the mind, then your life is religious.

The essential core of all religions has always been the same – Man, know thyself.

You have come to understand a very basic thing; now don't forget it – everything happens, and nobody has any power. The whole power-trip is an illusion. Nobody has any power. Everything is happening on its own. At the most, you can cooperate or fight. If you fight, then too it will happen, but you will miss the bliss of it. If you cooperate, then too it will happen, but not because of your cooperation – it was going to happen anyway. You will feel blissful, ecstatic. So cooperate with life; don't create any conflict – and then everything falls in line; everything settles.

The extreme is the disease, and the mind lives through extremes. The mind always thinks in terms of either/or, and reality is exactly in the middle. (…) And exactly in the middle is also the point from where transcendence happens, from where you go beyond both. To be in the middle is to go beyond both. (…) The moment you stop choosing and allow life to be as it is, you immediately fall into the middle. Let-go is the way of the middle; choicelessness is the meaning of let-go. Then you allow life, whatsoever it brings. Buddha calls it the philosophy of suchness, tathata, the philosophy of as-it-is-ness. Let it be as it is – when it is night, don't hanker for the day; when it is day, don't ask for the night. Don't choose; allow it to happen. Slowly, slowly, a great understanding arises out of this allowing, out of this let-go. And that understanding makes you alert, aware that you are separate from both. You are neither life nor death; you are just a witness. That witnessing is Buddhahood; that witnessing is enlightenment. And to be in the middle is the way to it. So let this be your key – never go to the extreme; always keep in the middle, like a tightrope walker. Slowly, slowly, the knack arises. Once you have understood how to be in the middle, the mind disappears on its own accord, because it cannot exist in the middle – that is the secret of the work.

Ordinarily, our energy is in segments, in fragments, and the fragments are not joined together; the energy jumps from one fragment into another.

The mind is always in conflict with something or the other; it needs conflict to exist. It can exist only in conflict and through conflict. It is a constant war; it is violence. It either fights with others or it starts fighting with itself, but one thing is certain about it, that it cannot exist without fight. It is its very breath. The moment you stop fighting, the mind starts disappearing of its own accord, and the disappearance of the mind is the appearance of God. The disappearance of the mind is the disappearance of you, you as an entity separate from the Whole. Then the Whole takes possession of you; you are overflooded with the Whole. And that experience of being overflooded with the Whole is satori, samadhi, enlightenment, realization, liberation, salvation. (…) It is sheer experience; the experiencer itself has dissolved into it. And the way to it is surrender; stop fighting. And to stop fighting, understanding is needed – to understand how we are creating our own misery. The ego is a self-created hell. The mind is our own creation, and it is a nightmare, a constant, on-going nightmare. When the mind is no more, for the first time one realizes how beautiful life is, what a benediction, what a blessing. Then, celebration starts. Learn to be in let-go.

The world has become very small – now it is not worth travelling; all is known about it. There are small differences which don't mean much. And this is good in a way, because in the future, the traveller will not have anything to go outside for; he will have to go inside. Every traveller will have to go inside; the outer is finished. Through scientific technology, it has no more meaning anymore. (…) The outer journey is finished; now a far deeper, a far more valuable journey starts with sannyas.

The search always comes out of anguish. Whenever there is great anguish, the anguish becomes a challenge; one has to search for something which is so meaningful that the anguish can be dissolved through it. When the darkness is very deep, only then does one search for the light. And the darkness is really deep. This is one of the darkest ages; never before has man been in such a disturbed, confused chaos. Because all the old values have disappeared. Man is no more rooted in the past; and there are no more any goals in the future – all utopias have failed. Man is utterly desperate now to know what to do and where to go. In the past, it has happened many times that a certain value became valueless –another value took its place; it was substituted. One religion died; another took its place. One idealism was found futile; another better vision, more golden, was immediately available. What has happened this time is that all the ideals have failed, and there is no more any substitute. It is not that one value has failed and another has come into being; that is not much of a change. This time, value as such has failed, and there is utter darkness, nowhere to go. This is the greatest challenge to human awakening.

All meditations are nothing but devices to purify the inner being; so is prayer. The whole science of religion tends towards one goal – how to purify the inner being of man; how to drop the past, the burden, the dead, the dull; how to make man more sensitive. The deeper the sensitivity, the deeper we penetrate existence. And God is the very core of existence. Unless we penetrate our own core, there is no possibility of contacting the source of all life.

Man has become too wordy. The word has become his world. He lives in words, and he has forgotten that he has depths beyond depths which no word can ever penetrate. That's why the modern man seems so shallow. And when the inner silence has been felt, even your words carry it. The fragrance of it even lingers around in the words; even small gestures become great poetry. The way one looks, the very eyes, the way one walks, the very grace, expresses something which cannot be expressed. And not to know that which cannot be expressed is to remain poor. To know that which cannot be expressed is to become really rich, because that is what God is all about. (…) This is my whole work here: to help people go beyond all words.

Between the potential and the actual, there is always a gap, because the potential is infinite, and the actual is always finite. What you are doing is never what you can do. You are more than that, and you are always more than that. You are more than your acts, than your doings, than your creations. The creator is always more than the creation, and the creator will always remain more than his creation. If one remembers this, life has thrill. It is constantly moving into new breakthroughs, constantly crossing new barriers, new hurdles, reaching to new peaks, to new visions, to new skies and new horizons. So, go on moving. (…) You are always reaching, reaching, and never really arriving. Adventure is religion, and the greatest adventure is God.

Sannyas is nothing but a sacred 'yes'.

For higher love to become possible, you have to go through many loves of the lower kind; otherwise the higher will not happen. The higher needs a kind of seasoning, and the seasoning happens through the lower. If you miss the lower, you will never know the higher, because the lower is the first step to the higher – one has to suffer it. (…) Don't ask for the impossible; go slowly. Each step has to be passed, and each step has to be understood, and you have to ripen in many stages before you can reach to the ultimate of love.

In the unconscious, nothing can be dropped. (…) You cannot drop anything from the unconscious. Only when the unconscious becomes conscious can it be dropped. It is just as you cannot cut the roots of the tree unless you pull the roots out of the earth. Then you can cut them. You have to dig and take the tree out; then you can cut the roots.

One should not become attached to one way of life. One should remain flexible, available to all the possibilities. One should keep all the doors open.

My whole approach is to drop all inhibitions, all taboos, to drop all repressions, and become again Adam and Eve.

Only that for which you are looking intensely will you be able to see; otherwise things will come and go, but you will not become aware of them.

Science will give us better houses, better cars, better technologies, better standards of living, but it cannot give us a significant life. It cannot give meaning to us; it cannot give us ecstasy.

The introvert grows only when he is alone, unrelated, unburdened, without any responsibility. The extrovert grows only when there are great responsibilities, great challenges, great crises every day. (…) He fights outside, and in fighting outside, he grows inside.

To know life in its truth is a blessing; to know life as a lie is a misery. To live in lies is to live in hell. Lies are many; truth is one. To attain to truth is to enter paradise.

The only problem is the self; all other problems are by-products of it. People go on becoming too concerned about other problems. They try to solve them, but they cannot be solved, because they are not the real problems, just by-products, shadows. (…) Anger arises because of the ego – so does greed; so does ambition. Unless the base is destroyed, those problems will continue in one form or another. You can close one door, another will open immediately. You can throw the problem outside from one door, and as you turn, you will find it has entered again from the back door. There are not problems; there is only one problem – that is the false idea of 'I am'. You are not; God is. Dissolve the 'I', and all problems simply disappear as if they had never existed. That is the meaning of swanirodha, cessation of the self. And that is the whole work here – to help you to dissolve, to persuade you to melt. (…) To cease means to commit suicide. Sannyas is suicide; literally, not metaphorically. The ordinary suicide is nothing compared to it. In the ordinary suicide, you can only change the body like the clothes or the house, but you remain the same. In sannyas, you disappear, and when you disappear, there is great benediction.

Life in God is a life of rebellion. One does not live by conscience; one starts living through one's own consciousness. Conscience is borrowed; consciousness is individual – it is yours.

Meditation is a sharpening of understanding. The more silent you become, the more intelligent you become. Be still, and out of that stillness, a new understanding will arise in you. That understanding transforms one's whole being; it takes you from the world of misery into the world of bliss.

Misery dissipates energy and life. The miserable person is only half alive. The miserable person is not dead, that's true, but he is not alive either – he is in a kind of limbo. He just goes on hanging around.

To be blissful means to get into deep rapport with existence. To be blissful means to live intensely, totally, without holding anything back. Then each moment becomes tremendously significant; each moment brings new ecstasies; and new planes of existence open their doors. The more you become committed to life, the more mysteries will be made available to you. That is the only way to earn them. The keys to the mysteries of life cannot be given to each and everyone; one has to be so total that one earns them. So be total in whatsoever you are doing, and do it with such great joy that it is no more work; it becomes worship.

The real Christ is nothing but a new consciousness, completely free from the mind, a consciousness with no content, a consciousness with no thought, with no noise, a consciousness pure, simple, virgin, utterly empty.

A blissful person is one who possesses his own self, one who is a ruler of his own being. That dimension of being a Master of oneself is the dimension of sannyas.

To forget the center and to become too obsessed with the circumference is the misery of life. To live rooted in the center is the beginning of transformation, because once you become aware of your center, your circumference also starts changing – it becomes luminous. (…) It becomes a mirror; it reflects the center. And when the center and the circumference are in harmony, then one is in a state of rejoicing. Then, one has arrived home.

A man without awareness is not yet born. He is only on the verge of being born.

When the mind is in a state of no-thinking, when thinking is suspended, the mind becomes a mirror, and in that mirror, truth reflects. Truth is already here; we need not seek and search for it. On the contrary, we have to drop all seeking, all searching, and we have to learn the ways of being still and silent. When you are still, silent, you know. Knowing happens in silence, not in thinking.
Dharma means the fundamental law of existence. (…) God is not a person, but a principle. Nobody is needed to judge; the law is enough unto itself. If you remain in harmony with the law, you are rewarded; nobody rewards you, but you are rewarded. If you are in discord, nobody punishes you, but you are punished.

One comes to know a formless bliss; and in knowing it, one also becomes formless.

The world is almost like a desert. It is very difficult to be a rose here. A thousand and one difficulties are in the way, but those difficulties have to be accepted as challenges. Those difficulties have to be used as stepping stones. Then they don't hinder you from growing; on the contrary, they help. And it is because of so many difficulties in life that ultimately one comes to a ripeness, richness. If there were no difficulties in life, there would have been no possibility of growth.

Intelligence without love becomes intellectuality. It is no more intelligence, but only a pretension.

The relationship between you and existence is impossible if any kind of aggression remains in the mind. (…) Just uproot all possibilities of being violent, of being angry. (…) In prayerfulness, one becomes graceful; to be graceful is to be religious.

Man can create hell or heaven in his being. It is the same energy that becomes hell and that becomes heaven; the only difference is that of awareness. (…) Nobody can choose misery consciously (…); consciousness can only choose bliss.

A man is an infinity, and a man should not be confined to any tradition, to any philosophy, to any religion. A religious person cannot be confined to any religion at all. So get out of all boundaries; get out of all bondages. (…) Let sannyas be an enquiry into truth. (…) Start empty-handed; start from a state of not-knowing; start with innocence. That is the only real start. And if one can start with innocence, sooner or later, one finds the goal. It is innocence that becomes the bridge.

One should become completely disconnected from the past every day, one should die to the past every day, so that one remains pure, fresh, and so that one's eyes are clear. Then the vision of beauty is revealed. God is the ultimate vision of beauty.

The intelligent person seeks new challenges in life, because it is only through challenges that one grows. The intelligent person never escapes from any responsibility, because if you escape, you are escaping from life itself. That is a way of committing slow suicide. The intelligent person does not fight with existence; it is only the stupid who fight. The intelligent person becomes alert and aware of one of the most fundamental things – that we are part of existence, so there can be no conflict. We should live a life of harmony – with nature, with the universe, with all that is. That harmony brings joy; that harmony brings immortality; that harmony brings truth. (…) To be in conflict is to be in misery; to be in tune with existence is to be in bliss. That is the only proof of an intelligent person, that he should be blissful. Bliss is the criterion.

It is good to escape from the world, but only sometimes. It should not become a fixed attitude, otherwise it is disruptive. Once in a while, escape to a commune, to the mountains, anything. Once in a while, it is very good to change the total pattern of your life; then come back to the world, and you will have a new approach, a new attitude, and new eyes to see with. But remember, escape should not become your style of life. That's where everything goes wrong. That should not be. An escapist cannot grow. He has chosen the easier course; and through the easier course, there is no growth. Growth needs constant challenge; growth needs encounter. Growth needs struggle; it needs problems to be solved, settled. Otherwise, sooner or later, you will also feel that you are dying, and you are losing your intelligence. (…) You will become stupid, because intelligence needs continuous sharpening. (…) Escapism is a slow suicide. Never choose escape. (…) So, once in a while, whenever you have time, go to the mountains, to some commune, enjoy that life too. And it will be good; it will be a good challenge. To suddenly move from the turmoil to the silence is a great change, but then come back. The real test is in the world, and we grow and grow only through the world. (…) A day comes when the marketplace becomes your place of meditation; then you are alone in the crowd, and nothing disturbs you; (…) you remain untouched and aloof. Then it is beautiful; then you have arrived home.

The negative is the natural state of mind. The mind is negation; the mind lives on 'no' – that's its food.

One can get into the mind very easily; to get out of it is difficult. To get into it again and again is very easy. It is your old pattern; it is everybody's old pattern… familiar.

The ashram has to create hurdles, and the deeper the hurdles are, the deeper will go the work. (…) It is very simple to make the ashram as people would like it to be; it is not difficult at all – but then it won't be a device to help growth. Then it will be a church and as churches are, as temples are. They fit perfectly with prejudices, with likes, dislikes, with ideologies. (…) But this is not an ordinary place – it is a lab; it is experimentation into the inner journey.

The ego is feeling empty. It is not existential emptiness; it is ego emptiness. The ego is feeling empty, and it always tries to fill itself with something, anything – knowledge, food, sex, anything will do. The ego wants to stuff itself, to feel full. The ego is empty; it can never feel full. It can go on stuffing, but it never feels full. It can't by its very nature. It is a bucket without a bottom; you can go on pouring water into it, and it all disappears.

Life has to be lived as a song. To live it as less than that is to miss it. One has to introduce the quality of dance into one's whole life. (…) A conscious person is full of songs. He is a song. All his gestures are gestures of a song. All his movements are his dance. His life itself is art. He need not paint, he need not sing, he need not compose music, but still his life has the quality of art. Whatsoever he touches turns into gold. His touch is creative.

You can grow only by going through illusions – beautiful illusions, sweet dreams, but dreams all the same. (…) One has to become grown-up, and one grows only by experiencing frustration. One tie is broken; then another tie is broken. It hurts. One feels very angry, in a rage, but slowly, slowly, one comes to understand that all toys will be taken away. This is the way of growth. A day comes, and that day is the most fortunate of days, when you can live without illusions, when you can live without magic, when you can live quietly, silently, without hankering for excitement. And then, a totally different kind of life starts growing in you. That life has value and truth. (…) Become more and more conscious, more and more alert. (…) Otherwise, whatsoever you know is only dreams, and nothing else.

Man is a mystery; it is not mathematics – and to work on human reality is always to work with something absolutely unknown and unknowable. So one has to proceed very slowly; otherwise anything can go wrong. And once something goes wrong and you build your house on it, your whole life will be a wastage. (…) Once a path is chosen rightly, things start moving so fast, so easily. Sadhana is difficult only if you follow something which doesn't suit your innermost nature; that creates the difficulty. If something suits your innermost nature, it is the easiest thing in the world to know God. It should be the easiest thing, because He is our nature – we come from Him; we live in Him; and we will dissolve into Him.

'No' is futile. Saying 'no' is suicidal; it is poisonous. It kills you – it kills your opportunities to be joyful; it kills the occasions to be close to God. It cuts your roots; it uproots you from the earth, from life, from existence. 'No' is poison; 'yes' is elixir. It is through 'yes' that one becomes divine; it is through 'yes' that one comes to know immortality; it is through 'yes' that death can be defeated. Death is 'no'; life is 'yes' – and when the 'yes' is total, life is total.

If one looks deep, one finds only two essentials: love and meditation. Only these two things reach deep into your being; everything else is just on the periphery. Love reveals something of the ground, and meditation reveals the whole of it. Love is partial meditation, and meditation is total love. So, these two things have to be searched for deeply, sincerely, entirely. Searching in these two directions one day, you will stumble upon being. And that is not only our being; that is the being of all, because at the very center we are all one. Our separation is only on the periphery, on the circumference.

Those who move outward remain in darkness; those who start moving inward become enlightened.

There is a great law called 'the law of affirmation' – if you affirm something deeply, totally, absolutely, it starts becoming real. That's why people are in misery, because of that law: they affirm misery. That's why people are happy, but only a few people, because only a few people are aware of what they are doing to their lives. Once they affirm joy, they become joyous. Make it a point – stop affirming negativities and start affirming positivities. (…) Then, slowly, slowly, drop all negativities. (…) One can transcend both heaven and hell. And remember, it is easier to transcend heaven than to transcend hell. So first move from the negative to the positive. It looks paradoxical, but it is easier to leave something that is beautiful than that which is ugly; the ugly clings. (…) Start dreaming beautiful things; create dreams.

Without God, there is no satisfaction possible. One can go on searching and one will find many things in life, but nothing is going to satisfy – just a moment's illusion that one feels satisfaction; one has not even felt it and it is gone. (…) As one desire disappears, ten desires arise in its place, and it's a non-ending process. Only with God does that process stop; that wheel moves no more. When one comes to see God, feel God, live God, all desiring disappears; one is utterly satisfied, and forever. (…) God is one who satisfies, who really satisfies. Everything else in life is only promises, false promises; the goods are never delivered. (…) So whatsoever satisfies you totally, absolutely and forever, is that what God is. God is another name for that which satisfies.

Until the inner guide is found, a Master is needed. Once the guide is found, you have found the Master within yourself. The Master is there simply to say something to you which is being said by your heart already. But you cannot hear it, so it has to be said from the outside. (…) The Master outside is just a representation of the guide within. (…) He magnifies the still small voice.

God is always providing; whatsoever is our need is always looked after. We unnecessarily become worried about our own self. There is not a thing to worry about. Once this trust arises, life becomes a joy. The universe is not antagonistic to you. It has mothered you; it has fathered you – it is both your mother and your father. You are part of it. It goes on nourishing you; it cares. To understand this is to relax; those who don't understand this remain tense, anxious. (…) Once you understand that God is the provider, great freedom arises. There is no past then and no future; there is only present. You can live it to the maximum.

You cannot find the great directly. Whenever you search, you will find the small; the small is the way of the great to express itself. (…) Penetrate deeply, and the small becomes a door, a door to the Infinite. The small only appears small; it is an appearance – it contains the great.

Never try to cultivate peace on the surface. That creates conflict, schizophrenia, split; you cannot impose peace from the outside. You will pretend to be peaceful, and you will be boiling within. (…) All natural phenomena have to begin within, and then they have to spread outwards.

Ideals are imaginary. There is no way to fulfill them; whatsoever you do, you will always fall short – because you can always imagine better; that is the problem. Imagination has no limitation; and action is limited. This is one of the basic problems of the human mind – imagination unlimited; action limited. Imagination gives you ideals, how things should be; and action is so limited that you can never fulfill that imagination, those ideals.

If you are a Christian, you cannot relate with Christ. You are full of rubbish – theology, doctrine, scripture. One has to be unburdened of all that. And that is the case with Buddha too; if you are a Buddhist, you cannot relate with Buddha either. You have to be a non-Buddhist to relate to Buddha.

Be guided by your own intelligence.

Unless you are firmly rooted, you cannot grow. Growth is possible only when roots go deep.

The bliss that comes out of conquering oneself is the only bliss there is. You can conquer the world, and you will remain miserable; (…) you can have all things, and still you will be at a loss. And the more you have, the more you become aware of the futility, the more you feel the emptiness. Only the rich man comes to know what inner poverty is. Hence the paradox – the richer a man becomes, the poorer he feels; the more knowledgeable a man becomes, the more ignorant he feels. The only bliss possible is that which comes through the inward journey.

The world is the place where nothing else is possible other than failure. (…) if one is not moving towards God, one is always moving towards failure.

The old is gone, or if not gone, it is going – that house is falling. Don't be concerned too much about that house. Start creating a new house, because you cannot move into the old again; it is finished.

The mind is only utilitarian. It is useful in the world, but its reach is very limited. And all that can become contentment is beyond its reach. (…) With the world, the mind is perfectly adequate; beyond the world, the mind is the hindrance. One should be capable of putting the mind aside. That is what meditation is all about. It is not against the mind; it is simply the capacity to put the mind aside whenever it is not needed.

One cannot depend on the commune for long; one has to create one's own energy.

Even your innermost being is not a permanent thing. Once this vision becomes clear, you don't have any expectations of life. You don't hold onto things; you don't cling; you don't become possessive – because nothing can be possessed. Where everything is a flux, how can you possess anything? By the moment you possess it, it will be gone; it will not be the same.

Upeeksha means a centering of consciousness, so that you are not wavered by anything. Success comes, it is okay; failure comes, it is okay. Nothing disturbs you; nothing unhinges you from your center. Nothing is meaningful. One is so silent that nothing creates any stir. One has total acceptance; whatsoever comes to pass is good. One has no denial; one never rejects; one never resists – that is what upeeksha is: divine indifference. (…) This is your sadhana: be watchful; whenever you see that something is disturbing you, become cool, become grounded. Be centered. Yes, the cloud has come; it will go. No cloud is permanent; only the sky remains, the cloudless sky. Whatever arises, remain indifferent. (…) By and by, you will see that everything comes and passes by, and you remain untouched. And in that untouchedness, there is great joy. One has overcome the world; that is what is known as being the conqueror. Then one has a self. Self means a center which remains unperturbed, unconditionally unperturbed.

The tree is the most primitive form of life. If you start loving the tree, then love starts arising. Then you can love animals, and then only can you love human beings, never before it. These three steps have to be taken. (…) To love man needs a great compassion, a great understanding; it is very difficult to love man – one can never be certain about man.

Life is a constant decisiveness; each moment one has to decide. (…) The center is created through constant decisiveness; in indecisiveness, one disintegrates. Each moment one has to decide. So start making decisions in small things, in very small things. (…) Just start being decisive in as many things as possible, and then you will find more and more decisiveness coming to you. It needs practice, that's all. (…) My whole approach is: don't be bothered too much about right and wrong, and don't be bothered about what is better. The whole thing at stake is to be decisive. Try in as many things as possible, and then after a few months, you will suddenly see that a new kind of center has arisen in you from where decisions easily flow.

Everything disappears at a given intensity, never before. It is just as when you put water on fire – it will evaporate only when the heat has reached one hundred degrees; lukewarm water cannot evaporate.

Become a declaration of bliss. Don't hide it; manifest it as much as you can. The more you manifest bliss, the more it will be coming to you. Remember a basic law – that if bliss is expressed, it grows; if you hide it, it shrinks and dies.

One is empty within, and the deeper you go, the more empty you become. At the very core, there is infinite emptiness. Out of that nothingness, everything has evolved; and back to that nothingness, everything disappears. God is nothingness.

You are emptying your ego, and something greater than you is entering you. But you will become aware only when you have completely emptied it. So continue.

In a love-relationship, thinking should not come in. It is a crazy thing to be in love. It has nothing to do with the head. One should move through the heart. It is a sort of insanity. It is good, and higher than the so-called sanity, but don't bring your mind and reasoning into it; otherwise you will destroy it.

You have to forget many things each moment, because only then can you learn new things. The mind has a certain focus, and if the past continues to surround it, you will not be able to learn anything new. (…) And in fact, whatsoever is not important is forgotten naturally. You may think that it was important, but your total being knows better.

The false has to be dropped for the true to be found. (…) Every divorce is difficult, and this is the greatest divorce – when one is divorced from one's old identity and image.

Many surrenders happen, because the first surrender can rarely be total. The mind won't allow it. Even if it seems total, it is not. The mind goes on holding something, just as a safety measure. Many times you will feel that you are surrendered, and many times you will feel that you have gone far away; this will happen many times. By and by, you will be able to watch both. Then the real surrender will happen. (…) In the beginning, it is going to be a duality; just a part of the mind surrenders.

Understanding is the only authority.

Everybody has to come to a point where he can be completely free from his parents. They are helpful, but beyond a certain point, they become a hindrance. One has to drop them, with deep respect, with love, but one has to be free. And if parents are very understanding, they will help the child. That will be real love.

Make it a point to remember every day.

Everybody has to come to his own meditation. All methods are just to help you to find your method. And remember this, that your path is going to be a little different from everybody else's path. You are different, and nobody else can decide what is good for you.

Always remember, don't pay much attention to the negative; always pay attention to the positive.

There is a time to experience many things. When one is young, one has to experience many things, both good and bad, the dark and the light. But the real traveling starts when you start turning in. We can go on moving outside from one country to another, from one place to another, but finally one gets tired. One comes to know that everything is almost the same everywhere. And this constant travelling is not going to lead anywhere. It is good, it has something to give, a certain enrichment, and everybody needs it, but one should not be stuck there. Soon you become aware that changing places outside is not going to help. Rather, the only thing that will help is to change the inner space. (…) One can go on moving in the world and one will never come to a point where one can say that now, this is the goal and I have arrived. One never arrives. In the outside world, there are only departures. You simply depart from one place, but you never arrive. There is another way of travelling – from one state of mind to another, from one space to another, inside. If you go on changing from one state of mind to another, deeper, more far out, more silent, more blissful, then one day suddenly one settles to one's own center of being, and that is the whole point of wandering. (…) But one starts from the outside; there is no other way. By and by, one should go on making the circle smaller and smaller and smaller. So one day, the traveler himself is the destination. Now turn in, enough travelling outside. And once you are in a new space within, the whole outside world changes.

Remain open, but remain perfectly aware of the inner sense of direction. Then many things will fall in line with you, and you will not be disturbed. You will be able to use all the opportunities available to help your inner direction. And the inner direction will become more and more clear, integrated.

The distraction is nothing outside you; it is in the mind. So if you avoid one situation, it will bubble up in some other situation. So rather than escaping from situations, face them.

Make it a rule: whenever there is fear, go into it. Then fear dissolves.

Accept yourself so deeply that even the feeling of acceptance disappears. Because the very feeling that you are accepting has an inner rejection in you. (…) That which is not accepted always goes on hanging around you. That which is not accepted becomes part of your unconscious. (…) Wholeness is holiness for me.

The old renunciation used to be out of hatred for the world; the old renunciation was anti-life, negative. I teach a positive renunciation, a life-affirming renunciation, a life-enhancing renunciation. So your renunciation is going to be a profound 'yes' to life.

You need a deep inner contact with yourself, and that will become the contact with God also. We cannot be in contact with God unless we are in contact with ourselves. The only way to reach God is through yourself.

In religion, when you come close to one Master, you have come close to all. If you understand Jesus, you have understood Buddha and you have understood Lao Tzu.

Surrender happens. It is not a question of doing. You can go to a thousand and one Masters, but it will happen only with one.

The wise man tries to conquer his own being. The wise man's kingdom is his own being. He wants to become an emperor, not of others, not of things, not of anything that is outside, but of all that belongs to his inner being. (…) We are emperors who somehow have come to believe themselves to be beggars.

Up to the human being, there is evolution. Beyond humanity, there is revolution.

All attachments become sooner or later burdens on the soul, and it is always good to get free.

The modern man is missing meaning because he has forgotten how to offer himself to something bigger than himself. Many substitutes have been found – those substitutes are very dangerous; they are very momentary.

Meaning is a man-made thing. Remove man from existence, and there will be no meaning left. Meaning is imagined, projected. (…) That is the basic message of sannyas – to live life without any idea of purpose, meaning; (…) to live life for life's sake; no goal, no purpose, no destination. (…) When you are free of the obsession of meaning, great freedom happens.

The only way to become really whole is to make the unconscious conscious; and that is the whole work of meditation. That's why all meditations and all meditative Masters and all meditative techniques are against drugs, because drugs do just the opposite. They destroy the conscious and drown it in the unconscious. And meditation moves from the other pole: it helps the unconscious to become conscious and to be drowned in consciousness.

Once you have known the beauty of love, you will never be ambitious; and the society exists through ambition. (…) Money and power and domination and prestige and respectability – these are the substitutes for love; that is the obsession of the person who has not known love. Those are just poor substitutes; because you have missed real nourishment, now you are searching for some artificial nourishment.

Sugato is one of the names of Gautam the Buddha. It means well-gone. We call the person well-gone who will never be coming back; one who has lived his life so totally that there will be no need any more of coming back into the womb. One has to come back again and again in life because one has not yet learned the lesson. Life is a school, the real school; all other schools are just creations of man. They give you information, but they don't make you wise. In fact, they burden your being with so much knowledge that you become incapable of living; and it is only out of living that wisdom arises. A total death means, no more coming back. (…) People who live half-heartedly will have to be thrown back into the body again and again. They will have to pass through many more sufferings, because it is only suffering that purifies. But suffering gone through unconsciously does not purify. Only when one goes into suffering consciously is it a purification. Life has many sufferings, many joys too. My sannyasins have to go into all those sufferings and happinesses consciously.

Life is a celebration, and unless one understands it as a celebration, one goes on missing God. To connect with the Divine, the only bridge is celebration. It is only in the moments when you are utterly drunk with joy that you are close to God.

In the contemporary mind, the interiority of man is denied. Man lives as if there is only one possibility – the without. That is living on the periphery; it is living a non-essential life. Nothing is wrong with it, but in itself it is very partial and very shallow, meaningless. Unless you have an interior core to each of your acts, you will find no meaning in life. Meaning arises within you; it is not somewhere outside where one can catch hold of it. And when there is meaning inside, everything outside becomes meaningful; everything outside reflects your meaning. But before life can become meaningful, you have to know your inner meaning. Meditation is a way of opening your eyes inwards.

We have been brought up in such a way that the heart has almost been destroyed. It has to be revived again, because in its revival is your resurrection.

Once a person can remain alert even once for twenty-four hours, he becomes a Buddha. Then there is no going back; then all darkness has disappeared.

Sannyas is the science of real birth.

The positive is also a part of the mind, just as negativity is, and slowly, slowly, you have to learn how not to be part of the mind. You have not only to go beyond the negative; you have to go beyond the positive too. Only with that transcendence that is beyond both does life have serenity; otherwise it is tiring, very tiring, exhausting; otherwise you will not be rejuvenated.

All the people who have attained to God were not sane in the ordinary sense. They were all madly in love, and they were ready to sacrifice everything and all for God. Only when one is ready to that extent does God happen – not that one needs to sacrifice; just the readiness to sacrifice is enough.

Meaning comes only when one has penetrated the inner world. Then meaning comes flowing, and then even outer things become tremendously meaningful.

There are two types of people in the world – one will arrive through self-remembering; and one will arrive through self-forgetfulness.

Know thyself, because in knowing yourself, you will have known all that is worth knowing, all that there is to know.

Change is the only reality, the only truth, and problems arise when we don't understand this. Then we start clinging.

Sannyas is the end of all boundaries. To become a sannyasin means that now you will not remain confined in any conditioning; that slowly, slowly, you will drop all the programs that the society has imposed on you. The whole process of sannyas is that of de-programming, de-conditioning, de-hypnosis. The moment all conditions are dropped and you are innocent again, all that you had always desired and longed for immediately happens, and it happens of its own accord. You are not to positively do anything for it; the whole effort is negative – you have to drop many things. When there is nothing clinging to you and you are not clinging to anything, in that state of non-clinging, truth happens, God happens. It can happen only when you have the innocence of a child – clean, empty, with no content. When there is no content, the mind cannot project anything. When there is emptiness inside, the mind goes into non-functioning, and the non-functioning of the mind is the beginning of God. Cessation of the mind is the beginning of divine, eternal life.

Love is a fire, and if one allows, it burns one totally; it destroys one as one is. Only in that death is the new born. In the beginning, love is a crucifixion, and in the end, love is a resurrection. It is a new birth, a new beginning, but the beginning is possible only if the old ends. The new cannot be continuous with the old; otherwise it will remain in some way still the old – modified a little bit here and there, renovated here and there, painted and polished here and there… but still the old. The new has to be discontinuous with the old. The old has simply to cease; it has to disappear; and the new has to appear, unconnected with the old. This is one of the most fundamental things to be understood about initiation, that it is the end of the old. It is consciously dropping whatsoever your identity has been, losing it consciously, forgetting all about it – as if you have read about it in a novel, or you have seen it in a movie, but it has nothing to do with you. Just as the snake slips out of its old skin and does not even look back, that's what initiation is: slipping out of the skin of the old and not even looking back. (…) When one is free of memory, then life is alive; it overflows with benediction.

Man is born to be a song, but in the beginning, we have only the seed for it, the potential for it.

Unless the part is married to the Whole, the part is bound to be in misery, because then the part has no roots in the Whole, is not nourished by the Whole. And to remain separate from the Whole is a constant struggle to survive; that struggle dissipates energy.

Consciousness needs expansion, and the body is very small, the mind is very small. To look into existence through the mind is looking through a keyhole.

Truth can only be searched for by blissful people; it cannot be searched for by anxious people, by people who are worried, who are miserable, who have started the search because of their anguish and anxiety. They are not really searching for truth; they are searching for a certain consolation. If you seek out of pain, you will seek a pain-killer; you would like to have some metaphysical aspirin that relieves you of the headache. That's why millions of people become caught up with some consolation, with some belief, with some dogma, because it consoles, it soothes. It is like a lullaby; it helps you to remain asleep. It makes your life comfortable – not true, not authentic. It makes your life more convenient. It functions as a lubricant; life becomes more smooth. It does not give you truth; it simply gives you protective buffers, shock-absorbers. And that is really going against truth. The more shock absorbers you have, the less is the possibility of seeing truth. The real truth-seeking cannot start with a suffering mind; it can start only when you are blissful.

Consciousness is a double-edged sword: either it can become a no-self-consciousness, and unself-consciousness – that is one possibility; or it can become self-consciousness – that is another possibility. If it becomes self-consciousness, you fall out of rhythm, you are no more part of existence; you start lagging behind; your steps are not in tune with the Whole. This gap creates misery. Misery is nothing but the distance between you and the harmony of the Whole; the bigger the distance, the bigger the hell. The other possibility is no-self-consciousness, un-self-consciousness. Consciousness is there, but there is no self. Then you are in tune. Self means that you have started thinking of yourself as separate; un-self means that you are, and yet you are not. You are simply a part, neither dependent nor independent, but in a kind of interdependence. That is truth. (…) To be initiated in sannyas simply means to become aware that you have fallen out of rhythm and that you have to enter into the garden of Eden again, in deep accord with the Whole. My whole teaching is to be harmonious with the Whole, and then there is great music, great melody, great benediction.

The real stillness is not that of cultivation. The real stillness comes out of understanding the inner conflict, watching the inner conflict, watching continuously – "What am I fighting? Why?" – looking deep into that why, and slowly, slowly seeing the absurdity of it. The moment you start seeing the absurdity of it, it starts falling away from you. Not that you drop it – if you drop it, it will remain superficial. When if falls of its own accord because insight has arisen that "This is stupid!", in that very understanding is liberation. When you have seen the ridiculousness of it, you simply cooperate with it no more, and without your cooperation, it cannot exist. It sucks your energy; it is a parasite. Then conflict, inner conflict, inner tension, inner contradiction, drop of their own accord, because a certain light of understanding has arisen in you – through watching, through observing, through witnessing. Then suddenly some stillness that you have not even thought about, some coolness that is not of this world, something that transports you into another world, erupts. You still walk on the earth, but your feet no more touch the earth. You still live in the same world, but you are no more part of it; a transcendence has happened. Then one is centered, whole, undivided; there is no fight of any kind. Then one lives moment to moment. Each moment then is a precious gift from God, and one lives in tremendous thankfulness. That thankfulness is prayer.

Thoughts don't bring you truth, and thoughts don't bring you silence. Thoughts are only disturbances in your inner being. Thoughts are a kind of disease.

In the East, the serpent has always been a symbol of wisdom. The parable of Adam and Eve has a totally different meaning to the Eastern mystic – the serpent represents their inner wisdom, their intelligence. Their intelligence convinced them that this disobedience was worth it. They risked much; they risked losing their immortality.

Love means completely forgetting yourself in the Beloved. Its essence is forgetfulness, abandoning oneself, drowning oneself totally so that one is no more; only the Beloved is. It is the path of annihilation, fana. The lover has to learn the art of dying, because only in death does the distance between the lover and the Beloved disappear. When the ego is found no more, there is no separation left. On the path of awareness, just the opposite has to be followed: one has to become more and more mindful, aware; not to forget oneself, but to remember oneself is the key. There is no question of the Beloved. It is because of this that Buddhism and Jainism – two of the greatest religions which follow the path of awareness – have no idea of God. (…) Their path is that of self-remembering; the other is not needed.

Look ahead, go on searching for the higher rung of the ladder, and never be satisfied with any rung. We have to transcend the whole ladder one day. We have to know all possibilities, all realms, all layers, all dimensions of love, and one day we have to transcend them. Only when one has left the ladder of love behind does God become available. It is through love, and through going beyond love, that God is achieved.

The graceful person is one whose form and spirit are in a synchronicity, whose outer and inner are in a deep accord. That is the meaning of grace – one who is a melody.

Love is the only real strength; all other strengths are only pretenders.

The ego feeds on excitement; excitement is a must for the ego to exist. If it is not that of pleasure, the ego is ready to live with pain – but excitement is needed. To be in a state of non-excitement is to disappear, and to disappear is to attain the ultimate freedom. That's what we call bliss. Bliss is not equivalent to happiness; it is just the absence of all happiness, all unhappiness. That is the goal of sannyas, and unless it is achieved, something remains missing.

The really innocent one, the really pure person, has no character at all. He cannot afford to have character, because character means pollution, character means contamination. Character means you have already started living according to a certain idea; you are no more innocent. (…) To live innocently is to live religiously.

No alive situation can ever be definite. It is always vague; it is cloudy; it is ambiguous; it is always changing; it is in a flux. And man creates misery because he is afraid of being in a flux. He wants certainties; solid, hard certainties. He wants to reduce everything to a definition, to a shape, so that he can manipulate it. (…) But life is shapeless, vague, with no direction, with no possibility of any prediction about what is going to happen the next moment. With immense trust, one allows whatsoever happens.

Man can either fight for himself, or he can fight for God. When he fights for himself, he gratifies his ego; he strengthens his ego – it is an ego-trip. And because the ego is illusory, the whole thing is nothing but a dream. To fight for oneself is to fight for something which doesn't exist in the first place – and that's what millions of people are doing. To fight for God is to fight against the ego; to fight for God is to fight for the Whole. The fight consists in dissolving oneself, in disappearing, in becoming a nobody, a non-entity, in dying, in crucifixion. But if one is capable of crucifying one's own ego, the resurrection is certain, absolutely certain. One dies as a small ego, but one is born as the Whole, as God. Jesus dies, and Christ is born. This is the real war, and those who fight other wars simply go on missing the opportunity. So wage a war against the ego, not for the ego; wage a war for the Whole, not against the Whole. We cannot succeed against the Whole; we can only succeed with the Whole.

Man lives without a home of bliss; he lives in a marketplace. The marketplace has entered into his being. His inner being is a constant traffic, crowded, and it is always rush hour – so many thoughts, so many desires, so many memories, so many expectations, hopes, programmes. Man lives in this crowded condition for his whole life, never knowing for a single moment that this whole crowd is unnecessary, that it is dissipating energy, that it is destructive, that it is a slow poisoning, that it is suicidal; that one can live in utter peace, silence; that one can have more silence in one's being than there is on the Himalayas; that one can move into such spaces within one's self which are eternally virgin – nobody has ever moved there, and nobody ever can, except oneself. But unfortunately, we remain unaware of our own inner treasures; we live on the periphery; we never enter into our own palace. All the teachers and all the Masters of the world are agreed upon only one thing, that the kingdom of God is within you, that the home has not to be searched for somewhere outside, that it is already there. You have just to turn in, tune in; you have just to learn the art of groping into your inner being.

Prayer can never be a conformism, and if it is, then it is not a prayer, then it is a social formality. True prayer is always a rebellion; it is a revolution, because it transforms one's being, and it transform's one's world too.

The whole secret of sannyas is to live life in toto, in totality, but without any attachment. It is a difficult phenomenon. There are people who can live life, but they cannot remain unattached. Then there are people who can remain unattached, but they cannot live life. That's why in the past, there were the worldly and the other-worldly. The worldly lives life and becomes attached and suffers. The monk escapes from life; afraid of becoming attached, he stops living life. (…) My sannyasin will be in the marketplace, and yet not of it. He will live everything from the ordinary to the extraordinary with joy, with celebration, with gusto; yet he will remain unattached. (…) He will be able to welcome; and he will be able, in the same way, to say goodbye. That is the highest pinnacle that is possible to human consciousness. Only such a person is liberated.

Bliss is only for those who are ready to break away from the crowd-mind, from the mind of the sheep, only for those who are ready to become lions. The lion has a totally different psychology. He does not believe in the crowd; he does not follow the trodden paths. He is adventurous; rebellion is his very spirit. He is not a follower; his search is for the original face. (…) Aloneness is the spirit of the lion.

The deeper you go, the more complete and independent you will become. (…) independence will happen at the very core of your being. (…) Good and bad, all that happens, is needed; sadness is needed, happiness is needed. They are all climates. In these climates one becomes more and more seasoned, and one day one becomes really independent; then nothing is needed. But don't be in a hurry; nothing happens in a hurry. One has to go very slowly, very patiently.

It is the greatest creativity possible when you help people to grow. Nothing else is more creative, because you create consciousness.
Intuition is absolute, unconditional; it simply says what is the case.

If one is deprived of all activity, anybody will go mad within three weeks. This is the situation of your normal human being – within three weeks, maximum limit.

One has to annihilate oneself totally. It is only out of that annihilation that a new life arises.

Manage your life in such a way that meditation becomes the center. And manage your life in such a way that you can find at least a few hours purely for meditation. One hour in the morning and one hour in the night, that is the minimum.

The modern man is living by bread alone. Life has become equivalent to living. That's a degradation; that's a fall. (…) Modern man has become afraid of all that is irrational, and all that is beautiful is irrational, all that is significant is irrational. To reduce life to reason is to reduce it to meaninglessness. Then Sartre is right; then man is a useless passion.

To believe means that you are not interested in knowing; hence you can believe.

Surrender will grow on its own; it cannot be forced.

Withdraw all your cooperation from thoughts. When thoughts come, simply watch as a detached observer. Do not judge, remain detached, just as if you are watching the traffic move on the road, standing by the side of the road, unconcerned. Let the traffic of the thoughts move, and you just be a witness, with no choice. That choiceless witnessing slowly, slowly cuts the very roots of the thoughts; they start disappearing. Moments of no-thought will start coming, and those moments are glimpses into existence. Soon they become bigger. Traffic stops for a few seconds, for a few minutes, and then for a few hours, and then for a few days. And whenever there is nothing moving in the mind, when there is no movement, all is attained. The unmoving mind is the ultimate ecstasy. It is a state of absolute awareness, but there is no object to the awareness. (…) In utter emptiness, the awareness becomes aflame. (…) Those who have attained to it become free; they are no more tethered to anything at all. (…) Unless that happens, one remains in misery, one remains in hell.

The ordinary world is not very helpful in people's growth. On the contrary, it harms, because its vested interest is in your not growing. The more grown-up a person is, the more independent he becomes, and the more rebellious. He starts living on his own; that is his rebellion. He becomes less and less compromising, because he is no more afraid. And the society becomes apprehensive about such people, so it starts destroying the very possibility of growth from the very beginning. That's why the mental age of a normal human being is only thirteen years. That's a very, very rotten situation – that when a person is eighty, his mental age is thirteen. So the body continued to grow, but the mind has stopped long ago. (…) If you have only the mental age of a thirteen-year-old person, you will always remain dependent; you will always ask for a father-figure, some authoritative person to dominate you. Now, people go on fighting for freedom, not knowing at all that freedom is not possible in this society. This society creates only slaves. And the slavery is not something outer; (…) the chains are not on your hands, but deep down in your consciousness. And this is the fundamental of creating slaves: never allow them inner growth. Keep them as ungrown as possible; then they will always be hankering for somebody to dominate them. On the surface, they may talk about independence and freedom and all that nonsense, but deep down, they will hanker and search for somebody who can dominate them. They will feel at ease only when there is somebody to dominate them and to order them. They resist, and yet they demand it, they ask for it. This is a double bind; this is a deep knot in their consciousness. They are against slavery, and they are for it too. Now their whole life will remain a mess. So in the ordinary world, there is no possibility to grow unless one is very, very intelligent, almost sly. (…) Sannyas means freedom. Sannyas means standing on one's own. Sannyas means allowing your growth to happen. This is possible only when you are in an energy field where it is supported, where you can get support, where you can get feedback, nourishing feedback. This is what is happening here; we are creating a small world of a totally different kind of energy.

The people who are contented with their mundane life have no hope. They are contented with their houses, their families, their TV, their car, their money. They have no hope, because unless a great discontentment happens, you never search withinwards. Unless you are utterly frustrated with the outside, there is no possibility of turning in. Unless one sees the futility of all that one is doing in the outside world, one never looks up to heaven. (…) People are continuously engaged, occupied with the ordinary things of life. They cannot listen to the music of the rain falling on trees; they cannot see the beauty of flowers opening up in the morning. They have no time; they have no space. They are not aware of the beauty of the sunset; they are not aware of the freedom of a bird on the wing. They are not aware of anything of significance. They will go on missing the music of existence. (…) Become discontented with the world; that is divine discontent, because it leads to the Divine. Don't be contented with the world, otherwise one remains mediocre, and to remain mediocre is to commit a suicide.

Great intelligence is born when you start searching for something higher – higher than you, bigger than you. Friedrich Nietzsche has said, "The saddest day in humanity's life will be when man will not think of surpassing himself." He is right. And it seems that the saddest day has come; it has come too soon. Nietzsche was here just a hundred years ago; within a century, his prophecy is almost fulfilled. The major part of humanity thinks no more in terms of transcending itself. People have all become engaged with small toys, and meanwhile life goes on, slipping by – a very precious life, wasted in gathering rubbish. Fortunate is the man who starts becoming discontented with the so-called world, and in whom a certain discontent arises – a longing to reach to heaven, a longing for the moon. That's what sannyas is all about – the longing for the impossible. But if you long intensely, the impossible becomes possible.

The irreligious person is one who lives in tacit enmity with the world.

Happiness is not so easy. Yes, there is a possibility that one can be happy alone, but that needs a long journey, a long inward journey of exploration.

Bliss is the ultimate state of consciousness. Bliss is not possible unless the mind is completely gone. It is the absence of the mind; it happens only in the absence of the mind. And the mind is the source of all ugliness, all negativities – hatred, anger, jealousy, possessiveness; all that comes from the mind. And when the mind is gone, then something totally new starts happening: love, compassion, gratefulness. Those are not the qualities of the mind; they are the qualities of no-mind, and they make one beautiful. It is bliss that beautifies. No-mind has two aspects. One is: inwardly, you become utterly blissful, and outwardly, you become utterly beautiful. Only a blissful person is a beautiful person.

The original meaning of philosophy is 'love of wisdom'. In the West, it lost the track – it became more and more 'love of knowledge' rather than 'love of wisdom'. The concern became how to know more; the concern became more and more extrovert. The basic enquiry of knowing oneself was lost, and know thyself is the beginning of all wisdom. The first thing necessary is to know oneself, because if I don't know myself, what can I do? If one cannot know oneself, all else is impossible. In knowing yourself, you have put down the right foundation; now the temple can be built. Now you can know others, and you can go on growing in your knowing. And this knowing based on self-knowledge will have a totally different quality; it will be wisdom. The person who does not know himself and knows many things is knowledgeable, but not wise. (…) Wisdom has to be attained. It is a pilgrimage into one's own being. Knowledge is adopted; it is cheap. Wisdom is costly, and unless one is in deep love with truth, one cannot sacrifice so much. Only love knows how to sacrifice, and sacrifice blissfully. Only love knows how to sacrifice and yet feel grateful that one was allowed to sacrifice.

For so many lives, we have lived with this idea, we have been taught this idea again and again, that you are mind. So an identity, a false identity, has arisen. (…) This identity has to be broken. This is the whole goal of all meditations – to break this identity. (…) That's why Buddha says again and again, "All that is needed is right understanding." That's all that is needed, nothing else – a right perspective, a clear-cut vision of what is what. The mind is not you. (…) Relaxed, calm, quiet, start watching. From this moment on, start watching. Slowly, you will become aware that the mind is an activity that surrounds you, but you are beyond the activity, just hovering above it. You are a mirror that reflects everything; you are consciousness. (…) Those are the first glimpses of samadhi, of enlightenment. And when the first glimpses have come, then the Ultimate is not far away.

Love means falling in unity with existence, dropping the illusion of separation, becoming one with the Whole.

The perfectionist is bound to be neurotic, because he is asking for the impossible. (…) My teaching is radical. I teach you to be utterly happy in your imperfection. (…) You are accepted by God as you are; nothing is missing; this is the way He wants you to be. So drop all shoulds and oughts. There is no need for any should, any ought. (…) Perfection can only be the quality of the Whole; the part cannot be perfect. (…) Instead of perfection, I teach the idea of totality. Be total in whatsoever you are doing, but don't bother about perfection. Once perfection starts haunting you, you will never be at peace, you will never be at home. You will constantly create a nightmarish life. You will create hell for yourself, because everything will look imperfect; nothing will be satisfying. And this idea has been forced into the human consciousness so deeply that it is creating havoc. (…) Only truth liberates, and the truth is that the part cannot become perfect; the truth is that the part has to enjoy itself as it is.

Religions have not yet been creative. They have been, on the contrary, destructive, very destructive. And my own observation is that they became destructive because of their life-negating attitudes. Life has to be loved, lived, worshipped.

Life is so vast and so contradictory, so paradoxical, that if you start with a prejudice, you will find all the arguments for it. If you start with another prejudice, just the opposite of the first, you will find arguments for that too. Life is vast; it contains all. If you believe in one thing, again and again you will come across a thousand and one proofs that this is the truth. That's what people go on doing. (…) The real seeker will not start with a conclusion. To start with a conclusion is to deny truth, is to falsify it from the very beginning. The real seeker simply starts with an open mind. An open mind means no prejudice, no conclusion, no belief. The real seeker is a blank paper, empty.

Man wants to be in control of everything; the ego is a great controller.

To be utterly discontented with all kinds of toys is to be religious. When one is finished with the outside world, when one has seen through and through, and has found that there is nothing to be found there, then only does the inward open its doors. It is out of absolute frustration with the world that the inner journey begins. The inner journey begins almost at the point where people commit suicide. Suicide and sannyas are alternatives. (…) If a person believes that there is no inner side to humanity, that there is no interior, then suicide is the only possibility. (…) If somebody becomes a sannyasin, he starts moving inwards. The outer he has known; now he would like to investigate the inner. He has seen that which can be seen; now he would like to see that which cannot be seen.

We have become trees which are uprooted. (…) People are searching for meditation, prayer, new ways of being, but the deeper search and the more basic search is how to get rooted in existence again. Call it meditation, call it prayer, or whatever you will, but the essential thing is how to get rooted in existence again.

Those people who decide to live a life of safety, security, have already decided against life – they have chosen death; and the majority is of that kind of person.

You cannot go back to the old – the old mind is no longer relevant; and you don't know what the new mind is. You cannot go on repeating your past, old pattern, and the new gestalt is not yet clear. (…) this is the moment of transformation, a transitory period, and the pain is a blessing in disguise; soon the morning will be coming closer, and soon the sun will be on the horizon. If one is hopeful and moves into it with understanding and with a confident step, the chaos turns into creativity. And this is what sannyas is going to do to you.

Man's life has to be a great exploration inwards, and no outer exploration is as significant, as valuable, as the inner one. (…) And the closer you come to your inner center, the more and more peaceful you will become, more and more serene and calm, more and more bliss for no reason at all will be happening. Those are good omens – they show that you are coming back home.

Truth is not part of the mind; truth is not a thought. Truth is an experience in thoughtlessness. (…) Truth arises in emptiness, in silence, in quietness, when all thoughts have completely disappeared, when the mind has stopped, when there is no mind.

The so-called satisfaction remains only very thin, just skin-deep. Scratch a little, and immediately discontent arises. But that's how people are living – on the surface, everybody is smiling, everybody seems to be happy, and nobody is happy; all those smiles are false, political. People deceive others by smiling, and deceive themselves too. When others start believing in their smiles, they also start believing. This is a very mediocre way of living one's life. A sannyasin should not live like that. A sannyasin has to seek and search for real contentment. So contentment has not to be imposed upon oneself; it has not to be cultivated; it has not to become a character trait. One has to go deep into one's heart. Through meditation, through love, through silence, one has to move towards the heart. When we have reached the very core of the heart, there is contentment. One suddenly feels at home, and all is absolutely good as it is. (…) It has never been otherwise, and it will never be otherwise. All is good because God is! But first, one has to find the God within one's soul. That experience, that encounter, is contentment.

Discontent carries you continuously away from the moment. It takes you away from your home; hence you feel tired, weary, bored – because there is no rest in discontent. Rest is possible only when you are in the moment of contentment. Then there is relaxation, let-go, and a great well-being arises. And it does not come from anywhere else – it arises out of you; it is a fragrance of your own nature. Only one thing is needed to be fulfilled, and that is to be in the moment.

Whosoever chooses to drop misery and move into the world of bliss will have to pass a few moments of utter craziness. It is in those moments when a Master is needed, to give you support, to keep you together, to hold your hand. (…) Just start becoming more and more alert. (…) Don't hope that this time it will be different; it is never different. If you follow the old pattern, the old conclusion is bound to come. For a few days, you will have to be on guard, and then, slowly, slowly, the old pattern goes farther away from you; you become disconnected, and that disconnection is all that is needed. Then you are free, without any structure; and to be free is the only joy.

Those who search through the mind and reason and logic search in vain. And slowly, slowly, they become frustrated, and because they cannot find, their life starts losing meaning. And the only problem with them is that they are searching through a wrong method. The heart is the door to God; (…) only the heart has the capacity to feel the immeasurable. It is through love, not through logic, that one knows.

At each step, we are again on another crossroad. We are always on the crossroads, that's how life is; and each moment we have to decide. Let this be your criterion: whatsoever is higher, subtler, has to be chosen – not the grosser. Slowly, slowly, the knack is learned. Slowly, slowly, there is no need to choose – one starts moving easily towards the higher.

The whole training of religions is the training of love.

The ego is always in conflict with others. The ego is ambitious. It wants to conquer, whatsoever the cost. If it has to use others as means, it will. If they hinder, it will destroy them. It will be friendly only to those people who will satisfy its desires and ambitions, and only to that extent, never beyond that point. That's why Machiavelli says that for the ambitious man, there is no friend. The ambitious man only pretends friendship, because everyone is a potential enemy, because everyone is a potential competitor. (…) Only a Buddha, one who has disappeared, only he can be a true friend of all; only he can have compassion.

We receive only that which we give.

Man is empty unless God lives in him. Man is a deserted city unless God starts residing in him, and the moment God comes in, the whole city comes alive.

The moment you see that there is no ego in you, all misery disappears. The ego creates misery, and the misery creates ego; there is a mutual conspiracy. (…) going beyond one is going beyond both, because they are two aspects of the same phenomenon.

Fear only arises because somewhere deep down, you still go on trying to keep your identity separate. And that is the fear – that if you come closer, that identity will disappear.

To be with me has only one meaning – I have to teach you how to die, so that you can be reborn.

The function of the Master is not to deliver you truth, but only to provoke your thirst for it, your appetite for it, your hunger for it. Truth cannot be transferred, but the search can be transferred, the seeking can be transferred; an intense passionate desire can be aroused.

Remember one thing – that there is no proof for God, and there is no proof against God, and there never will be either for or against. And the whole effort for or against down the centuries has been just utterly futile. One has to drink something of existence. You have to become available to this mysterious life that surrounds you, and reaches to the very innermost core of your being.

There is nothing more valuable than contentment. Contentment means the state of no-desire. If desire is there, that indicates discontentment. When all desiring disappears, when there is no ripple of desire in your consciousness at all, when you are utterly now, utterly here, and this moment is all, that is contentment. You are not asking for anything anymore; you are not begging for anything anymore. In fact, on the contrary, you are tremendously grateful for all that is; you are utterly grateful for all that is – that is contentment. And this is the diamond. Those who have it are rich; those who don't have it are poor.

Start searching something that is not momentary; that is the beginning of sannyas. The search for the timeless is the beginning of sannyas.

The Master is not much interested in the society, and even if he is interested, he is interested only for the sake of the individual. His interest in the society is indirect; his immediate concern is the individual. He wants to change the consciousness of the disciple.

The disciple and the Master are in a love relationship. It is non-utilitarian; it is otherworldly. It is something of the beyond. The relationship changes from the student to the teacher, from the disciple to the Master. (…) The teacher and the student are not in a love relationship; it is a utilitarian relationship.

From the very beginning, your life is continuously surrounded by fear. If you don't do this, you are afraid to be punished; if you don't do that, you are afraid to lose the reward. And finally this whole thing is projected as heaven and hell; hell becomes your fear, and heaven your greed.

Conclusion means that a death has happened. No conclusion means that life is still growing, moving. (…) The man of real knowing remains non-conclusive; he remains open. He is always ready to move; he is always ready to change.

The truth is that what people say is all nonsense. The more you go deeper into meditation, the more it becomes apparent that it is all kind of gibberish. People are simply vomiting – whatsoever is rambling in their minds, they are vomiting; they are using you just to cathart. And if you are silent, you will become more and more aware of it – that what they are saying makes no sense; it makes much sound certainly, but it makes no sense – it is all irrelevant. And if you don't say anything to them in response, they will feel offended, because they will also suspect that you are becoming aware of the nonsense. So it is a kind of mutual arrangement in the world – they pour their nonsense into you; you pour your nonsense into them; so both are happy, both are feeling unburdened. But nothing has really happened; only garbage has been transferred from here to there. But for a while, it feels good for a change. (…) So you have to do one thing: just be polite with them and talk a little nonsense deliberately! (…) Be deliberately nonsensical; they will be very happy with you – you will make good conversation!

The very desire towards meaning is meaningless, because life is not going towards any end. It is simply there without any explanation, without any reason, without any why. It's simply there.

Love is affirmation. When you say 'yes' to life, you are loving, you are flowing. When you say 'no' to life, you are stuck, you are frozen. (…) A person who says 'no' all his life goes on crippling himself, goes on denying many parts of his being, disowning them, goes on becoming smaller and smaller and smaller. In the end, all contact with life is lost. That is actually what spiritual death is; a person just living inside a 'no'. Spiritual life is living with a 'yes', with affirmation.

When you take the challenge of a difficult method, you grow. Something easy is not necessarily good. Something may look easy, but it does not force any change in you. It allows you as you are, but then it is pointless. The whole point is to create something in you higher than you are, something in you deeper than you are. The whole effort is to help you to go a little beyond yourself. A thing is easy if it fits you; a thing is difficult if you have to fit with it. So always remember that the way is hard. There is no shortcut; shortcuts exist not. Everybody comes by the hard way. When something becomes too easy, find something hard again. Otherwise you will live conveniently, you will die conveniently, but nothing will have happened. Go on searching for some new challenge. Go on looking higher. Even if it feels impossible to reach, it will help you to grow. Even the very vision of something great immediately starts transforming you. Even with a dream of something great, you start becoming great. So never settle with the easy. People settle too easily, and of course, then growth stops. As psychologists say, if you look at people's mental age, the average mental age never goes beyond thirteen. A man may be seventy; his average mental age remains nearly twelve, thirteen, at the most fourteen. (…) In that average, geniuses are included; very talented people are included. So if you find an actual person and forget the average, you will find him hanging somewhere near seven to nine. Since that age, they have never taken any challenge; they are stuck there. Everybody is retarded in that sense. So never miss any challenge, and if there is no challenge, create one. Even create hurdles and obstacles; they will help you. They will make you stronger.

Happiness makes people shallow; sadness gives depth – and sometimes it is needed. In fact, you never get anything which is not needed. Remember it as a very fundamental law. You may not get something that you want, but you always get that which you need. Somehow the universe goes on fulfilling your needs; you may understand, you may not understand. The more aware you become, the more you see that in that moment, sadness was needed. It is a necessary ingredient in growth.

A group situation is always artificial, arbitrary. It has nothing to compare with a life situation.

Be alone. Let it hurt; let it hurt the whole way. Go with it; cry and weep, but don't try to escape. There comes a moment when you have touched the very extreme, and suddenly you swing back – but that happens only when you have touched the other extreme. It is just like the pendulum of a clock. It goes to the left, to the very extreme, then it turns. The same happens in mind. (…) It is the same energy that becomes sadness, that becomes happiness, that becomes joy, that becomes pain. It is the same energy. We don't have many energies; we have only one. That same energy becomes anger; that same energy becomes compassion. That same energy becomes love; that same energy becomes hatred. It has multi-potentialities; it is multi-dimensional. And one has to know all its ways, because it is us. We have to know ourselves; that's what self-knowledge is. When Socrates says "Know thyself", he simply means, know all the possibilities of your being. Sadness is a possibility. If you don't know it, you will never become aware of yourself. Self-knowledge will never happen, because a part of you will remain in ignorance. So never lose any opportunity; these are God-given opportunities. Go into sadness so deeply that you know the whole path, you know the whole pain. (…) Out of each sadness, if one goes to the very end, one will come out stronger, more grounded, centered. (…) But we miss, because we never go to the very end. We fight; we somehow manage and manipulate ourselves; (…) we enforce some false happiness. The energy was going in one direction, and you force it into another. (…) Then, whatsoever the outcome is, it will be unnatural. Happiness will be there, but it will not be real. Real happiness comes out of real unhappiness, because only the real can be transformed into the real – this is the basis of all alchemical work. (…) the baser metal can be changed into gold, but it should be real. So go with it. Visit hell, and go deliberately. The faster you go and the more wholeheartedly you go, the sooner will you reach the end.

Everybody is in need of meditation. (…) Particularly as one grows older in life, more and more is the necessity felt. (…) One may have arrived in worldly ways, succeeded, but by the time that one reaches the age of forty-two, one starts feeling that something is missing. (…) Fourteen is the age when one is physically mature; one is ready for sex. Forty-two is the age when one is psychologically mature; one is ready for meditation. (…) Meditation is as natural an urge as sex. (…) People start drifting at the age of forty-two. (…) They go on and on and on, until they simply fall down dead and die.

It is very difficult for the modern mind to feel relaxed. (…) Relaxation is a step towards samadhi.

Don't leave any stone unturned; put your whole energy into it. Don't hold anything back. The more energy you put, the more energy will be coming. Man is an infinite source of energy; you cannot exhaust it. You will be given as much energy as you need. Just give a challenge to your life, and you will be given energy. It is not there already; it comes only when you accept a challenge. (…) your very passion will create energy. Passion is creative; it creates energy.

The next moment is going to be born out of this moment. Live this moment as beautifully as possible, and then the next moment is going to be automatically more beautiful. It will be based on this moment. (…) Allow more and more moments where you simply enjoy the very process of life. It is a dynamic phenomenon, always flowing, always reaching but never arriving. This is the whole beauty of it.

The more you possess, the poorer you are. The more you give, the richer you are. If one can give totally, unconditionally, then richness is tremendous, immense. Then it knows no limitations.

People have tried to sacrifice everything except themselves. (…) they go on avoiding the real sacrifice, and that is the sacrifice of one's own being.

Darwin created a very linear concept in the Western mind, that of evolution. (…) Nothing is going anywhere; that is the Eastern concept. And everything is a play, a dance, leela. Hence everything is as it should be; there is no need to be discontented. Unless you decide to play the game of discontent; then it's okay.

Meditation is all-inclusive. It does not exclude anything; it absorbs everything.

If you can feel the aura of the person in some way, you know something about the person that the person himself does not. You are bound to get into difficulty, because you will react to the knowledge that comes through the aura, and that person does not know anything about it, so he will not feel related to you. (…) You are aiming at his unconscious, and he does not know anything about it. This happens to perceptive people; if you know more about the person than the person himself knows, then it will be a difficult relationship.

The society has emphasized sexual repression for this reason too, because if energies are repressed at the sex center, the head becomes powerful. These two centers are competitors: if sex is powerful, the head remains impotent; if the head becomes powerful, sex becomes impotent. These are like the two sides of your being, and they are always in conflict. So the society wants the head, because it can be used for many things; it is very useful, and sex is very useless. It may make the person joyful, but it has no social use. In fact, a joyful person is too dangerous, because he does not bother about the society; he does not listen to the ambitious goals that the society goes on proposing – to earn more money, to be successful, to become a prime minister. A really sexually healthy person does not bother a bit about all this nonsense, because he is so joyful; nothing can be added to him. So sex has to be repressed; then all the energies are moving to the head.

Jealousy is impossible only when you have come to accept yourself so utterly that now there is no comparison; you don't compare yourself with anybody. (…) It is possible only when you have become so integrated that you don't hanker for anything. There is no ego-need in anything, and you don't make anything an ego-trip.

Meditation is nothing but an effort to drop all the foreign elements, so that you can see yourself as you were born, mirrored in purity. It is a great silence and a great joy.

The false saint is one who has disciplined himself according to a certain code of conduct, who lives according to principles, and whose life is secondary to the principles – the principles are primary. He lives according to the books; he lives a pseudo-life. It is a well-managed hypocrisy. His real life is repressed; an unreal life is managed on the surface.

Never force anything upon yourself; anything forced remains superficial. Let it come from the very core of your being.

Imagination is a powerful faculty – the most powerful. (…) All that happens, happens through imagination. (…) All that happens is intuitive. (…) Nothing happens through reason; reason comes only secondary.

Through conflict, one never reaches anywhere; one cannot. It is only through accord, harmony, when your whole being pulsates in one rhythm, when all your parts function like an orchestra, in total unity, (…) that one can reach.

You struggle and you fight, but you are fighting in vain. The more you fight, the more you struggle, the more impossible it will become for the door to open. It opens only when you are not fighting; it opens only when you are not. So don't fight; accept. (…) You have to remain like an open hand; you are not to become a fist. If you become a fist, you will lose.

It is not the weak who surrender; the weak cannot surrender. They are so afraid of their weakness; they protect themselves; they defend themselves – how can they surrender? It is only the very, very strong people who are capable of surrendering, because they are not afraid. And when one surrenders, one becomes a sannyasin. It is a surrender, an utter surrender to life, and a trust, an unconditional trust.

These are the three stages of human life. First, the disintegrated human being – a crowd, split, a polypsychic state, many minds, many selves, not one self. Then there is the second state – the integrated human being. One Self has arisen, strong, really strong, self-confident, trustful, loving, alert, aware. All those small selves have dissolved into it; a big Self has arisen. Those small selves are no more; a new Self with a capital "S" has arisen. This is the second state. (…) And then the third state is when the Self disappears and no-self arrives; then there is no disturbance, nothing. There is no outside, no inside; all has disappeared. This is the total end, nirvana. (…) But on the way, one cannot jump from the first state to the highest state. (…) From many selves, one has to come to one Self; and from one Self to no-self.

The world is very, very murderous; it does not want any kind of awareness in people. (…) The society is completely against Buddhas. The society wants people who are stupid, mechanical, robots. Hence, there is no possibility really to work it out in the wider world. Only after working through many groups, by and by will you be able to learn subtle techniques of how to move into the world and yet remain alert, how to manage in spite of the world – the world will be against it. That has to be learned, it is a knack, so you don't come into conflict unnecessarily with the police and the state and the people; you bypass them and they don't become too attentive to you. You don't create any kind of situation where you become noticed. That has to be learned by and by, and you start going and doing things by yourself, hiding in fact. That is how all great religions by and by became esoteric – they had to become; they went underground. On the surface, they maintained the social etiquette and the mannerisms and this and that; deep down, they continued to work, but the work became underground. Sufis say to their disciples to maintain on the surface that they are ordinary men, absolutely ordinary. They should never allow anybody to know that they are doing something special, not even their wife or husband should know, not even their children.

When the mind is no more there, when the tiny mind has disappeared, that tiny self is no more there. Then nothing defines you and you are infinite – you are out of the small self; you are standing as if out of yourself, out of the old self, and just watching the thought unconcerned. This is going to happen.

Millions of people remain with the first type of goal, the mini-goal: eating, drinking, marrying. A minority choose slightly bigger goals: becoming famous, becoming a president of a country, becoming a doctor, a scientist, a poet, a painter, things like that. But that's a minority, not more than five percent of the people. Ninety-five percent remain with the first; five percent choose the second. Very rarely does a person choose the meta-goal, the ultimate goal. Great courage is needed; almost absurd courage is needed.

Repression has been the accepted mode – people have been taught to repress; and it has been taught that a repressed person, a controlled person, is a good person. (…) In fact, the controlled person, the repressed person, is the most dangerous person in the world, because he is carrying a volcano which is going to erupt one day or another. (…) Man has been repressing, and nature comes to a point where it cannot tolerate it anymore; it explodes. Then you explode in violence or you explode in madness; then you murder or you commit suicide.

Man is a paradox – he can only be man when he surpasses himself. Man is not born as man, but only as opportunity; (…) it is only a potentiality, and there is every possibility to miss it. (…) So as man finds himself, he has to continuously transcend, and in that very transcendence, he really becomes man. (…) By continuously transcending, one arrives at one's reality. (…) The being is revealed only through becoming; man's way to being is through becoming. (…) Man has some specialty about him. He is born as a surpassing, transcending energy. There is no end to his growth; he can go on growing – this is an infinite process.

People are upside-down. With the futile, non-essential, trivial, they are very discontented, and with themselves, they are very contented. This is being upside-down. (…) Be contented with the useless, and remain in a constant discontent as far as the inner is concerned. Keep constantly growing. Become a man who is constantly transcending himself.

Ordinarily, what we call love is not real love. We are demanding; we are asking. The ordinary love is a kind of begging.

Conflict becomes the foundation of all spiritual growth, because through conflict is the challenge, and through conflict one becomes more aware. Awareness comes only in danger. When there is no danger, there is no need to be aware; one can fall asleep.

When sannyas happens from the unconscious, from the guts, deep down from the belly, from the navel center, then it takes time, because the journey is so long. Slowly, slowly, the conscious mind will become aware of all the implications, of the commitment, of the involvement. Sannyas is becoming involved with me and all that I represent.

Life is a movement, and misery arises because we don't go with the movement. Either we start clinging to the past, or we start planning for the future – then we obstruct the movement. To be with the movement, one needs to be without past and without future. Then one is movement, one is life, and one is God. And once there is no disparity between you and life's movement, there is joy, there is bliss. The harmony between you and life, between the part and the Whole, is what bliss is.

Unless one starts feeling gratefulness to existence, one remains alienated, one remains a stranger. (…) The more grateful you feel towards existence, the more you are at home and at ease. (…) The modern man is utterly ungrateful. We have started taking things for granted, and nothing should be taken for granted. All is miraculous; all is wondrous. All is such a mystery, and it brings such a benediction. But to see that, one has to become innocent again; (…) then life starts being alive again.

Drop the idea that something great has to happen; this is an ego-trip, a way of avoiding the present. This hoping for something great, something fantastic, is nothing but creating a barrier between you and the present. (…) You start creating dreams, and those dreams will never be fulfilled, so you will always remain a pauper, a beggar, and you will always feel cheated by life. Nobody has cheated you; it is you and only you who have played the game upon yourself. (…) See that all desire is stupid; all desire is the way of misery and hell. (…) Nothing needs to happen; nothing needs to be done; one can relax.

Eat, drink, sleep, earn money, but let every act of life be devoted to the search of God. Every means has to be dedicated to one goal, and that is God. Only with such utter devotion does one come to know the real meaning of one's being and the real meaning of existence, and they are both the same. If you understand yourself, if you understand who you are, you have understood all. The moment self-knowing happens, one has known God too. Becoming a sannyasin means: now, from this moment, nothing else will be the goal. (…) Go on doing whatsoever you are doing, but let every effort, every act, all that you have, be devoted to one goal. Then your life will have a target, and it will start moving like an arrow. Otherwise, people go on running in all directions simultaneously. If they collapse, if they break down, if they go mad, there is no wonder. (…) It is a miracle how people go on managing to keep themselves together. But that togetherness is only an appearance. Inside there are a thousand and one pieces of their being. Man is like a mirror which has fallen on the floor and broken into a thousand and one pieces. This is the state of the ordinary mind. Those pieces have to be put together and glued together, and only a goal can glue them together; only a certain direction can make them move together. So the whole point of sannyas is that God becomes the goal, the only search. (…) Everything has to be turned into a means; then the whole of life starts turning towards the center, and that centering makes one full of light, full of joy, full of freedom.

It is very rare to find a person who is not frozen; it is very rare to find fluid people. The society functions in such a way that it freezes every consciousness, every child that is born.

Deny nothing; accept everything. The whole existence is a ladder, from the lowest to the highest. Never deny the lower – if you deny the lower, you will never reach the higher. (…) You have to go through the lower; it makes way for the higher. Once this is seen, life becomes a unity; otherwise, one is split. (…) To live as a part against the Whole is to live in misery. To live as a part with the Whole, as the Whole, in the Whole, is bliss.

We are caught up in the non-essential, the mundane, the trivial. For one moment, it looks so important, and the next moment, it appears as if it had not happened at all. (…) One has to be very alert and aware; one has to save oneself for God. If we lose our energy in just collecting stones on the beach, by the time we come to the treasure, we will not have any energy left. (…) One has to be very conscious of what one is doing with one's energy, of where one is putting it, because once it is gone, it is gone forever.

The past goes only slowly, slowly. It hangs around, it is like a hangover, but it has no roots in you any longer. The root is cut, and even if the old tree still looks green, it is not alive anymore; it is dying. Just go on cooperating.

The more we dissolve, the more blissful we become. When one disappears, there is utter bliss and nothing else.

On the circumference, God is a dance; at the center, God is just absolute stillness. God is a paradox; God consists of polar opposites. Those polar opposites are complementarities; they are just two wings of a bird.

Search for God in the form, worship Him as form, and as the worship deepens, the form disappears and the formlessness surfaces. But one has to work through the form; one has to begin with the immediate – it is impossible to have a contact with the formless.

Before one can fall into a deep silence, it always happens: one starts talking too much. The mind starts unwinding itself, that's all. (…) Once you have expressed a thing really and totally, it is erased; you are finished with it.

To conquer oneself is creative. It makes one more and more beautiful, because it comes through love, through compassion, through meditation. (…) The real victory consists of conquering oneself.

We don't know God, so we cannot start by belief. All belief is false.

My process is to first go through cathartic experiences. Throw out, vomit all the poisons that you have been carrying through the lives. And when all is cleaned and you are purified of all the toxins, go into vipassana; then it is of tremendous importance.

Rest means one is at home, at ease, relaxed. Bliss is not a state of excitement; it is a state of absolute tranquility. (…) Bliss is neither happiness nor unhappiness, because both are states of excitement. Happiness is the excitement that you like, and unhappiness is the excitement that you don't like, but both are states of excitement, and both tire, both exhaust. (…) Bliss is a state of utter non-excitement; absolute stillness. One is never tired; hence it can be eternal. Happiness can only be momentary; bliss can be timeless. Unconsciously, everybody is moving towards it. Sannyas means conscious movement towards it, deliberate, with a target, with a distant star in one's vision.

Exactly like the flame of the candle, the ego disappears. You cannot say where it has gone – it has not gone anywhere; it is no more. When the ego disappears, all is silence. (…) One feels oneself as pure emptiness, and that pure emptiness has a fragrance to it.

Pour your energies into creativity, and problems disappear like dewdrops in the morning sun. And life goes on resolving all that needs to be resolved; you need not come into it. Then life is really a benediction, a pure benediction. One goes from one peak to another peak; one is always moving to a higher and higher plane. And the moment you move from one plane to another plane, all the problems that belong to the first plane simply disappear, become irrelevant. If you remain stuck on the same plane, you cannot solve them. There is no need to tackle any problem directly; the way is indirect.

If the mind is there, it keeps you continuously engaged with the exterior; it keeps you occupied at the surface. When it is no more there, you simply relax into your source.

Bliss is transcendental to all dualities.

Freedom means understanding. One has understood the game, (…) and one simply gets out of it with no scar on the soul. One forgives and forgets, and one remains without any clinging to the society in the name of love or hate. Society has simply disappeared for the rebel. He may live in the world or he may go out of the world, but he belongs to it no more; he is an outsider.

God is neither moral nor immoral; God is beyond. The concepts of good and bad are our inventions. They don't belong to existence itself; they are man's creations. The society needs them. The sinner and the saint are our fictions. From the vision of the Ultimate, there is no sinner, no saint, no heaven, no hell – life is one, absolutely one. (…) Once this understanding sinks deep into the heart, one is freed from duality.

Sex has to be indulged in, because that is the only way to transcend it.

The search is for the ultimate nature, and until it is found, restlessness continues.

Ultimately, aloneness remains; all disappears, all has to disappear.

'No' creates bitterness; 'no' is the source of all poisons. If you continuously say 'no' to things, you are poisoning your system. When you start saying 'yes' to things, a total and unconditional 'yes', holding nothing back, just going into it totally – each moment, whatsoever God wills you go on saying 'yes', you go on surrendering, and each moment the surrender becomes deeper and deeper – you will find a sweetness arising in you. Your whole body will become sweet energy, and your whole mind will be in a different dimension. (…) 'No' leads ultimately to hell; 'yes' leads ultimately to heaven. And the whole message of sannyas is to say 'yes'.

One flower is so important that ninety-nine thorns can be tolerated for it.

Freshness is destroyed by your thoughts, by the past hanging around you. It is the dust of the past that keeps people unfresh and dull. It is as if the mirror is completely covered with dust, and it cannot reflect. (…) So one has to work continuously to uproot oneself from the past. And this is a constant work; it cannot be stopped.

Great reverence has to be developed. That is the tantra vision – reverence for life, reverence for everything that life implies, particularly sex, because it is sex that life comes out of.

Your mind has changed; your body needs change. There is a disparity between body and mind. And the chest is the point where body and mind meet. That is the lock where they are joined together; that is the knot. So when the mind changes and the body does not, you will feel it. If the body changes and the mind does not, you will feel it.

The first thing is how to create energy, and the second thing is how to make it creative. Once you have learned how to create energy and how to use it, you have started moving on the real journey in life. Then the pilgrimage starts; then each day will bring greater joy and greater celebration.

Ninety-eight percent of life remains unknown to you because you are not interested in it.

One has to learn how to dissolve oneself, how to come to a point where one is not. Only then, God is.

Man cannot be satisfied as he is; man can only be satisfied when he has transcended himself. Man is the animal that has the capacity to surpass himself.

Truth is a transformation of your being; it is not an answer that comes from somewhere. (…) It grows in you; it is a blooming of your being. (…) The very passion for truth, when it becomes absolutely intense, transforms you. The very intensity of it is the transfiguration. It will give you much trouble, but one is fortunate to have it. The really unfortunate people are those who don't have any desire to know truth, who simply go on lingering for no reason at all. Whether they are alive or dead, it makes no difference to them. They have no passion in life. Those who search are going to be in continuous trouble and anguish and anxiety. The search can drive them mad, but it is worth it.

To be initiated into sannyas is to be initiated into primal love.

Don't lose heart; don't escape. Be a little more stubborn; stick to it.

Catharsis means throwing the poison out, so it doesn't spoil your system.

Love will happen only to those people who seek it, otherwise not.

When you work, you earn some quantity of rest – it has to be earned.

It is from the hara that life begins, and it is in the hara that life ends.

The past is not holding you; you are holding the past.

Any system that makes society more important than the individual is a dangerous philosophy. It will kill the individual.

The first basic thing is coming back to the body. If we are not in contact with our bodies, we are not in contact with the earth. We are uprooted; we don't have any roots; and without being rooted in the body, nothing can be done, nothing at all. (…) The trust comes when you have deep roots in the earth.

Any action in which you can be total becomes meditation.

In a better world, running will become one of the most important meditations, because when you are running fast, breathing deeply, by and by, after the first mile, you don't have any separation between you and the body. That division of mind and body disappears; (…) you are one, one unity.

Once work becomes a meditation, then there is naturally a great joy. Meditation should never be against work – otherwise, there is conflict; then life is not harmonious. When everything fits together in one pattern, there is beauty and balance. So the man who can find meditation in his work is the most fortunate man. (…) The point is that whatsoever you are doing is not against your being, and that your being and your doing go together hand in hand, in a dance. Then each experience is a growth experience, and out of each experience, it is not only that your work grows – you grow. (…) And that is the real value.

There are many people who are failures as beings and successful as doers. They are the most unfortunate people in the world. They have all the success around them; and deep inside, they are just poor beggars. They may be president or prime minister; they may have gathered much money; but deep inside, they are empty, because they have not grown. Their work was not in tune with their being.

One has to be meditative; compassion is a by-product. (…) When you are silent, it is there. You cannot cultivate it. If you cultivate it, it will be a pseudo-coin, a counterfeit. (…) If you cultivate it, it will just be an ego-trip. (…) Compassion is a shadow of meditation; a meditative mind is a compassionate mind.

Whatsoever we do with effort leads outside, takes us outside; anything done by effort moves outward. To go in means to relax, to let go – there is no other way.

By and by, the dreams of the outside will disappear, because there is no need for the dreams to continue.

Your dreams will show whether you are really fed up, or if there is still some lingering interest. If it is there, then finish that too. (…) If you are really fed up, by and by, you will start feeling that energy is moving inwards on its own accord. You are not doing anything; you are simply sitting there and it is going in; it is falling in. And through that inwardness, your centering will arise. Through that inwardness, a new way to live will come.

One has to come to a state of no-effort; that is the goal – but sometimes much effort is needed to come to that state of effortlessness. Before one can become natural, one has to drop many unnatural things – and those unnatural things will not drop by themselves. You have practiced them; now you will have to do something as anti-practice, as an antidote. You have taken a poison; now you have to take the antidote – otherwise, the poison will kill you. Once the antidote is there and the balance is achieved, then there is no need to go on taking the antidote.

Meditations are antidotes; they are just to undo your past.

To help people, you need to be in a very deep flow of energy; otherwise people's problems, their anxieties, their tensions, will start entering into your being. If you are not flowing towards them, they are flowing towards you. (…) You should not be in a lower energy than the people you are helping, otherwise you will get into trouble. You should be on a higher point from where things can flow towards them, but nothing can flow from them towards you.

Alcoholics are almost always good people. I have a certain tender heart for them – they are good people; I have a soft corner for them. They are not bad people; they are victims. They were too good, and they could not tolerate this bad reality; so they drowned themselves in alcohol. They were visionaries; they wanted a better reality, a better world, and seeing that it was impossible, they started destroying themselves, withdrawing themselves – but they are basically good people.

Because you are joyless, you seek entertainment. (…) Only a joyless person needs entertainment. The more joyless the world becomes, the more we need entertainment and drugs.

The mind is afraid, and it is also bored.

In the mind, there is no meaning – the meaning comes from beyond. (…) If you want to be alive, you can be alive only with the unknown. (…) That's what courage is: a readiness to accept the unknown; not only a readiness, but a tremendous welcoming attitude, a receptivity. Befriend the unknown.

The only preparation that we can make for death is to live consciously.

The fear of death arises because of unlived life. The only way to face death is to live life totally.

Drop all negative attitudes, so that each moment becomes a crystal-clear moment of joy. Don't miss a single opportunity to be joyous.

Don't waste a single opportunity that is available here – don't waste time; don't waste energy. Many people are lost because they don't have a direction. (…) It is a sheer wastage. They never arrive anywhere; they remain empty. And the failure is written large on millions of people's faces; you can see it everywhere. You will rarely find a man who has bloomed, who has become what he was meant to become.

The more you know, the less you know. The more you know, the more you know that knowledge is impossible. The more you know, the more mysterious life becomes.

A man needs a woman to be provoked by, and a woman needs a man to provoke her. That provocation is a great benediction, because only through that provocation do you come to know what you are carrying within yourself. And whatsoever bubbles up, surfaces, you can be relieved of. That darkness will go; it is coming from your unconscious. But the unconscious cannot drop it directly; first it has to come to the conscious. Anything that has to be dropped first has to come to the conscious. (…) The unconscious has no other way of throwing anything out; it has to come up to the conscious first. (…) Let everything come up – love and hate, anger and compassion. Let everything come up; then one day, you will find that everything has been released, and you have become an emptiness.

Whatsoever part has been given you, fulfill it as joyously as possible, and always remember that deep down you remain pure; you remain always in God.

Knowing is a fire that consumes the knower.

Man integrates only when God becomes the center. Without God, there is no center; man is just a hodge-podge.

Enthusiasm is part of stupidity, foolhardiness. The more stupid one is, the more enthusiastic. Enthusiastic people are always unintelligent people. The more intelligent one becomes, the more things become calm and quiet. (…) The more you experience life, the more you know life, the more you understand that there is not much to do, and in fact, nothing much can be done. Then, one starts relaxing, accepting – a kind of contentment arises.

Life is an introduction to God.

Find a way of creative living. Something has to be done. Without doing, you will never feel happy; you will never feel a fulfillment. (…) When you can have a few creations around you that you have created, then you are fulfilled; that is your flowering. A barren man or a barren woman will not feel fulfilled.

Love that brings freedom is the only true love.

Man without God is man alienated.

Man lives in a kind of constant tension; man is a chronic state of tension. (…) This chronic state of tension creates misery. (…) To be relaxed means to be in the present. (…) Once you have learned to live in a relaxed way, you are no more a becoming – you are a being.

One has to learn to order the mind. It follows; it is very, very obedient if you know how to order it. Don't fight with it, and there is no need to control it – in the very control there is fear.

What is the ego really? It is all your past experiences accumulated.

All growth is in awareness, not in being. Being remains exactly as it is.

Seeing oneself, one sees the whole humanity.

Trust means that we have come to recognize the fact that we come out of existence, we remain rooted in it, and one day we disappear in it.

Walk prayerfully; talk prayerfully. (…) Whatsoever you do, do it prayerfully. Remember that you are always in the temple, and all ground is holy ground. This remembrance will change you.

Man is not meant to crawl and creep on earth. He has the capacity to fly to the Ultimate.

Each age needs a new kind of spirituality, because each age is different from any other; hence messengers keep on coming. A messenger is nothing but a man who translates the eternal truth for contemporary men.

Modern man is the first man in history to have no idea of sacredness, to be living a very mundane life. He is interested in money, power, prestige, and he thinks that is all there is. It is such a stupid notion. His life is surrounded by small things, very small. He has no idea of anything bigger than himself. He has denied God; he has said that God is dead. He has denied life after death; he has denied life within. He believes only in the superficial; he believes in the circumference, but goes on denying the center; hence we see such boredom all around. It is natural, because without something bigger than you to relate to, your life is going to be tedious, boring. A life becomes a dance only when it is an adventure. And it can become an adventure only when there is something higher than you to achieve, to reach. The sacred simply means that we are not the end, that we are only a passage; that everything has not already happened, that much has yet to happen. The seed has yet to sprout, and the sprout to become a tree. That tree has to wait for spring and to explode into thousands of flowers, releasing its soul into the cosmos. Only then will there be fulfillment.

We are not strangers, outsiders. We are part of existence. This is our home. We are not here accidentally; we are here because we are needed. We are here because existence wanted us to be here in first place. It is the will of existence. Hence nobody need feel alienated.

Nietzsche said that God is dead. He became the mouthpiece of the whole contemporary mind. If God is dead, then life is meaningless, because God is the only possibility of there being any meaning, any significance.

The moment you are empty of yourself, you are full of God. Both cannot exist together, remember; (…) it is either you or God. And it is the foolish person who chooses himself. Choose God; disappear as an ego. Forget yourself as an entity separate from existence, and in that very disappearance, you are reborn. It is a very paradoxical state: the moment you are empty of yourself, you become full, and full for the first time, overflowingly full, inexhaustibly full. (…) Drop the false, so that the real can be attained.

We have been taught to be enemies of existence; we have been taught life-negative ideologies. (…) Life is not a punishment – it is a reward; it is a gift. Befriend it totally. (…) Once your idea of negating disappears and something positive settles inside, a secret door opens; life starts revealing its mysteries to you. Those mysteries can be revealed only to friends. (…) Only when you are in deep, intimate relationship with life does it open its heart to you. In that opening, one comes to know what truth is, what love is, what bliss is, what existence is.

Man has to be absolutely empty; only then is the space created for God to descend in him. (…) Our cups are full. (…) We have to empty the cup completely. This is the whole process of sannyas: emptying yourself of yourself, emptying yourself of all thoughts, desires, memories, hopes, expectations – just a process of emptying.

Life can be known only by a state of no-mind. That's what meditation is – putting the mind aside; being without thoughts. Just being silent – not even a single word moves in the mind, no traffic; all is empty, quiet, still. (…) Learn to stand outside of the mind, and you have learned all that there is to learn. (…) That's exactly the meaning of the word ecstasy – to stand outside.

Be utterly surrendered to existence – no more fight, no more conflict, no more private goals of your own. Let the Whole possess you; let the Whole guide you. Then wherever it takes you is good, and whatsoever it makes of you is good. Man alone cannot do right; he will only do wrong. Right happens only when man allows existence to function through him. So, trust; allow existence to function through you.

We cannot be victorious on our own. If we try to be victorious on our own, we are bound to be defeated, we are doomed. Failure is absolutely certain, inevitable. It is like a small wave fighting against the whole ocean; it belongs to the ocean – how can it fight? It is like the part fighting with the Whole. (…) The wave can be victorious only in the ocean; not against, not without it. Man is victorious when he lives not according to his will, but according to the will of existence.

Man is a seed, but just a seed; he is of great potential, but nothing is actual. (…) There is no way other than meditation to break the seed. One has to go on hammering with meditation.

To live consciously in the infinity of existence is the greatest joy possible. More than that cannot be conceived; more than that is not possible. That is the ultimate peak.

Society imposes artificiality on everybody. It calls it culture, civilization, education. It gives it big names, but the real thing is that it makes you artificial. It teaches you to repress nature. My whole effort is to help you to be natural again, because it is only through nature that one comes to godliness.

To me, that's what religion is – dissolving oneself in the Whole. Just as a river disappears into the ocean, you disappear into existence.

You have to be a ruler of the inner world. (…) Ordinarily, we are slaves pretending to be rulers. Unless one conquers one's consciousness, one remains a pretender; one remains a slave and goes on playing all kinds of games of pretension and deception.

A wise man is naturally kingly. He may be a beggar, but he is still a king.

The function of a Master is not to save you, but just to remind you.

Man lives at war. Outside he fights with others; inside he fights with himself – as if he knows only one way to live, and that is fighting. (…) One has to learn how to drop this old pattern of constant fighting.

Meditation can flower only in deep relaxation; relaxation is the right soil for meditation to happen. (…) Meditation means a totally relaxed state, so relaxed that the mind melts. Just as in concentration, the mind becomes stronger and stronger, (…) so in relaxation, it becomes weaker and weaker, because nothing is excluded; all is included. There is no strain, no tension; (…) you are simply available and open. That availability, that openness to existence is meditation.

Total love includes all. Really nothing is left; all is included in it.

Each moment, whatsoever you are doing, do it wholeheartedly. Don't hold back; that's all. That's what I mean by totally: don't hold back.

Once you have felt love, meditation starts of its own accord. (…) It is inevitable that after a deep experience of love, meditation follows. And meditation opens the door to the temple of God.

In the hands of Jesus, water is wine.

Meditation means a state of thoughtless awareness. It is a kind of beautiful silence; nothing arises out of it. (…) Prayer means the heart is full of love; it is a positive approach. Prayer can dance; prayer can sing; prayer can be celebration – but without meditation, all that celebration remains superficial, childish, immature. Bliss comes through meditation; joy comes through prayer. Centering comes through meditation; dancing comes through prayer. (…) Prayer is the fragrance of meditation. One cannot really pray if one has not meditated.

Praise is the very foundation of prayer. One who can praise has a heart ready to jump into prayer. (…) Real praise comes out of understanding how much existence has given you. (…) When you become aware of this tremendous gift, a great praise arises in your heart; (…) it is a thankfulness, a gratitude. (…) Only such praise is religious; only such praise is prayer. (…) The miracle is that only such a man will be showered with more and more bliss, although he had not asked for it. His gratitude makes him capable of receiving more; his openness makes him capable of absorbing more beauty, more joy, more music. His whole being becomes a garden of flowers.

The way to bliss is through gratitude, thankfulness. Feel thankful for existence; it has given so much. (…) Godliness is not very far away from gratitude.

Existence always comes as a revelation – never as knowledge, but always as a revelation.

One needs to be industrious; one needs to accept challenges which provoke one for the upward journey. It is hard; it is dangerous, but it brings out the best in you. It creates integrity; ultimately it creates a soul in you.

The moment one starts seeking and searching for oneself, one becomes the blessed one. The enquiry itself is the beginning of the transformation. The more passionate the enquiry is, the sooner the transformation will come. Make it intense; make it total.

If you can love totally, unconditionally, then godliness is not far away. Then godliness is in the very heartbeat of your being.

Man needs integration, an integration of all the fragments into one whole, into one harmony. And that is the whole effort of religion. The very word religion means that which binds you together. That's exactly the meaning of yoga, too; yoga means union. Religion and yoga are synonymous.

Meditate – on one hand you become blissful; and on the other hand you become wise. Both grow simultaneously in a kind of deep synchronicity. In the ultimate state, bliss becomes wisdom, and wisdom becomes bliss. (…) If you are ready to dissolve into the Whole, bliss is the outcome.

To live in the illusion of separation is bound to create problems, and the problems go on and on accumulating. They cannot be solved unless we change our very approach from the very beginning. A radical change is needed, not some information; and that radical change happens when we drop our personality into the ocean of existence, when the dewdrop of the ego disappears into the ocean.

Learn to be alone, and allow wisdom to surface in your being. Then you can live in the world, but then even in the crowd you will be alone, unaffected, undistracted, unimpressed. You will be in the world, but not of the world. (…) You have found your own scripture; you have found God's voice within your own heart.

A real man is always an enrichment to the world, to existence; he contributes much. And unless you contribute something, you will never feel blissful.

Unless your heart sings and dances, you are not really living; you are only dragging – fulfilling certain duties, going through certain rituals, somehow managing and maintaining a façade. But deep inside, there is emptiness and a great trembling, because one knows in the deepest part of the heart that life is not yet fulfilled, that one has not yet been able to sing one's song. Everybody is born with a song; his song, and unless he sings it, he remains unfulfilled.

Life can be lived only as insecurity; life can be lived only as danger – there is no other way.

Unless one creates music in one's being, unless one starts living as a dance, unless one celebrates existence, there is no possibility of knowing God, because God is the ultimate crescendo of dance, song, celebration. God is not for sad people; God is for those who are capable of love and laughter.

Without meditation, nobody can live in freedom. (…) your many desires function like chains, invisible chains, inside you. (…) Unless you are free of all these desires, you are not free. The moment desires disappear, one knows freedom for the first time.

First, one has to become harmonious within oneself; and then, one can be harmonious with the universe. (…) There are two mergers – one within yourself, the first unity; and the second, with the Whole, the second unity. And within these two steps, the whole journey is complete. (…) Unless oneness happens, one has lived in utter futility, in vain.

Whichever makes you unconscious is wrong, and whichever helps you to become conscious is right. That's my definition of right and wrong; that's my whole morality. (…) As you stop cooperating with the unconscious, it shrinks. A moment comes when slowly, slowly, the territory of the conscious becomes bigger and bigger and bigger, and the unconscious goes on shrinking, disappearing. Finally, the whole unconscious territory is claimed by the consciousness. That is the moment you start growing flowers; for the first time, your tree flowers.

Just as the earth and the planets go around the sun, your whole inner being rotates around the center of bliss. Once that is recognized, things become very simple, clear; then you don't grope in the darkness; then you can directly go toward the center. And the moment you start moving toward the center, your life starts becoming light.

Your own house is in darkness, and no outer light can be brought in. You have to find your inner source of light. (…) And if you burn a candle inside, then from the window, from the door, the light will start reaching the outside.

Buddha is reported to have said that lies are sweet in the beginning, and bitter in the end; truth is bitter in the beginning, and sweet in the end. And he is right, absolutely right. (…) Truth never compromises. When it comes, all lies are bound to be shattered. In the beginning, it creates chaos; but out of that chaos, stars are born.

The moment you know your being, you have found the master key which can unlock many doors – in fact, all the doors.

My effort here is to help you to find your own voice. (…) I don't give any advice; I don't try to solve your particular problems. My effort is totally radical – I simply help you to turn off the noise inside, so that you can hear your own voice. And then, you cannot go wrong; then, you live in your own light.

Rest means emptiness. Rest means, there is no thought, no desire, nowhere to go; one is simply relaxing within one's being. It is a tremendous contentment with the moment, in the moment, here, now. There is no future, no past; only this moment exists. There is no space to run anywhere; there is no space for a thought to even arise.

Thoughts are like ripples, waves; they keep your mind continuously wavering. And when the mind is wavering, it cannot reflect truth. (…) When you are absolutely silent, truth is reflected in you.

Man is a stranger on the earth. He is here, but he does not belong. He tries in every way to make a home, to create relationships, but everything fails. He remains homeless, unless he starts looking inward, because there is his real home. And the inner transcends the earth; the inner is not part of the earth. It is here, and it is not here. Once we know who we are in our inner world, then the feeling of being a stranger disappears. You have found your home, your universe; you have found godliness. Unless that happens, every effort is bound to fail.

One can possess the whole world, yet deep down one knows one is empty, hollow, and there is no meaning to life. It is impossible to throw away this feeling of meaninglessness, impossible to become attuned to the outside world unless you have become attuned to the inner. Once you are attuned to the inner, a miracle happens – the outer is no longer outer; it becomes just an extension of the inner. Once you have seen your center, your circumference becomes a part of it. Then one lives in the world, and yet the world is not in one. One lives in the world; yet one remains untouched by it.

People are constantly living in discontent about everything. It is a habit. It is not that, if they have more money and a better house and a better wife or a better son or a better job, they will be content – it is not that. Whatsoever they have, they will remain discontented. Discontent is a habit of the mind. Mind lives through discontent; it is intrinsic to mind – mind can never be content.

A contented person is nothing but love. He is not even loving; he is simply love. He loves for the sake of love, because that is the way to show gratitude to existence. That's his thankfulness, his prayer. So he goes on loving each and everybody. He does not ask for anything in return: he simply gives, because so much has been given by existence that he should share it a little bit. And the miracle is that the more we share, the more goes on coming to us. (…) First become contented; then your life will become a source of joy for others. That's the only true service.

Conversion is something inner. The only conversion I know of is from mind to meditation, because it changes your whole being.

Just as a river goes into the ocean, the meditator enters the vastness of existence and becomes one with it.

To live in the present is the only way to live at all. And when you live in the present with no past dragging you backward and no future dragging you forward, when your total energy is concentrated in the moment, life takes on a tremendous intensity. It becomes a passionate love affair; you become aflame with your own energy. (…) And that's the only way to be rich, to be prosperous; all others are poor.

The whole art of meditation is to bring eternal peace, silence, joy to you.

Meditation without peace is dead, forced, (…) just some kind of concentration. (…) Meditation is a state of no-mind. And only in meditation, in true meditation, does peace happen. It is just a natural fragrance of meditation.

Meditation needs a very determined heart. The wavering mind is incapable of going into meditation.

Essentially you are divine. Anything that happens to you is only a passing moment; don't be distracted by it. If it is pleasure, watch it; if it is pain, watch it. Pleasure passes; pain passes. They are just like clouds moving in the infinite sky of your being. The sky is not affected by the clouds; (…) the sky remains unscathed.

When you start going in, mind is left behind. It can't go inside with you; it can only go with you outside. It has only one possibility; it is one-dimensional. Mind makes a person a warrior in the political sense; meditation makes man a warrior in the religious sense.

Man is capable of becoming a host to God, a home to God. And unless one becomes a host and a home to God, one remains unfulfilled. Without allowing God in, one remains in a deep frustration.

The first thing to remember is that life has been given to us; it is not our achievement. (…) And the second thing to remember is the strength of spirit. It is not something that is yours either; it is the constant flow of existence in you.

Once you are aware, you start seeking and searching for a second birth. And the second birth becomes possible only through meditation. The first birth is through the mother; the second birth is through meditation. Hence, in ancient scriptures, meditation is called the real mother. Jesus says to his disciples, Unless you are born again, you will not enter the Kingdom of God.

To be a friend to existence means saying 'yes' to existence, 'yes' in all its moods. Sometimes it is cloudy; (…) sometimes it is sunny; (…) sometimes a dark moment arrives. (…) You say 'yes', 'yes', deep down, because whatsoever life is, is divine. In its totality, it is divine.

The ego has to die; only then can you be born. In one sheath, there can't be two swords. Either you can live inside yourself and the ego goes, or the ego lives and you have to go underground.

The man who has never known anything of meditation lives a barren life, just like a desert. (…) You can believe your desert to be a beach; that's how people are living, believing their desert is a beach. It is simply a desert.

Real bliss is always a gift from existence; it can happen only when the ego dies.

A prayer without meditation is false, because it depends on beliefs.

Religion is nothing but the simple art of dissolving yourself into the Whole.

Bliss happens only when you have moved beyond the known into the unknown. Whenever you are confined to the known, your life becomes routine, repetitive. It goes on moving in the same rut; it goes around in circles; and slowly, slowly, it dulls all your sensitivity, all your receptivity. It hardens people. It makes them blind; it makes them deaf; it makes them dumb – because there is nothing to see and nothing to hear and nothing to taste and nothing to feel. They have known it all; it's the same repetition.

The greatest courage in the world is not to imitate others, to live one's own life as authentically as possible, whatever the cost. Even if life is lost in living your own life, it is worth it, because that is how the soul is born. When one is ready to die for something, in that very struggle, one is born. It takes courage; it takes guts.

Courage begins when you step beyond the boundaries of the known. (…) the more you risk, the more you are. The more you accept the challenge of the unknown, the more integrated you become. It is only in tremendous danger that the soul is born; otherwise the person remains just the body.

Before bliss can happen, you have to become integrated like a rock.

Truth is not available ready-made. It is neither in the traditions, nor in the scriptures. It has to be enquired into, explored. (…) It is nontransferable. It simply can't be given; there is no way to give it. The moment you give it, it becomes a lie. You have to discover it on your own. Buddhas can show the way, but you will have to travel the whole journey.

Meditation leads you toward the oceanic – from smallness to vastness, from the bounded body-mind structure to the unbounded consciousness, from the finite to the Infinite, from time to eternity, from birth and death to eternal life.

The mind cannot know the formless, because the mind can only catch hold of forms. To know the formless, you will have to go beyond the mind. (…) Only those moments that you have lived with God, with the presence of godliness, are saved. Those few moments are the real moments; they are the only moments that you have lived. All other moments will go down the drain.

Flow with the river; go with the river; abandon yourself totally to the river. It is already going to the ocean, and it will take you there too.

To live here and now is to live a religious life. That is pure consciousness, and out of pure consciousness, whatever happens is virtue.

Existence is oceanic, and we are like dewdrops; we have to learn the art of disappearing into the ocean. It needs guts, because to disappear into the ocean means to die as a dewdrop.

The moment you speak a truth, it becomes a lie; utter it and you have already made it false. It remains true only when it lives in deep silence within you.

To die without knowing "I am God" is to have lived in a futile way. One is fulfilled only when one knows, "I am God". (…) Unless one realizes one's godhood, nothing is achieved; life has been a failure.

Man has many layers of identification, and we have to drop all the layers, slowly, slowly, slowly. Finally nothing is left, and that nothing is you.

Love is nothing but the disappearance of the dewdrop into the ocean. It is losing one's ego; it is total surrender to existence. (…) The ego is the absence of love. The moment you bring in the light of love, the ego disappears.

This is the whole secret of the path of love: unmotivated love transforms your whole being into love energy. And to become love energy is to become divine; nothing more is needed.

Love yourself, because it is only through love that you will become harmonious, that you will become one. Don't condemn yourself.

Be blissful within and loving without. (…) The sharing of bliss is love, and it is through love that bliss grows. The more you love, the more blissful you become; and the more blissful you become, the more you love. And between bliss and love, you become an integrated being.

We are continuously searching for the union with the Whole; knowingly or unknowingly, we want to merge with the Whole; because only with the Whole does life come to its ultimate peak – and that is the ultimate desire of the human heart.

Unless existence dances in you, there is no possibility of any dance. Unless existence rejoices in you, there is no possibility of rejoicing.

All that is great is always a gift of existence. It is never our achievement; in fact, it happens only when we are utterly absent. (…) When you are too full of yourself, nothing happens. Then gifts go on coming, but you are not ready to receive them. (…) We can receive the gifts of existence only when we are utterly empty; the emptier you are, the better. The whole process of sannyas is nothing but emptying you of yourself.

The God experienced through meditation is the only true God; all other gods are inventions.

The ultimate act of creativity is the flowering of your consciousness. (…) There can be no fulfillment higher than that, greater than that. It is the very peak.

Don't condemn the ordinary; that is the way of the foolish person. Transform the ordinary; that is the way of the wise. The mundane is not against the sacred; the mundane is a stepping-stone toward the sacred.

The only thing that is essential is awareness. And people are lost in the nonessential.

Man has to be a lamp unto himself. (…) Nothing is needed from the outside. Existence has provided you with everything that you will need on the journey. The light is there, and only your inner light can help you to distinguish the right from the wrong. (…) Those who depend on others are simply wasting their opportunity.

Society wants you to be dead, not alive. The whole effort is how to kill you and yet to use you as an efficient mechanism. (…) Society destroys aliveness and replaces it with mechanical efficiency. (…) Man's whole being is lost; he becomes a convenient cog in the wheel, a replaceable part.

To live in no-mind is to be wise; to function out of no-mind is to function out of wisdom. (…) Then the right happens of its own accord.

People go on fighting with greed, with anger, with lust, but it is futile. (…) My insistence is: don't fight with the symptoms; go to the very root of the matter – and that is the ego. Cut the root, and all other problems will disappear.

Not to be is the only way of really being.

Purity is when you live in choiceless awareness. (…) We have to transcend all duality: moral-immoral, good-bad, summer-winter. All have to be transcended, so that one can see the One. One can see the One in so many millions of forms; one is capable of recognizing the One wherever, in whatever form he appears. (…) When the ordinary ways of seeing things as dual are dropped, you become pure, because then nothing can contaminate you. (…) That is the ultimate state of consciousness.

I don't teach purity; I don't teach morality – that is all nonsense. I teach only meditation. (…) I don't teach you belief or disbelief; I teach you enquiry.

Think of awareness as a question of life and death. In fact, it is a question of life and death. Without awareness, you are simply dying every day; with awareness, you start living for the first time – and then, life goes on growing bigger and bigger, vaster and vaster. One day, it is so abundant that not only are you alive, but whosoever comes close to you also becomes alive. You start imparting some magic to others too; you start overflowing with life, love, light. And that is the state of a Buddha; that is the state of a Christ.

You have to live in the world, but you have to think of it only as a big drama. (…) Don't take it seriously – take it very lightheartedly; take it as a cosmic joke. It is a cosmic joke.

Whatever we create within ourselves becomes a magnetic center; it creates a certain field of energy. And in that field of energy, things start happening. So, if one wants the blessings of existence, one should create whatever blissfulness one is capable of; one should do one's utmost, and then a thousandfold bliss will be yours. The more you have, the more will be coming. Once this secret is understood, one goes on becoming richer and richer inwardly. Deeper and deeper is one's joy, and there is no end to ecstasy.

Man can live in two ways: either he can live partially, fragmentarily, or he can live totally. (…) One has to be one hundred percent involved, committed; only then does life reveal its secrets. Be total in whatsoever you do. Each act has to become an opportunity to be total. That's my whole teaching, the long and the short of it.

Patience is a fundamental quality of the seeker; impatience is a barrier in the search. You can't be in a hurry as far as God is concerned; (…) that won't do. If you want to know godliness, if you want to know truth, you have to know the way of eternity.

The world is a great challenge if you can learn the art of being silent among all distractions. Only then, if your silence is true, authentic, alive, can godliness come to you.

A real man of peace will have to go through an inner transformation. (…) Meditation is the alchemy of transforming your aggressive energies into peaceful energies; it transforms your violence into love. They are not different; it is the same energy. (…) Energy is neutral; it is neither good nor bad. Energy used non-meditatively becomes dangerous. (…) If harm happens, that is not an accident at all – it was bound to happen; it was inevitable. We have energies, but we are not grown-up. Hence our energies go berserk. Meditation is the process of growing up.

Everybody's inner territory is different. Buddha's footprints won't help you, and if you follow Buddha's footprints literally, you will never find yourself. Jesus' map won't help you; you can't follow it literally. It can help you in a very indirect way; it can make you aware of certain things inside, but in a very vague sense. (…) Each individual is unique, so unique that you have to discover yourself alone; hence great courage is needed. This is the greatest adventure in life, and one who goes on this adventure is blessed.

Music comes very close to the experience of godliness, because godliness is the ultimate music of existence. It is another name for the harmony that exists in the universe. (…) That's the attractiveness of music: it releases meditation in you. (…) For a moment, you are transported into another world. For a moment, you transcend time and space; you become infinite, unbounded. That is the beginning, the beginning of a journey that never ends.

Life starts only when you start moving in the dimension beyond death. That's what meditation is for – a strategy, a device, a ladder, to go beyond death.

Meditation is the bridge that brings you to the very source of your being. Once you have tasted the joy of being at the source, then everything else in life becomes meaningless. Then you can go on living an ordinary life, but it is all acting; it is a beautiful drama. Play it as well as you can, but you now know that you are not part of it. It is just a role; it is not your existence.

Man lives in limitations – the limitation of the body, the limitation of the mind, the limitation of emotions, moods. These are all limitations upon limitations. And all these limitations have to be transcended. That's the function of meditation, to help you to go beyond all boundaries. It is a voyage to the unbounded. (…) Man should never be content with any boundary. Whenever you come to a boundary, try to go beyond it. When all boundaries are transcended, when you have reached infinity, you have come to existence; you have come home.

The function of the Master is to help you to be silent, so that you can hear your own inner whisperings, and then your life starts moving through an inner discipline. So I don't give you any outer discipline; I help you to discover your inside – then you are free; then you move in freedom.

For the man who knows how to rejoice, everything is sacred.

The most fundamental thing is to know the nature of existence, so that we can be in tune with it. Otherwise, everybody is out of step; and that being out of step is what misery is. To be in harmony with existence is bliss; (…) to be in discord with existence is misery. (…) once you have known the Tao, nature, the dharma, you cannot go against it. (…) But without knowing it, of course, one is bound to stumble, bound to go astray. (…) the way does not go on the outside; the way goes through you – it is an inner journey. (…) Meditation is a way to find your center.

Man builds his life on the sands of his dreams. That's why whatever one tries to do, everything fails; all houses collapse. They don't have their foundation in something eternal; they are founded in the momentary. And when one's house of sand falls down, we start making another house – of the same material, with the same material. We never seem to learn the lesson; if one dream fails, we start dreaming another; if one desire is frustrated, we immediately jump into another desire – but we never see that desire as such is bound to fail. To desire means to go against the Whole. It is an impossible task; it cannot be done. Not to desire means relaxing with the Whole, going with the Whole, having no desire of one's own.

Truth is known only through a deep inner harmony.

Modern man is living in such a hurry that he cannot sit. He cannot rest; he has become incapable of rest. And once you are incapable of rest, you are incapable of all that is valuable.

Transformation is possible only when the twenty-four hours of your day become a constant meditation, a continuum. So whatever you are doing – eating, walking, working – (…) you are meditating.

Bitterness is a state of ignorance; you have to go beyond it.

Man can exist in three ways – either like an animal, or like a human being, or like a god.

The mind argues but never reaches any conclusion; the heart never argues and knows the conclusion.

Enquire; experience – there is no need to believe. Belief is insisted upon only by people who themselves don't know. They are afraid of enquiry; they are afraid of doubt; they are afraid of questions. They repress all questioning; they condemn all doubt.

Life is very noisy. Outside there is noise; inside there is noise – and both together are enough to drive anybody crazy. (…) The most unique experience in life is that of silence. (…) Without silence, there is no truth, no freedom, no godliness.

You have to live in such a way that when you leave the world, you leave it a little more beautiful than you had found it – that's enough! You have proved that you were religious. You have proved that you were not accidental. You have proved that you have contributed something to existence, that you have not been futile and in vain, that your being here has been of significance. Nothing more is needed.

The really religious person is very earthly; he has to be, otherwise he won't have roots. Hence I teach rootedness to the earth. I teach the earth, because I know that only if our roots grow into the earth will we be able to rise beyond the clouds. The flowers will come, but they will come only through getting deeper and deeper roots. So to me, the mundane and the sacred are not different; they are two aspects of the same coin. Hence singing and dancing and love and creativity and cheerfulness and laughter are not against the sacred. They are an intrinsic part of it; they cannot be separated. (…) The only way for godliness to live is to have roots in the earth – and that's what I mean by cheerfulness, song, celebration.

The lotus comes out of dirty mud. That's how it is – the lowest is connected with the highest; the highest is in the lowest, and the lowest is in the highest. (…) And that's my basic teaching: nothing has to be denied, not even the dirty mud; everything has to be transformed into a lotus.

Man can live either in time or in eternity; both alternatives are open. (…) Time consists only of past and future. The present is a penetration of eternity; the present does not belong to time; it is transcendental. To live in the present is to get out of time; to be here-now, totally here-now, is to be out of the wheel of time.

Who knows whether tomorrow one will be here or not? This is the way one has to live: each moment has to be the last moment. Don't live half-heartedly. You may not be able to live another moment, so put all that you have, risk all that you have in the moment. (…) And when you don't care about the result, you become a lotus. (…) Get deeper and deeper into the here-now; unattached, unclinging, untouched. No past, so that you can live untouched; no future, so that you can live totally. Once that happens, life is bliss – unbounded bliss, infinite bliss, eternal bliss.

Man is born in slavery. We are born as slaves to ourselves. We come into this world imprisoned in chains of desire, held tight by those subtle chains. We have been enslaved like this since birth. It is something given by nature; we don't have to do anything to earn it. Man simply finds he is a slave. Freedom has to be earned, and only someone who struggles and strives for it will find it. For freedom, a price has to be paid. Nothing of value in life is ever free. This slavery which nature gave you is not a misfortune; it would be a misfortune only if we failed to win our freedom. There is nothing wrong in being born a slave, but it is definitely wrong to die as one. Unless you find inner freedom, nothing in life will have any meaning or fulfillment. You may be given life, but if you remain trapped in a prison of desire, if you never know the free sky of awareness, then you will never know life. There is no difference at all between someone imprisoned in desire and a bird imprisoned in a cage. You only enter the world of real life when your awareness is freed from desire. If you want to know truth, become a master of yourself. Victory over truth is not for someone who is defeated by their own self.

You have to be tireless and devoted in your pursuit of truth. You deserve to find truth only if you strive with every breath. The desire for truth should not be just one among all your other desires. Someone who desires truth half-heartedly doesn't really desire it at all. The longing for truth has to be wholehearted and total. When your heart thirsts for truth totally and completely, that very thirst becomes the path. Remember, a burning thirst for truth is itself the path to it. Prayer arises only when your being has an infinite thirst for truth, and your heart beats just to discover the unknown. When you live and breathe only for truth, then in that same silent yearning, you take the first steps toward it. Only love, a love burning with thirst, deserves and has the right to truth.

Self-knowledge is the only knowledge there is. (…) The first longing of knowing is to know the self. If there is darkness there, there is darkness everywhere. And if there is light there, then there is light everywhere.

Man has to become discontent with himself; only then does he move toward godliness. He who becomes content with himself destroys himself.

Fighting with darkness is fighting with an absence; this is insanity.

The truth of life is found through balance and harmony. Those who go to the extreme in any direction wander away from the path.

Life is an art. (…) Only he who lives with a purpose actually lives.

Only those who have no needs are wealthy. Desires make you poor, and a mind besieged by desires becomes a beggar.

There is a wealth outside, but there is also a wealth inside. (…) Once found, it can never be lost. (…) Once you have found the inner wealth, nothing else is left to attain.

Unawareness is the only thing I call a sin.

Even a single ray of truth is enough.

It is futile to try and take darkness away from life, because darkness cannot be taken away. Those who know do not try to get rid of darkness; they simply light a lamp. (…) Fill yourself with the longing to find godliness, and darkness will leave you all by itself. If you keep fighting with darkness, you keep sinking deeper and deeper into it. Make life a positive ascendance, not a negative escape.

If you have known and experienced the truth, you don't have to renounce anything gradually. The very experience of truth becomes renunciation. Where ignorance cannot reach even through a thousand steps, experience reaches in a single step.

There is nothing higher than your own self. He who attains that, attains everything. And he who loses that, whatever else he might have gained is of no value at all.

Ambition is the root of restlessness. Whoever seeks peace has to let go of ambition. Peace begins where ambition ends.

Everything that is valuable in this world – life, love, or beauty – has to be discovered by yourself. There is no way you can get them from anyone else.

To see truth, we need the eyes of peace. He who searches for truth before finding those eyes searches in vain.

Life is a soap bubble. Those who don't see it like that are drowned and destroyed in it. But those who become aware of this truth start searching for a life which is eternal.

I teach only one thing – there is nothing worth following except your own inner being. He who discovers the light there, his whole life becomes full of light. Then, he doesn't need the help of lamps on the outside, nor does he need to follow the smoky trail of other people's torches. Only when someone becomes free of the need for these, does he find the grandeur and the greatness of the soul.

Whatever you get from outside will also be taken away. It is a mistake to think that it is yours. Only what arises from within your own being is yours. And that is the real wealth. Those who look for something else instead, no matter what they might get, ultimately find that they have achieved nothing at all. On the contrary, they have wasted their whole life in a mad rat race.

If you want to find godliness, learn how to die. (…) There is no greater art than learning how to die while you are still alive. This is the only art which I call yoga. A man who lives with an awareness of death comes to know everything that is essential in life.

Maturity has no relation whatsoever to age. I call someone mature who no longer has faith in earthly homes. The others are just children playing with sand castles.

Merging all desires into one gives man power, making him capable of transcending himself and entering the cosmic consciousness.

Those who want to attain everything have to let go of everything. Those who dare to let go of everything become worthy of godliness.

Enter the mystery of life. By mere living, you can exhaust life, but you cannot know it.

To accept life in its entirety and totality is to reach the state of inner harmony. That is what samadhi, or no-mind, is. (…) To experience a 'yes' toward the Whole is the greatest revolution in life, because it erases the ego and introduces us to our true self. (…) Inner harmony is the greatest wealth; only when you find this state in yourself do you find bliss, immortality, the ultimate reality. (…) Inner harmony is the ultimate reality.

In this world, nothing is attainable except your being. Those who search for it find it; those who search for anything else find only failure and anguish. (…) People chasing after desires are always destroyed; (…) chasing after desires is the path to self-destruction. (…) Desires are insatiable. No matter how much you chase after them, they will always remain unfulfilled. Freedom from them comes only when someone turns back to himself and settles in his own being.

A man who has no endurance soon falls apart. But someone who wears the shield of endurance finds that life's constant battering only makes him stronger.

First search within yourself. He who searches there does not have to search anywhere else. And he who doesn't search there keeps searching without ever finding. (…) First dig where you are standing.

Religion is one; truth is one. And those who see it divided should understand that it is their own eyes which are divided.

Man has no greater wealth than his own inner music.

If your eyes are open in the world, it brings wisdom. And when wisdom comes, non-attachment follows.

Desires make man a pauper. It is desires that give birth to bondage and begging, and there is no end to them. The more they are shed, the richer and more independent someone becomes. For the man who desires nothing, his freedom is endless.

Unhappiness is a desire to get something and to become something. (…) as long as you have desires, you will have unhappiness.

He who accepts both unhappiness and happiness with serenity has found his soul, because it is the awareness of being separate from both that brings serenity.

Go deeper and deeper into yourself. (…) Depth is the price which must be paid to reach the heights. (…) Live in the soul, not in the body. (…) whatever you think, speak, do, should not be limited to the body. Think, speak, act on a level higher than the body. Only through that do roots gradually grow into the soul and reach the depth.

Life follows either desires or awareness. Desires promise contentment, but they actually make you more discontent. (…) in the fire of awareness, all discontent evaporates like dewdrops in the sun.

There are very few people who are really ambitious. People who are easily satisfied with the trivial cannot really be called ambitious. Only people who aspire to the Infinite are truly ambitious. (…) real ambition leads you toward godliness. (…) He who keeps remembering the ultimate aim of life, his self, and truth, will not be content with anything else. This discontent is a blessing, because it is only by passing through it that one can find the land of ultimate contentment.

What is life without ideals? It is like a boat without a boatman, or if there is one, he is asleep. (…) Without ideals, the boat of your life will sink; it cannot be helped. (…) No seed can ever become a tree without continuous effort.

Man's mind wants to know everything. But true knowing is found only by those who come to understand the mind. (…) Truth is hidden in the knower itself. (…) Only he who knows the knower itself attains truth. Do not run after the object of knowing. If you want to know, then you must chase the knower.

Observe your dreams and analyze them, because the vision of what you will be, and become tomorrow, is definitely hidden in them.

As you get up in the morning, have a longing that today may bear some fruit toward truth, goodness and beauty. And check in the night whether you are closer to the peaks of life than yesterday.

He who wants to find truth needs to check each and every moment whether what he is doing will be a hindrance on the path to truth. (…) he who wants to touch the peaks of truth will have to take care that he is not weighing himself down with stones instead of taking himself upward.

The path of life is filled with darkness. But remember, someone else's light is of no use in this darkness. Only your own light can be your companion. Those who put their faith in someone else's light just deceive themselves. (…) Only those who look inside themselves find truth. Faith in his own self is the only strength for helpless man.

Find a single ray of truth, and that ray will radically transform you.

Death only frightens someone who believes he is just the body. (…) Whatever can come to an end is not life. Whatever can be erased by death and burned by fire is not life. Those who take such things to be life will never really know life. (…) It is only through knowing the place of deathlessness inside oneself that life is known.

He who lives in such a way that even while living, he is not identified with life, comes to know death, and transcend death.

Your humanity will be as high as your love is deep. (…) A man who has no love in his heart is poor, destitute, helpless and weak.

You will be recognized not by what you have, but by what you are. That alone is your wealth, and that alone is you.

In the name of God, fantasies are taught. But realization of truth does not happen through imagination; it only happens after all imagination has been dropped. He who lives in imagination lives in a dream. He sees what he wants to see, and not what actually is. (…) He who sees through his imagination sees unreality. (…) Wherever imagination ends, meditation begins.

If you long for truth, then let go of your ego. There is no greater lie than 'I'. To drop that is sannyas.

He who does not know himself knows only death. Where there is self-realization, enlightenment, there is life, and only life; there is God, and only God.

Whatsoever a person is inside, is what he finds outside too. The outside is just a projection of the inner.

Even if there is a tiny flame of light inside you, it defeats the darkness of the whole world. And, if there is darkness at your center, even a million suns in the outer sky will not be able to eliminate it.

Love unites; that's why love is the ultimate experience. How can something which divides ever be the ultimate experience?

Don't ever be miserly when choosing an ideal; it should be the highest. Actually, anything less than truth is not an ideal at all. An ideal is the prophecy of what you will ultimately become one day. It is a declaration of the ultimate expression of your self-nature.

Man has to constantly renew himself, each and every moment. He has to give birth to himself. Those who don't know this art of constantly being reborn should be aware that they have died long ago.

Life is an art. And man is both the artist of his life and the instrument of the art. He finds himself to be exactly how he creates himself.

There is no contentment other than godliness; nothing but that can fill your heart.

Let go of dreams. Leaving dreams, not the world, is what sannyas, or surrender, is.

It is not a question of agreement or disagreement. I am not interested in creating beliefs in you, and I am not interested in giving you any kind of ideology. My whole effort here is – as it has always been, of all the Buddhas, since the beginnings of time – to provoke truth in you. I know it is already there; it just needs synchronicity. It just needs something to trigger the process of recognition in you.

All great discoveries are made by amateurs, because a skilled person has too much at stake. (…) Delete the old; be free from patterns – again and again, become an amateur. It needs courage and guts to become an amateur again, but that's how life becomes beautiful.

Wherever you find that society is in conflict with nature, choose nature – whatever the cost.

The thinking up to now has been that the individual exists for the society, that the individual has to follow what society dictates. (…) society has its own interests, which are not necessarily in tune with the interests of the individual. Society has its own investments, and the individual has to be sacrificed.

Remember, the other is never responsible for anything. The problem is something boiling within you.

Feel as grateful to existence as possible. (…) We don't have any claim on existence; so whatever is given is a gift. Grow more and more in gratitude and thankfulness; let it become your very style.

Mahamudra is the last, the ultimate experience. Mahamudra means a total orgasm with the universe, with the Whole. (…) It is melting into the source of being. (…) When you come to the Ultimate, when you come to your deepest core, you suddenly know that you are neither this nor that; you are no one. You are not an ego; you are just a vast emptiness. (…) Mahamudra is an experience of nothingness; simply, you are not. (…) To attain nothingness is to attain all. My whole effort with you is to lead you towards nothingness.

The 'I' is a combination of parts. Remove things, and the 'I' will disappear.

Be loose, so in every situation, you can flow easily, water-like. (…) Sometimes you will have to move south and sometimes north; you will have to change directions – according to the situation you will have to flow. But if you know how to flow, it is enough. The ocean is not very far away if you know how to flow.

I tell you, if you start moving according to moral patterns, and not according to your nature, you will never reach Mahamudra.

If you feel angry, be angry – but perfect awareness has to be retained. Anger should not overpower your consciousness, that's all. Let anger be there; let it happen – but be fully alert to what is happening; watch what is happening. By and by, you will see many things simply disappear; they don't happen anymore, and without making an effort on your part. You never tried to kill them, and they have simply disappeared.

Once emptiness is created by throwing away artificial things, pretensions, masks, then the natural being starts flowing. It needs space. Be empty, loose and natural. Let that be the most fundamental principle in your life.

To have a glimpse of the sky is satori; and to become the sky is samadhi. From satori to samadhi, the whole process is a deep insight into the mind, nothing else.

Mind doesn't exist as an entity; (…) only thoughts exist. (…) the thoughts exist separate from you; they are not one with your nature; they come and go. You remain; you persist. You are like the sky – it never comes; it never goes; it is always there.

Nothing can be killed out of existence; nothing can be destroyed. Tantra says a transformation is possible, but destruction, no! And a transformation comes when you accept your total being. Then suddenly, everything falls in line; then everything takes its own place; then anger is also absorbed; then greed is also absorbed. Then without trying to cut anything out of your being, your whole being rearranges itself. If you accept and say 'yes', a rearrangement happens, and whereas before there was a noisy clamor inside, now a melody, music is born, a harmony comes in. (…) Tantra says everything has to absorbed, everything, without any condition – (…) then it becomes a tremendous force in you. (…) Tantra accepts you in your totality. (…) Drop all discriminations; accept everything as it is. (…) Rest in yourself; come back home.

When in the lowest you can see the highest, when even in hell you can create a heaven, then you have become an artist of life. And tantra wants to make you an artist of life – not deniers, but great yea-sayers.

Attain to tantra silence. (…) The world goes on all around, but it doesn't penetrate you. It is beautiful in itself, but it is separate; a distance exists. That distance is real meditation, the real silence. The world goes on and on, and you are not affected; you remain in the world, but the world is not in you. You pass through the world, untouched, unscarred; you remain virgin. Whatsoever you do, whatsoever happens to you, makes no difference. Your virginity remains perfect; your innocence remains absolute; your purity is not destroyed.

Tantra says, nobody can become enlightened alone. We are parts of each other; we are members of each other; we are a whole. One person may become the peak, may become a very great wave, but it remains connected with the small waves all around. It is not alone; it remains one with the ocean and all the waves there. (…) there is no individual enlightenment. Individuals can step a little ahead, that's all, but they remain joined together with the Whole. (…) We move as one being; (…) everything is going towards enlightenment.

There are two paths. One is the path of the warrior, the soldier; the other is the path of the king, the royal path. Yoga is the first; tantra is the second. (…) yoga and tantra are not opposites, but complementary. Yoga is the primary basic, from where you have to start. (…) A moment comes when one has to transcend yoga and move into tantra; and finally you have to leave both, yoga and tantra. Alone in yourself, deep in rest, one forgets everything. (…) Godliness is ultimate rest.

Tantra is really beautiful. Tantra is the highest understanding, and the greatest principle. If you cannot understand tantra, then yoga is for you. If you can understand tantra, then don't bother about small teachings. When the great vehicle is there, why bother about small boats? (…) In Buddhism, mahayana is the path of tantra, and hinayana is the path of yoga. (…) My attitude is that of tantra; it is not of yoga. I talk of Patanjali also, for those who are not able to comprehend tantra; otherwise my attitude is that of tantra.

The existence gives you life unconditionally; I give you sannyas unconditionally. (…) Tantra is for all. It became a path for the chosen few because not everybody can understand it, but it is not for the chosen few – it is for everybody who is ready to take the jump.

Tantra says, there should not really be a style of life – that is the royal way. You should live moment to moment, enjoying moment to moment; spontaneity should be the way. (…) I am not saying to live in chaos, but don't live through habits. Maybe, just living spontaneously, a way of life evolves in you, but it is not forced; (…) it happens; it is beautiful. (…) If it happens out of love, it is not a habit, not a conditioning, not a cultivated, dead thing. The fewer the habits, the more you will be alive. No habits – you will be perfectly alive. (…) Be flexible.

Yoga teaches you to cultivate the opposite of all that is bad. Fight with the evil and attend to the good. There is violence – kill the violence within you and become non-violent; cultivate non-violence. Always do the opposite and force the opposite to become your pattern. This is the soldier's way; a small teaching.

Tantra is the great teaching, the supreme. What does tantra say? Tantra says, don't create any conflict within yourself. Accept both, and through the acceptance of both, transcendence happens – not victory, but transcendence. In yoga, there are victories; in tantra, there are none – in tantra, there is simply transcendence. In tantra, you simply go beyond violence and non-violence, and you become a third phenomenon: a witness. (…) Tantra says, the division is brought about by your mind, and then you start fighting. First you create the division: you condemn one aspect and you appreciate another. First you create the division; then you create the conflict – and then you are in trouble. And you will be in trouble. A yogi is constantly in trouble, because whatsoever he does, the victory cannot be final – at the most, temporary.

I say to you, anger is not your enemy, greed is not your enemy; neither is compassion your friend, nor non-violence – because friend or foe, you remain with the duality. (…) Says Tilopa, To transcend duality is the kingly view; to conquer distractions is the royal practice. (…) Transcendence of duality is the way of the kings, the royal path. (…) Tantra says, all life is in deep love with you; (…) all life loves you; from everywhere love is flowing. (…) Tantra says that only one thing has to be conquered; that is distractions. (…) Remain a witness. (…) If distraction comes, accept it; don't create a conflict. (…) This is the mind of tantra: that everything is good and holy. Even if there is distraction, somehow it is needed.

Transient is this world, like phantoms and dreams, substance it has none.
Renounce it and forsake your kin;
cut the strings of lust and hatred,
and meditate in woods and mountains.
If without effort
you remain loosely in the natural state, soon Mahamudra you will win,
and attain the non-attainment.

What Tilopa is saying is deep, not superficial. (…) Your mind is the question. (…) many have escaped from their wives and their children and gone to the mountains, (…) but you may sit in the Himalayas and think of the market and your wife and your children and what is happening to them. (…) What Tilopa means is this: (…) if you renounce your mind, suddenly you are in the woods; suddenly you are in the mountains. You may be sitting in the market, but the market has disappeared; you may be sitting in your house, but the house has disappeared. Suddenly you are in the woods and in the mountains. Suddenly you are alone. Only you are there; nobody else. (…) This is an inner phenomenon – to be in the world, but not of the world.

In no-mind also, the mind is negatively present. (…) the emphasis is still on being indifferent to the things and the world of things – but your focus is still on the things: "remain indifferent, unattached!" You are not possessing things, but you have to be alert not to possess; you have to remain detached; you have to move very alertly so you don't possess anything. Make a clear point of it – the emphasis is still on things. Be indifferent to the world! Tilopa says the emphasis should be on your own self, not on things. Rest in yourself; don't even be indifferent to the world – because that indifference is still a very subtle bridge with the world. The focus should not be on the other. Turn your lives completely inwards. Don't bother about the world, not even to be indifferent to it. (…) The world is as if it has simply disappeared. You are self-centered, sitting inside, doing nothing. Your focus has turned, taken a total about-turn. (…) Only you are. You live in your consciousness, and that is your only world. Nothing else exists. This is the state of beyond mind and no-mind. This is the supremost state of understanding; nothing is beyond it. And I would like to tell you never to be satisfied unless you attain this.

Rejection and acceptance are both aspects of the same coin. Says Tilopa, Mahamudra is beyond all acceptance and rejection.

Actions come and go; thoughts come and go; many things happen – but inside, deep down, nothing happens. There, you simply are. Only existence is there. No actions reach; no thoughts reach.

Everything happens by itself. (…) Remaining loose and natural means this: things happen; you are not the doer. (…) A natural man simply sits inside and allows things to happen; he does not 'do'.

The first state is ahankar, ego. The 'I-ness', the 'am-ness', is just a shadow to it; the 'I' is focused. Then the second state, asmita: the 'I' has dropped; now the 'am-ness' has become the total, not a shadow. And then, thirdly, atma: now the 'am-ness' has also dropped. The individuality is no longer there; (…) it has become a vast emptiness. (…) The river has become the ocean; (…) without clouds, only the sky remains. (…) When you come back to the original source, the circle is complete. (…) This is what Tilopa calls mahamudra. (…) It is pure is-ness.

When mind knows, we call it knowledge. When heart knows, we call it love. And when being knows, we call it meditation.

The pseudo-religions depend upon disciplining the mind. The real religion's first work is to put the mind aside.

Self is that which you are born with; ego is that which you accumulate. (…) Individuality is that which you are born with; personality is that which is given by others to you.

Only you can redeem yourself; (…) nobody else can redeem you. (…) You are your own messiah, your own salvation.

We have not to leave any nook and corner of existence and of our being unknown, in darkness. We have to bring light everywhere. And unless that happens, you will be in misery; you will be in anguish. Your beliefs are not going to help; your faith is not going to help.

The society will give you everything if you give your freedom to it. It will give you respectability; it will give you great posts in the hierarchy, in the bureaucracy – but you have to drop one thing: your freedom, your individuality. You have to become a number in the crowd.

I say to you, you are responsible only to yourself. And the miracle of this statement is that if you are responsible to your own being, you will find that many responsibilities are being fulfilled without being considered at all.

Life needs transformation, and transformation is a great work upon oneself. It is not a child's play.

In existence, the smallest blade of grass has the same significance and the same beauty as the greatest star. There is no hierarchy; there is no higher, no lower.

The only way to reach to existence is through your innermost silence.

To feel life and to live life in its totality, and to live it with such passion and intensity that each moment becomes a moment of eternity – that should be the goal of a religion. And that is what I have been teaching you: eat from the tree of knowledge; become a knower. All ignorance and darkness should disappear from you; you should become more conscious, more knowing, more aware. (…) And whenever you live any moment totally, forgetting the past, forgetting the future, that moment gives you the taste of eternity.

What you call religious ideas are not religious, but only superstitions carried down the ages – for so long that just their ancientness has made them appear like truth.

Sexual energy turning downwards serves biology; sexual energy turning upwards serves spirituality. But it is the same energy.

An authentic man does not live by rules, maxims, commandments. That is the way of the pseudo-man. The authentic man simply lives.

To be aware of a dream is the death of the dream.

It is not me who is inspiring you; it is you who become open to me. If you bring your candle close to me and it becomes lit, is it my flame responsible, or is it you coming closer to me, bringing your unlit candle? I don't move a single inch towards your candle, because that I consider a trespass. I open myself completely to you; I make my candle available to you; you can bring your candle, just as the thirsty comes to the well – he drinks, and his thirst is quenched. (…) If a man of enlightenment remains closed – this is impossible – then he will destroy his enlightenment. The enlightened man becomes enlightened only because he opens up, and he goes on opening, and there is no end to his opening. All that he is, is only a presence – that's why I say, I won't do anything; I am just here for you to do something. (…) You are moving towards me; all the credit goes to you. (…) I am not the savior, and I do not ever want to be known by that ugly word 'savior'. I am just a presence; you can save yourself.

You can light your candles from my fire; my fire will not lose anything.

Religion is an individual experience; only an individual can be religious. The cult is an establishment; it is an organization – it has nothing to do with religion at all. It exploits in the name of religion. It pretends to be religious and lives on the past. But past is dead; it is a corpse. (…) As long as the religious man is alive, he is dangerous; people are avoiding him – but once he is dead, it is a great opportunity for business. Then, a new kind of people start gathering around; those are the priests, the popes, the imams, the rabbis – learned, scholarly, argumentative, dogmatic. They create the dogma, the creeds; they create the cults on the dead body of a religious person; (…) they start making a church on the dead body.

Christianity is a cult. (…) Friedrich Nietzsche said that the first and the last Christian died on the cross two thousand years ago; since then, there has been no Christian at all – and he was right.

If Jesus comes back, the pope will be the first person to ask for his crucifixion again, because he will disturb the whole business; that's what he was doing the last time he was here.

The religious man never converts anybody, but his presence transpires; his presence inspires many people to be with him. A religious person has no followers, but only fellow travelers.

With the death of the religious man, the religious phenomenon is gone; it is not there anymore. It is just like a fragrance of a flower – the flower is gone, the fragrance lingers on a little, and then it is lost. Religion cannot have a continuity. It will always be individual – here and there, one individual becomes enlightened, and suddenly people start getting attracted towards him, as if there was a magnetic force.

A philosopher argues; a religious person states. The philosopher argues because he does not know; it is through argument that he wants to come to a conclusion. But the religious person knows – he states; it is a declaration. And he also knows that there is no way to prove it; no argument is going to be supportive to it.

How long I have been waiting, and how long I have been patient, and how I have been condemned for things which have nothing to do with me – but I have remained silent, because it does not bother me. The only thing that I am interested in is, my people should attain to the state from where they cannot fall. I cannot give you anything more precious.

Mind is not your intelligence. (…) Mind can be intellectual, which is a very poor substitute for intelligence. Intellectuality is mechanical. You can become a great scholar, a great professor, a great philosopher, just playing with the words, which are all borrowed, arranging and rearranging thoughts, none of which is your own. The intellect is absolutely bankrupt – it has nothing of its own; all is borrowed. And that's the difference between intelligence and intellect. Intelligence has an eyesight, a capacity to see into things, into problems, of its own. It is your born quality – it cannot be learned; it cannot be nurtured. Everybody is born with intelligence, but the society is in favor of intellect, because the intellectual person is not a real individual. He is phony; he has nothing of his own; he is a beggar. And beggars are not supposed to be emperors, are not supposed to be masters – they are destined to remain slaves.

This is one of the most significant things about all human beings: their love is always for somebody; it is addressed – and the moment you address your love, you destroy it. It is as if you were saying, "I will breathe only for you" – and when you are not there, then how I can breathe? Love should be like breathing; it should be just a quality in you – wherever you are, with whomsoever you are, or even if you are alone, love goes on overflowing from you. It is not a question of being in love with someone; it is a question of being love. People are frustrated in their love experiences, not because something is wrong with love. They narrow down love to such a point that the ocean of love cannot remain there. You cannot contain the ocean; it is not a small stream – love is your whole being; love is your godliness. One should think in terms of whether one is loving or not. The question of the object of love does not arise. With your wife, you love your wife; with your children, you love your children; with your servants, you love your servants; with your friends, you love your friends; with the trees, you love the trees; with the ocean, you love the ocean – you are love.

Whatever happens in the future is not my concern; my concern is with this moment, because the next moment may be your last moment on earth. Remember this, when you go to sleep, say goodbye to life with great gratitude. Never forget (…), go to your sleep with a thankful heart for all that life has given you. (…) It has given you so much that if there is not going to be tomorrow, you have not missed anything. Let there be no tomorrow; you are already fulfilled. And if, by chance, you wake up again tomorrow morning, don't start with any mantra, chanting prayers – these are all irreligious ways. Again, start the day with gratitude, love, joy. (…) Get up with laughter – any leg will do, but go to your bathroom dancing.

The whole genius of the East has been devoted to a single purpose. For thousands of years, they have been trying to look inward – not one or two people, but millions and millions, generation after generation. It has created a certain vibe, which is missing in the West. In the East, meditation is something that you can float in – the whole energy around you is just like a river; it is already going towards the ocean. You don't have to swim; you have just to float. In the West, you have to fight against the current, because for centuries, the extrovert mind has created a totally different kind of energy, outgoing, extrovert – not just different, but absolutely contrary to the East.

There is really and absolutely no place for renunciation in my religion. (…) Become able to make a distinction between the dropping of things and things dropping by themselves. Renunciation is enforced dropping of things. And whenever you do anything with force, nothing really drops away; it simply goes deeper into your unconscious. It becomes more of a problem than it was before. Now it will try to come up in different ways, garbs, masks, and you may not be able even to recognize it – but it is going to assert, and with force. You have given that force by enforcing it deep down into the unconscious. When you force something, you are giving force to it; you are making it stronger, and you are making the enemy hide within you in the darkness, from where you become more vulnerable. (…) Renunciation is repression. (…) Only one thing I want my sannyasins to learn, and that is awareness – and it will take care of all your problems. Without it, whatsoever you do, you will create more and more problems, and they will be farther and farther away from your nature, and it will be very difficult to solve them, because they are phony. Even if you succeed to solve them, you have not solved anything – your perversion will start moving into another direction; it will take another shape. It may not come through the same door; it will find another door – your house has many doors, of which many are not even known to you. But with the light, with the flame of awareness inside you, you know your house for the first time, with all its doors and all its windows. And when the house is lighted, you will do only whatsoever is right. People ask me continuously: what is right? what is wrong? My answer is, that which comes out of awareness is right, and that which comes out of unawareness is wrong. Actions are not right and wrong; it is the source from where they come.

I am against all the religions, because I am for religion. (…) Religions are many; the truth can only be one. Fictions you can create as many as you like; it is your imagination. But the truth is not your imagination; the truth is a revelation. It is already there – you have not to invent it; you have to discover it. (…) Religions are all fictions, created by different people, different societies, different geographies; they have nothing to do with religion as such. (…) Religious experience is a truth, and you need not create any fiction around it. When you discover it, you will not find that it is Christian, or Hindu, or Mohammedan, or Buddhist. It has nothing to do with all these words. The moment you will discover religious truth, all space, all time, become irrelevant, immaterial – it is simply beyond time and space. 5000 years before, 5000 years afterward – it is exactly the same. The universe remains authentically itself.

Truth is real power; truth is the seed of final victory – however long it is going to take, truth is going to win.

There is no insurance, no guarantee for enlightenment – you have to earn it; you have to deserve it. Nobody can give it to you; it is not a commodity.

Nirvana is certainly one of the words which is unpolluted, and there is a reason why it remained unpolluted. The first reason that it remained unpolluted was, its meaning. Unless you have come to a deep understanding of yourself and existence, the word nirvana will create fear in you. It is a negative word; literally it means ‘blowing off the candle’. Gautam Buddha used the word for the ultimate state of consciousness. He could have chosen some positive word; and in India, there were many positive words for it – moksha, freedom, liberation; kaivalya, aloneness, absolute aloneness; brahmanubava, the experience of the Ultimate. But he chose a strange word, which never before has been used in a spiritual context. (…) Buddha says your so-called self is nothing but a flame, and it is being kept burning through your desires. When all desires disappear, the candle has disappeared; now the flame cannot exist anymore – the flame also disappears, disappears into the vast universe, leaving no trace behind it; you cannot find it again. It is there, but it is gone forever from any identity, from any limitation. Hence Buddha chose the word nirvana, rather than realization, because realization still can give you some egoistic superiority that you are a realized person, that you are a liberated being, that you are enlightened, that you are illuminated, that you have found it – but you remain. And Buddha is saying, you are lost; who is going to find it? You disperse – you are only a combination; now each element goes to its original source; the identity of the individual is no more. (…) So Buddha avoided any positive word, knowing human tendency, because each positive word can give you a feeling of ego. No negative word can do that; that's why it remains unpolluted – you cannot pollute something which is not. (…) Thousands of times, Buddha was asked, your word nirvana does not create in us an excitement, a desire to achieve it; the ultimate truth, the self-realization, the realization of God – all those create a desire, a great desire; your word creates no desire. And Buddha said again and again, that is the beauty of the word. All those words which create desire in you are not going to help you, because desire itself is the root cause of your misery; longing for something is your tension. Nirvana makes you absolutely free from tension; there is nothing to desire. On the contrary, you have to prepare yourself to accept a dissolution. In dissolution, you cannot claim the ego; hence the word remains unpolluted. (…) its negativity is the reason; and only a great Master can contribute to humanity something which, even if you want to pollute it, there is no way. Nirvana is going to dissolve you; you cannot do anything to nirvana – it is certainly the purest word. No other word gives that feeling of silence, serenity. The moment you hear the word nirvana, it seems as if time has stopped, as if there is nowhere to go – in this very moment, you can melt, dissolve, disappear, without any trace behind.

I am not a philosopher. The philosopher thinks about things; it is a mind approach. My approach is a no-mind approach. It is just the very opposite of philosophizing. It is not thinking about things, ideas, but seeing with a clarity that comes when you put your mind aside, when you see through silence, not through logic. Seeing is not thinking. (…) Thinking becomes a veil on the eyes; it gives its own color, its own idea to the reality. It does not allow reality to reach you – it imposes itself upon reality; it is a deviation from reality. Hence no philosopher has ever been able to know the truth. All the philosophers have been thinking about the truth – but thinking about the truth is an impossibility. Either you know it, or you don't. If you know it, there is no need to think about it; if you don't, how can you think about it? A philosopher thinking about truth is just like a blind man thinking about light. If you have eyes, you don't think about light; you see it. Seeing is a totally different process; it is a by-product of meditation. Hence, I would not like my way of life to ever be called a philosophy, because it has nothing to do with philosophy. You can call it philosia – love for seeing, being, experiencing; not for knowledge, not for wisdom.

Life is constantly changing; only one thing is unchanging – and that is your witnessing capacity. You can see the anger flash by; you can see the compassion flash by; but the mirror before which they flash remains always unaffected – and that is your transcendence. And that's what I call meditativeness. Meditate on every state of mind, so you can achieve to the witness. Meditation is the way of detaching your witness from moods which go on passing. (…) Sadness comes, joy comes, and everything passes by. What remains always is the witness, and the witness is beyond all polarities. It is the transcendental element in existence.

There is certainly something very similar in very different emotions: the overwhelmingness. It may be love, it may be hate, it may be anger – it can be anything. If it is too much, then it gives you a sense of being overwhelmed by something. Pain and suffering can create the same experience, but overwhelmingness has no value in itself. It simply shows that you are an emotional being; this is the indicator of an emotional personality – it almost becomes drunk with the emotion, blind, and whatever action comes out of it is wrong. Even if it is overwhelming love, the action that will come out of it is not going to be right. Whenever you are overwhelmed by an emotion, you lose all reason, you lose all sensitivity, you lose your heart into it – it becomes almost like a dark cloud in which you are lost. Then, whatever you do is going to be wrong. Love is not to be a part of your emotions. Ordinarily, that's what people think and experience, but anything overwhelming is very fragile, unstable; it comes like a wind, and passes by, and leaves you behind empty, shattered, in sadness and in sorrow. According to those who know man's whole being – his mind, his heart, and his being – love has to be an expression of your being, not an emotion. (…) So first thing to do is to take love out of this crowd of overwhelming emotions. Love is not overwhelming; on the contrary, love is a tremendous insight, clarity, sensitivity, awareness. But that kind of love rarely exists, because very few people ever reach to their being. (…) You have to take out your love from the emotional grip where it is already found by the birth, and you have to find a route to your being. Unless your love becomes part of your being, it is not much different than pain, suffering, sadness… Emotions are not going to help you to become an integrated individuality; they are not going to give you a granite soul. You will remain just like dead wood, moving in the stream, here and there, not knowing why. Emotions blind man exactly as does alcohol.

There are people who are drinking because they have wives; and there are people who are drinking because they don't have any wives. It is a strange world. One does not know on what logical basis it is being run – whether there is any logic at all in life, or whether it is absolutely absurd.

Good, with itself, brings energy. That is the beauty of good, that it is intrinsically powerful. Let it be very clearly understood, that anything that needs power from the outside, you can be certain it is not good. It is something which is intrinsically impotent; it will live on borrowed life.

I am not a teacher. I am not teaching you anything at all. I am not a bridge between you and the Bible, between you and the Gita, between you and the Koran – I am not even a bridge between you and God. No. I am not giving you a teaching, a dogma, a creed. (…) I do not have any teaching. My life is that of a rebel. I don't have a doctrine, a philosophy, a theology to teach you. I only have my own experience of rebellion to share, and infect you with rebelliousness. And when you will be in rebellion, you will not be a copy of me – you will be a unique phenomenon in yourself.

Understand the difference between a teacher and a Master. In the old religions, the teachers are called Masters – but they are simply teachers. They know the teaching; they have been handed down that teaching by other teachers; and they will hand it over to you. But they have not experienced anything; and through their teaching, you are not going to experience anything either. Those are just beautiful words, and they can give you consolation, as if you know. (…) The teacher gives you a teaching; he teaches you a discipline; and then he enforces it: through greed, persuasion, fear, in every possible way, he tries to fit you into a mold – how a Christian should be, how a Buddhist should be. (…) A Master is not a teacher in the first place. A Master shares his being with you, not his philosophy. A Master exposes himself to you, allows you closeness, so that you can see your face in his mirror – a Master is exactly a mirror. He never does anything to the disciple, let me emphasize it.

Let people hear without your saying anything. That's is the only way truth has always been transferred, from one silent heart to another silent heart. In utter silence is the only possibility to meet, to merge, to share.

I am not giving you a teaching; I am giving you myself.

To transform, you don't have to go anywhere; you just have to go on rising higher and higher in your own consciousness.

There is no 'out there'; everything is 'in here'.

Life has no purpose; man has no purpose. Things which are in the category of purpose are mundane. (…) I am enjoying myself; I am enjoying life – more than that is not needed. A purposive life is the life of a slave. (…) Life has immense joy, moment to moment, but it has no tomorrow, no end. It is not going anywhere; it is simply being now and here. (…) The people who ask these questions, the outsiders, are not aware why they are asking it. Their life has no joy, no song, no flowering, no fragrance. They are just dragging their life, so naturally the question arises in their mind, "what is the purpose?". A healthy person never asks, "what is the purpose of health?"; a healthy person never goes to the doctor to enquire, just to find out, "why am I healthy?". Only the sick goes, to enquire the cause of the sickness. Health is natural; sickness is unnatural. To live joyfully is natural; there is no purpose and no end. It is intrinsically valuable.

I am not interested in saving anybody. (…) I am not doing anything; I am simply sharing my own experience. It is not service. I am enjoying it, so it is not service, remember it. (…) I am not carrying anything, no burden of the world, no burden of anybody. And I am doing no serious job. I am just enjoying telling you about my experience. To share it is a joy in itself.

You have to drop becoming; you have to start living. (…) Those who are continuously becoming, in their very effort of becoming this or that, are losing their being, what they are; they are losing time, life, energy. And their becoming is never going to end. It is just like the horizon – just over there, but as you reach, you find the horizon has receded again; the distance remains always the same. The person who is caught in the net of becoming wastes his whole life, dies unfulfilled, in tremendous despair, because he can see that the whole life was there for him to live, but because of his desire to become something, someone, he sacrificed all that was freely available to him. (…) The very process of becoming makes you insane. Drop becoming anybody else. Drop the very idea that you have to be according to some discipline, some scripture, some theology. (…) You are who you are – live it, joyously, without any guilt. Existence wanted you to be what you are; (…) existence makes only individuals. This is the beauty and the glory of existence; this is a blessing, that nobody like you has ever existed, and nobody like you will ever exist again – you are simply unique. Don't waste this uniqueness, running after some goal, some shadow. (…) The very processes of becoming and being are absolutely diametrically opposite to each other. You are where you are trying to reach; there is nowhere to go. You have not to become anybody; this very moment you are what existence wanted you to be. Don't miss it; enjoy it.

No special posture is needed; no special time is needed. Any time is the right time for meditation. (…) Just be relaxed; (…) any expectation will become a tension in your mind. (…) Sitting, standing, walking, any moment where you can feel relaxed, non-tense, just be silent, centered in yourself.

It is a strange situation that humanity has created for itself, in which nobody is at ease, nobody can relax – because the moment you relax, you face yourself. Relaxation will become almost a mirror, and you don't want to see your face.

Thoughts don't have their own life; they are parasites – they live on your identifying with them. When you say, "I am angry", you are pouring life energy into anger, because you are getting identified with anger. But when you say, "I am watching anger flashing on the screen of the mind within me", you are not giving anymore any life, any juice, any energy to anger. You will be able to see that because you are not identified, the anger is absolutely impotent, has no impact on you, does not change you, does not affect you – it is absolutely hollow and dead. It will pass on, and it will leave the sky clean, and the screen of the mind empty. Slowly, slowly, you start getting out of your thoughts; that's the whole process of witnessing and watching. In other words, George Gurdjieff used to call it 'non-identification' – you are no more identifying with your thoughts; you are simply standing aloof and away, indifferent, as if they might be anybody's thoughts. You have broken your connections with them; only then can you watch them.

Where is the limit between taking responsibility for oneself and feeding the ego by fulfilling its tendencies? – There is no limit for taking responsibility for yourself. (…) If you take responsibility for yourself, you cannot be an egoist, because to be an egoist simply means you are fast asleep, and you cannot take any responsibility. Responsibility comes with awareness, alertness. (…) Responsibility is awareness, alertness, consciousness. Ego is just unconsciousness. They cannot coexist. As you grow more conscious, you grow more towards light, and anything belonging to the world of darkness starts disappearing. Ego is nothing but darkness.

Each question leads to an answer, and that answer leads to many questions, and this goes on growing – that's how it has been going on in philosophy, in theology.

In fact, there is no question, which will be an answer to you. The reality is unquestionably here. (…) If the man whom you are asking knows, he's not answering your question – he's destroying it. He is helping you to get rid of it. He is not putting an answer in its place, because then, that will torture you. This is the real work of a Master, a mystic, that sooner or later, the people who are with him start feeling questionless. To be questionless is the answer. There is no answer; (…) it is not that you come upon a hidden answer. No. There is nothing hidden; it is just that all the rubbish has been removed. You feel just a clean and clear consciousness. And this is the answer, not the answer to any question, but the state of no-question is the answer that we are seeking and searching. Every question is a burden; every question is a wound; every question is a tension. And to be questionless, to be completely free of all questions… (…) This is the answer. And it is not relevant to any question in particular; it is only a state of silence.

Nobody before me has addressed the whole world.

Whether you have questions or not, you can still go on asking just the same. Your question need not be yours; but it must be somebody else's, somewhere. And my answer may help somebody, somewhere, sometime. So let us continue the game. I cannot say anything on my own. Unless there is a question, I am silent. Because of the question, it is possible for me to respond. So it does not matter whether the question is yours; what matters is that the question is bound to be somebody's, somewhere. And I am not only answering you; I am answering, through you, the whole humanity – not only the contemporary humanity, but also the humanity that will be coming, when I will not be here to answer. So find out all possible angles and questions, so that anybody, even in the future when I am not here, who has a question, can find an answer in my words. To us, it is a play; to somebody, it may become really a question of life and death.

I am not interested in any goal, in any plan, in any future. I am simply living moment to moment, spontaneously.

Meditation means alertness, awareness, mindfulness. So whatever you are doing, just do it consciously; don't do it mechanically. (…) And there is a difference of quality – if you are doing something consciously, there is grace; if you are doing it mechanically, there is no grace, no beauty. (…) My meditation is not something separate from life; it is something that has to be spread all over life; your whole life has to be colored by it. So whatever you are doing, you do it, but meditation remains – you cannot drop that, even while making love. (…) My meditation is a method of being aware of whatever you are doing, thinking, feeling – on all three layers, you have to become aware. (…) Even when you are going to sleep, remain aware, (…) and a day will come, certainly comes, when the body will have gone to sleep, and your meditation will be still there like a flame inside you, burning, fully aware. This is the moment your meditation is complete; now even in sleep you can meditate. (…) And the man who can meditate in sleep will be able to meditate while dying, because it is the same process. (…) A man who knows meditation never dies; he remains alive, aware. (…) A meditator wants to see death, and seeing it means you are separate from it; you are something eternal. And this experience of eternity, immortality, is authentic religion, not worshipping a God, not a Holy Bible, not a Gita.

Meditation simply means becoming a witness – of everything; on three layers. The first step: becoming a witness of all the activities of your body. Every act of the body has to be witnessed. When you have become very accustomed of witnessing your body, and seeing it as separate, as if somebody else is walking on the road and you are just seeing, sitting on the hill, then the second step: start watching your mind. Look at the thoughts without any evaluation, without any judgment, as if you are not concerned – a traffic passing by, and you are standing by the side of the road. And a miracle happens – as you become more and more clearly a witness, thoughts start disappearing. Ninety percent a witness, ten percent thoughts; hundred percent a witness, zero thoughts. And that is the point when you can move to the third step: now witness your feelings, moods, which are more subtle. And when you become a witness of your moods, that is your heart, the fourth step happens on its own accord; you don't have to take it. (…) When the third step is complete, suddenly one day you find a quantum leap in your consciousness. Everything has disappeared – you are conscious only of consciousness; you are aware only of awareness. And there is absolute silence. But that silence is not empty; it is full of light, and full of bliss, and full of fragrance. And this is what I call enlightenment. Meditation is the way; enlightenment is the success, the achievement.

This is not a debating club. Neither your agreement is needed, nor your disagreement. What is needed is your right hearing. If you hear rightly, it will be decisive. Agreement is just a mind thing, and disagreement also the same. Neither of them is going to help. What is going to help you is experiment, to experience – but that comes only when you have heard me. The greatest difficulty is to hear rightly, to hear silently. If you are thinking to agree or disagree, then you cannot hear me. Your prejudices are there functioning as a curtain; they will distort everything. I don't ask you to agree with me, and I don't ask you to disagree with me. Our whole approach is beyond the mind. You have to learn how to listen, how to be silent, and let your silence decide; let your no-mind decide. And I know what I am saying here, that your no-mind will be in absolute synchronicity with what I am saying to you – I will not use the word agreement; that word belongs to the mind. Agreement and disagreement are two polarities of the mind – positive/negative, theist/atheist, believer/non-believer. I am trying to approach your no-mind, where it is never a question of choice; no-mind functions choicelessly. Once I have approached the no-mind, if you have allowed me, putting your prejudices aside, you won't have to agree or disagree – you will find an immense synchronicity; you will be in absolute harmony with me. And only that harmony can help your evolution. What will you do with agreement? Just a belief will be created; and I am against all beliefs. What will you do with your disagreement? Your prejudice will remain, and your prejudice is your problem. You will remain within the boundaries of your past, your upbringing, your programming by the family, by the school, by the society, by the church… This is not an intellectual discussion club; this is a place for the seekers. (…) Here, we are searching to find a deep harmony. If you can be harmonious with me, you are one with me – it is not agreement; agreement needs two. If you can be harmonious with me, I can transfer much that cannot be said – and only that which cannot be said is going to help your growth.

Your children do not belong to you; they belong to existence – you have been just a passage. They have come through you, but they are not yours. (…) They have to live according to themselves. (…) You are not to interfere in their growth, in their potential; you are not to impose yourself upon them. They are not going to live in the same times; they are not going to face the same problems – they will be part of another world.

All creativity is a deep suffering, unless your creativity does not come out of the mind, but out of meditation. Out of meditation, creativity is sharing the joy, sharing the blissfulness that you have. Mind has no joy; it is really a wound, very painful. (…) When you are possessed by something, you are working almost as a slave; and slavery cannot bring blissfulness. (…) In the East, creators have moved deeper into meditation, and many of them have become mystics. From painting, from music, from dance, they have moved deeper into their own being. The West lives under an affliction – the ignorance of meditation; hence, whatever they do is out of the mind. And mind is not the source of joy; it can only create agony, but never ecstasy.

Baby, my whole work is to confuse you. Unless you are utterly confused, you are not going to drop your knowledgeability. What do you mean when you ask me to "ease off your confusion"? In other words, you want certain, settled knowledgeability. You want to convince yourself that you know it. I cannot commit that crime; you do not know it. So first I have to remove all your knowledge, which is bogus anyway. You have not earned it; you don't deserve it. It has not grown within you; it is all rubbish that you have collected from books, from people… I am going to confuse you more and more.

Once the personality drops, what is left is godliness; that is the true individuality of existence.

You can forget all about God; if you can understand love, that's enough religion – more than that is not needed.

Consciousness is always new; it is your identification with the body which is creating the trouble.

Times of disaster are very revealing. They don't bring anything new into the world; they simply make you aware of the world as it is – they wake you up. If you don't understand this, you can go mad; if you understand this, you can become awakened.

Unless you are completely unidentified with body and mind, you cannot die consciously; and a death which is not conscious is a great opportunity missed. Enlightenment is an absolute necessity; there is no exception. Enlightenment only means that your whole being is conscious; there are no dark corners left inside you. (…) The involvement with body and mind is broken the day you become enlightened. In the ancient scriptures of the Buddhists, enlightenment is called the 'great death' – you have become a witness; you are no longer attached to the body, no clinging; and you have become aware of your immortality. You can die consciously only when you know that you are an immortal; that you belong to eternity, not to time; that deep within you is the beginning of existence, and the end of existence – in fact, there is no beginning, and no end. You have always been here, and you will always be here. The conscious death is one of the miracles of life, because after that, you will not be born again into any form – as a man, as a bird, as a tree; you will remain in the eternal consciousness of the universe, spread all over the ocean. Hence, it has been called the 'great death'.

Whether you know it or not, you cannot be anywhere else than here and now. Wherever you are, it will be here and now. You are given only one moment at a time – and you are wasting that moment planning for the future, worrying about the future. And the future never comes; what comes is always here-now. (…) In your very planning, you are sowing the seeds for disappointment; in your very worrying, you are wasting the present, and slowly, slowly, it becomes your second nature. (…) Only when death comes and takes away all possibility of future from you, you will see that you missed your whole life. You could have lived, but you only planned, you only worried. (…) You cannot go back into the past; you cannot go ahead of time into the future – in your hands is always the present. In fact, the present is the only time you have; and 'now' is your whole life, a 'now' stretched from your birth to your death – it is always now, and here is the only space. You cannot be anywhere else than here-now; just be clear about it – otherwise life goes on slipping through your hands like water. Soon you will have empty hands; and meeting death with empty hands is an utter failure. Meet your death full of joy, silence and serenity.

When the mind becomes inoperable, when the mind closes the shop, that is the moment when the heart starts functioning. (…) Then, there is no question of knowing or not knowing; for the first time, you feel – and feeling is the way of seeing. (…) When you are in your heart, you are in my heart too, because hearts don't know separation; the heart is one. (…) Without heart, you cannot reach to your innermost treasure, the being. (…) Thinking, feeling, being. From thinking, nobody has ever been able to reach being. Nobody can bypass feeling; feeling is the bridge. The first step is from thinking to feeling; and the second step is from feeling to being – in two steps, the whole journey is complete. (…) Through contradictions, I destroy your clinging with the mind and thinking; through silence, I destroy the world of your feeling; and when both these layers are gone, you are as existence wanted you to be, in your purity, in your individuality – you have come home.

In the mind, I am the teacher and you are the student; in the feeling, I am the Master and you are the disciple; in being, I am not, you are not, existence is.

Spiritual richness is the greatest richness that can happen to a man; and it contains all other richnesses. It is not against any other richness; it is simply against all kinds of poverty.

My people are rich. In fact, only the very rich, educated, intelligent, cultured, can understand what I am saying. Beggars cannot come to me; poor people cannot come to me – the gap is too big. They can hear me, but they cannot understand me. So, it is natural – I am the rich man's guru.

My conception of a beautiful, flowering being is not that of austerity; it is of luxury. He will enjoy all that is beautiful in the world – great paintings, great music, poetry; I don't conceive of him standing on his head in the hot sun of Oregon, fasting, slowly destroying himself. To me, all the religions of the world up to now have been sadomasochistic; my religion is, for the first time, life-affirming.

Awareness is a boat, crossing to the other shore; and love a bridge to come back, uniting the banks of the river of life. (…) Your so-called saints have gone only half the way. They may have attained a certain crystallization, a certain awareness, but they are not capable of coming back to the old shore with a shower of love. A saint who is without love is only half-grown; a lover who knows nothing of awareness is also living half-heartedly. (…) I want you to be both together, awareness and love; then only, the circle of life is complete. Zorba is love; Buddha is awareness – and when you are Zorba the Buddha, you have attained the greatest height that is possible in existence. (…) For centuries, man has lived in division – Zorbas think they are against Buddhas, and Buddhas think they are against Zorbas. And because of this idea of antagonism, the Zorba is repressing his Buddha – he is beautiful in his love, in his song, in his dance, but his awareness is nil. The Buddha has repressed his Zorba – his awareness is very clear, but very dry; there is no juice in it; it is like a desert where no roses blossom, where no greenery can be seen. (…) Both the Zorba and the Buddha are deprived – the Zorba lives an unconscious life; the Buddha lives a life without love. The meeting of both will create the whole man; and the whole man is the only holy man.

Love, life, laughter – this is not a philosophy; it is just a consequence of being silent and in tune with existence. Love arises in you; life becomes abundant; laughter for no reason, just because the whole existence is so hilarious.

Passion is hot, but passion is not love. Passion is an effort to use the other, for your own biological and sexual needs. And the man who has renounced passion becomes cold, ice cold, frozen, almost dead. (…) Mind has a way of moving like a pendulum, from one extreme to the other extreme. (…) Love is just in between these two extremes; (…) just between the two is the coolness of love. Love is not cold, and love is not hot; it is a cool breeze, a fresh breeze, an early morning breeze. (…) Love does not use the other; it gives its own heart to the other; it is not a desire to get something, but a longing to share something. One is full of peace and silence and joy, and one wants to share it.

I am an invitation for all those who are seeking, searching, and have a deep longing in their heart to find their home. I am an answer to the question that everybody is, but cannot formulate; a question that is more a quest than a question, more a thirst than a verbal, mental enquiry – a thirst that one feels in every cell and fiber of his being, but has no way to bring to words and ask. I am an answer for that question which you cannot ask, and you cannot expect that it can be answered. When I say, "I am the answer", I don't mean that I can give you the answer – I am just like a well, ready for you to throw your bucket and draw the water for yourself. I cannot reach to you without your efforts; only you can reach to me. It is a strange invitation – it will take you on a long pilgrimage, and it will end only where you already are. (…) You have gone far away from yourself; you have completely forgotten the way back. I am a reminder, a remembrance, of the lost home. (…) I am an invitation, just for those who have a deep longing in their hearts, that they are missing themselves; a deep urge that unless they find themselves, everything else is meaningless. Unless it is your a priori concern, your ultimate concern, such that if it is needed, you are even ready to lose everything for it, but you cannot drop it… There are thousand desires, but as far as longing is concerned, there is only one – to come back home, to find your reality; and in that very finding, you have found all that is of any value: blissfulness, truth, ecstasy. (…) You may have come across many Masters; you may have come close to many Buddhas; but you were too much engaged in trivia – you were not aware of your longing. I am an effort to provoke the dormant in you. The fire is there, but it is burning very low, because you have never taken any care of it. My invitation is to make you aflame. And unless you know a life which is luminous and aflame, all your knowledge is just a deception; you are gathering it to help you forget that the real knowledge is missing. But however great is your accumulation of the other, the objective, the world, it is not going to become a substitute of your self-knowing. With self-knowing, suddenly all darkness disappears, and all separation from existence. I am an invitation to take a courageous jump into the ocean of life. Lose yourself, because that is the only way to find yourself.

As a person, I do not exist; as a person, I do only appear – I exist as a presence. The person has disappeared; there is only a presence, a very living presence that can quench your thirst, that can fulfill your longing.

You are not new; you are as ancient as the whole existence – you have always been here.

It is not only you; almost everybody is running as fast as he can from himself. And the problem is, you cannot run from yourself. Wherever you go, you will be yourself. The fear is, knowing oneself; it is the greatest fear in the world.

You have been condemned; you feel that you are not worthy. That idea has sunk very deep into your unconscious, that you are not deserving, that you are utterly worthless. Naturally, the best way is to get away from yourself. Everybody is doing it in different ways: somebody is running for money; somebody is running for power; somebody is running for respectability; somebody is running for virtue, saintliness. But if you look deep down, they are not running for anything – they are running from; they are running from themselves. (…) the man who knows himself has no inferiority complex. (…) The inferiority complex is the cause of everybody becoming ambitious, because if they don't become somebody in the world, then in their own eyes, they have failed. They want to prove themselves, that "We are here!", that "We have been here!". They want their names to be recorded in history – although they know that even the greatest names in history, by and by, go on slipping from the prominence, become footnotes, move into the appendix, and out of the door.

Don't be afraid of going mad, because this is a madness that happens only to the very rare individuals; it is not something common. It is not insanity; it is going beyond mind – and the mind feels tremendously afraid, because going beyond means going from the known to the unknown. Going beyond means entering into darkness.

I speak so that you can be silent. I do your chattering; you do my silence – a simple bargain! The whole day I am sitting in silence; I also get tired – so twice a day, I take the revenge. You are a whole day chattering – twice a day, take the revenge; be silent.

The difference between will and desire is great, although they appear almost similar. Desire is always of things: more money, more prestige, more respectability, more knowledge, more virtue, a better place in the afterlife – these are all desires. Desires can be millions, because there are millions of things in the world which can become objects of desire. A desire needs always an object. Will is not objective; it does not want something else to be added to it. Will is simply your very life force, which wants to assert itself in its totality, in its wholeness, to bring all the flowers that are hidden in you, to be yourself. The will only knows one thing, and that is you and your golden future.

George Gurdjieff often used to say, "You are in prison". Sometimes, he was even deeper into the reality, (…) and he would say, "You are the prison". That is more true. If you wish to get out of prison, (…) the first thing you must do is realize that you are in prison – or that you are the prison. This is something to be always remembered as one of the first principles for any seeker of truth.

The tendency of the human mind is to deny those things which are ugly, to hide those things which he does not want others to know – to hide in such a way, in such depths of the unconscious, that even he himself becomes unaware of them. This way, he maintains his superficial personality.

Authentic love is beyond the control of your parents, your priests, your politicians (…) – and every society wants you to be in control. (…) The society is afraid of your wild nature; it is afraid of your naturalness – so from the very beginning, it starts cutting your wings. And the most basic thing which is dangerous in you is the possibility of love.

Sitting in front of us, what do you see? Do you find all these jokes while looking at us? – You are right. I have to confess it – looking at you, what else can be found? You are all a joke unto yourself.

For thirty-two years, I have been absolutely nothing. (…) It may be objectively true, as far as science is concerned, that nature abhors a vacuum, but as far as the spiritual, interior world is concerned, it is just the opposite – the deeper you go, the more you find yourself empty. Ultimately, you find yourself just a zero, and that is the point of enlightenment. (…) You have disappeared; there is only light, life, infinity, pure consciousness. (…) It is nothingness, nirvana. In the Western world, no religion has reached to that point – neither Christianity, nor the Judaic tradition, nor Mohammedanism. The other three religions, which are born in India (Hinduism, Jainism and Buddhism), all three have reached to the point where you enter into an inner zero. And that is their ultimate goal – to be nothing. And it is never filled by anything.

To the Western mind or even to the Eastern mind, which is absolutely overtaken by the Western ideology, watching the mind is not an easy job, because so much garbage and so much crap has been forced into the mind that you will go almost crazy just watching it. It is a film which begins, but never ends. You can go on watching day in, day out, year in, year out – and the mind is always ready to supply new images, new dreams. It is because of this that I had to create new devices, before you can enter into silent witnessing meditation, vipassana. (…) I have made devices for you to cathart, to throw out your garbage, rather than wasting time in watching it. (…) These devices are needed just to eliminate the rubbish that modern Western life has created, and to bring you to a state of naturalness, simplicity. And from there, the only way is witnessing, which is called by Buddha vipassana. (…) If you are doing vipassana, any silent meditation, then dynamic meditation becomes absolutely essential, because your mind has been poisoned, and the poison has to be taken away, thrown out, otherwise that craziness remains inside you. And it won't allow you to get into a silent, watching, witnessing meditation. So do some dynamic meditation, do some running, swimming, and when you feel utterly tired, when you feel an intrinsic need to relax, (…) then you can sit silently, and then you can watch your mind. And it is not much; you have thrown out almost ninety-nine percent of it. Maybe here and there, a few pieces are clinging, because they are very old and have become glued to you – just watch them. Watching is a process of ungluing. Once they also disappear, you don't have a mind; you have a vast sky opening, and that opening will bring you to sat chit anand – to truth, to consciousness, to bliss.

The world has always been asleep; only a few individuals in the whole history of man have been awakened. Their names can be counted on the ten fingers, not more than that. And it was natural – man has evolved out of the animals; animals are in a deep sleep; they don't know that they are. That is the meaning of sleep – one is, but one is not aware that one is. And no animal is aware of itself. (…) And only very rarely, once in a while, a Gautam Buddha, a Bodhidharma, a Socrates – once in a while, there has been a man who has the guts to come out of sleep. It needs tremendous courage to come out of sleep, because we have so much invested in sleep. It is just like a man who is dreaming, (…) and you try to wake him up. Man has so much investment in sleep and dream that he will resist in every possible way, not to be awakened. He will get irritated; he will oppose you: "who are you to interfere in my life?", "can't you even tolerate a man who is having a sweet dream?". And even if you force him to be awakened, he is going to fall asleep again – because waking, he is only a beggar; asleep, he becomes an emperor. The investment in psychological sleep is tremendous. (…) Gautam Buddha, Bodhidharma, Chuang Tzu, Plotinus, Heraclitus – they all failed. They did their best; they struggled against the sleep of man – but still, man is asleep, and whatever he is doing proves that he is asleep.

Only beggars dream of being emperors; emperors never dream of being emperors.

Ego exists as a substitute self in sleep. The moment you are awakened, ego has no function; it is useless.

Unless you are suffering from some inferiority complex, you will not be involved in any kind of leadership – political, religious, social; you don't have the base.

You are unnecessarily running here and there. Never think in terms of going somewhere; think in terms of transforming yourself here. 'There' is a cunning strategy of the mind to deceive you. The mind always makes you interested in things far away 'there', so that you can be led away from here, or at least your attention is no more here, it is 'there' – and you will never be 'there'. Going from one here to another 'there', slowly, slowly, you acquire the habit of always looking 'there'; so wherever you reach, that place is no more in your focus – your goal has already shifted somewhere else, 'there'.

Cancel all the tickets that you have booked; there is nowhere to go. Just being here is so blissful. Close your eyes, so that you can see the reality of the here, because 'there' and 'then', they are only fictions; here and now are the only realities. (…) In fact, you are where you are supposed to be. (…) So if you are going somewhere, don't worry, it is just a morning walk. You can return back from any point. You are not going anywhere. My whole teaching is just to be here and let all blissfulness of the existence shower on you.

There is no need to know where you are going; there is no need to know why you are going. All that is needed to be known is that you are going joyously, because if you are going joyously, you cannot go wrong. If you are going dancing, singing, celebrating, the direction does not matter, the road does not matter, the goal does not matter – every moment becomes paradise.

Let me repeat it again to you, there is no goal in existence. There are only moments, and the art is to squeeze the moment, its whole juice, here-now. (…) Life is the way; life has no goal. That's why I love the word Tao. Tao means 'the way' – with no goals, simply the way.

I want my people to understand it clearly: neither your clothes, nor your outer disciplines, nor anything that has been given to you by tradition, and you have accepted it just on belief, is going to help. The only thing that can create a revolution in you is going beyond the mind into the world of consciousness. Except that, nothing is religious. (…) Except the process of meditation, everything is non-essential. I don't want my people to be lost in the non-essential. (…) If you wear orange or red clothes, if you love the mala with my picture on it, if you change your name – it is all perfectly good, but don't start believing that you have become a sannyasin. Sannyas is not so cheap. (…) You can really be a sannyasin only when you are moving inward.

Meditation as such needs no technique at all. But techniques are needed to remove the obstacles in the way of meditation. (…) So the work of the technique is just to prepare the ground. The techniques in themselves are not meditation. If you stop at the technique, you have missed the point. (…) Unless the ground is well prepared and all the weeds and wild roots are taken away from the ground, you cannot grow roses and other beautiful flowers. The roses are not concerned with the wild roots, but the removal of the weeds is absolutely necessary for the ground to be in a right situation where roses can blossom. (…) Techniques are needed to remove the mind from the way, to create a space in which mind becomes quiet, silent, almost absent. Then meditation happens on its own accord. It is not a question of technique; you don't have to do anything. Meditation is something natural, something that is already hidden inside you, and is trying to find its way to reach to the open sky. But mind is surrounding it from all sides – the techniques are needed, and immediately the whole sky is available to you, with all its stars, with all its beauty. (…) Life is a complicated affair; there is good news, and there is bad news. The good news is that for meditation, there is no need of any technique. But the bad news is that, without any technique, you are not going to get it.

I am against all those escapists who escape from the world and become twenty-four-hour meditators. I am against them; I am utterly against them. One hour of meditation is enough. Meditation is such a powerful thing that one hour of twenty-four hours is enough. It will illuminate your whole life. And the test is in life, whether your meditation is succeeding or not. Are you still greedy, as you used to be before? Do you still get angry, as you used to get before? Can people still manage to push your buttons as easily as before? In the marketplace is the test of all your meditations. Now, if you just do meditations and nothing else, that is preparing and preparing, and never going to the examination. That's not right. The test has to be there every day – one hour meditation, twenty-three hours test, and you will grow strong.

Chopping wood, drawing water from the well – you can do all small and big things. Only one thing is not allowed, and that is: your centering should not be lost. That awareness, that watchfulness, should remain absolutely unclouded, undisturbed.

The whole life is yours – love it, live it, to the fullest. That's the only way to get ready for death. Then you can live death too to its fullest, and it is the most beautiful experience. There is nothing comparable to the death experience in life, except deep meditation – so those who know meditation, they know something of death. That's the only way to know before dying. (…) Meditation is an experience of death in life. (…) In meditation, you move into the same space as death, because in meditation, you are no more your physiology, no more your biology, no more your chemistry, no more your psychology – all those are left far away. All those things which are taken away in death, we take away by our own hands in meditation. Then you come to your innermost center, where there is only pure awareness. That pure awareness will be with you when you will die.

I tell my sannyasins that things can be dropped right where you are. (…) Just look with awareness; slowly, slowly become conscious. (…) And, in the light of your awareness, whatever is seen as worthless, you won't be able to keep enclosed in your fist – your embrace will be released.

The inner truth cannot be made an object of common knowledge. Each one has to go within himself. Each time, it is a new discovery. It does not matter how many people have attained to awakening, realization; the moment you will attain it, you will be absolutely fresh, because it cannot be borrowed. The search basically consists in knowing your interiority. You have an outside, and no outside can exist without an inside. The very existence of the outside is a proof of an inner world. The inner world consists of three layers: thoughts are the most superficial; feelings are deeper; and then is the being, which is your godliness. To know one's own godliness, to know one's own eternity, is the basic search of religion. All your senses lead you outside; (…) senses are the doors to go out. And always remember, the door that takes you out can also take you in. It is the same door from which you go out of your home and from which you come back in – just the direction changes. To go out, you need open eyes; to come in, you need closed eyes, all your senses silent.

Men ordinarily live in loneliness. To avoid loneliness, he creates all kinds of relationships, friendships, organizations, political parties, religions, and what not. But the basic thing is that he is very much afraid of being lonely. Loneliness is a black hole, a darkness, a frightening negative state, almost like death. (…) To avoid it, you run out and fall into anybody, just to feel that you are not lonely, just to forget your loneliness. (…) Nothing hurts more than loneliness. But the trouble is that any relationship that arises out of the fear of being lonely is not going to be a blissful experience. (…) You both call it love, but you are deceiving yourselves; it is simply fear, and fear can never be the source of love. Only those love who are absolutely fearless; only those love who are able to be alone, joyously, whose need for the other has disappeared, who are sufficient unto themselves. The common psychology of man is of loneliness; he does everything to avoid it. But whatever you do, it is always there, just like your shadow. You may not look at it, but you know it is there. (…) You cannot escape from your shadow; in the same way, you cannot escape from your loneliness, just by creating friendships, relationships, marriages, organizations – religious, political, social. They give you a little relief, but they don't transform anything. The day you decide that all these efforts are failures, your loneliness remains untouched by all your efforts, that is a great moment of understanding. Then, only one thing remains: to see whether loneliness is such a thing that you should be afraid of it, or if it is just your nature. Then, rather than running out and away, you close your eyes and go in. And suddenly, the night is over, and a new dawn… – the loneliness transforms into aloneness. Aloneness is your nature – you were born alone, you will die alone, and you are living alone, without understanding it, without being fully aware of it. You misunderstand aloneness as loneliness; it is simply a misunderstanding. You are sufficient unto yourself. The transition period is a little painful and difficult, because of old habits, but it won't be long. And the way to make it short, bearable, is to enjoy your aloneness more and more. (…) Old habits will start falling like dead leaves are falling from trees. They also cling a little while, but they have to fall. Just you have to make your aloneness more and more strong. (…) You have to pour your whole energy into the joy of being alone. You only have a certain amount of energy; either you can dance or you can be sad. If you dance half-heartedly, then you are saving energy for sadness. That's why I insist: live every moment totally and so intensely that no energy is left to be invested in sadness, in misery, in anger – simply there is no energy.

A whole childhood went in close love affair with the river, and it is a beautiful river. (…) Sitting by its bench, (…) slowly, slowly, the whole existence became a river to me. It lost its solidity; it became liquid. Whenever you are in love with flowing things, you have a different vision of life.

There is no home; there are only houses. We try to make homes out of houses. (…) A sannyasin recognizes the fact that the search is not for a home; the search is for who is this being.

All this so-called esoteric knowledge about chakras, energy field, kundalini, astral bodies, is dangerous as knowledge. As an experience, it is a totally different thing. Don't acquire it as knowledge. If it is needed for your spiritual growth, it will come to you in its right time, and then it will be an experience.

This always happens: when I say something, I create two groups of people around me. One group will be exoteric. They will organize; they will do many things concerned with society, with the world that is without; they will help preserve whatsoever I am saying. The other group will be more concerned with the inner world. Sooner or later, the two groups are bound to come into conflict with one another, because the emphasis is different. The inner group, the esoteric mind, is concerned with something quite different from the exoteric group. And ultimately, the outer group will win, because they can work as a group. The esoteric ones cannot work as a group; they go on working as individuals. When one individual is lost, something is lost forever. This happens with every teacher. Ultimately, the outer group becomes more and more influential; it becomes an establishment. The first thing an establishment has to do is to kill its own esoteric part, because the esoteric group is always a disturbance. Because of heresy, Christianity has been destroying all that is esoteric. And now, the pope is at the opposite extreme to Jesus; this is the ultimate schism between the exoteric and the esoteric. The pope is more like the priests who crucified Jesus than like Jesus himself. If Jesus comes again, he will be crucified in Rome this time, by the Vatican. The Vatican is the exoteric, organizational part, the establishment. These are intrinsic problems – they happen, and you cannot do anything about it.

There is no other life than this ordinary life. Because people are incapable of living this ordinary life, they invent esoteric things. These are people who are incapable of living – they distract their minds and beings. All esoteric teachings and all hidden teachings and all those so-called mysteries are mumbo-jumbo. The mystery is here (…) – in you, in me. (…) Avoid all that nonsense literature which goes on in the name of esotericism; it is pathological. (…) Theosophy and anthroposophy and masonic lodges – and all kinds of nonsense goes on. Avoid it; it is against life. This is the only life there is, the only dance there is. The real enlightened people have known this life's extraordinariness. (…) The ordinary life becomes extraordinary if you live it totally, fully. Avoid esotericism. They are dangerous things; you can become hooked into them. And then, you will be just in mind-trips, imagination. (…) In these so-called esoteric trips, wherever you are going, it is your dream. Masters will appear, and automatic handwriting will appear, and messages will be received from the beyond. And all sheer nonsense.

Mercy can be of two kinds. It can be very egoistic; then it appears as mercy, but is not. Unless mercy is absolutely egoless, it is not authentic. And the difference is very subtle – from the outside, there is no difference at all; but one can feel the difference inside. If mercy arises out of your bliss, then it can never be an ego trip. If you share your bliss, you feel thankful to the person who receives it; you feel humble. Bliss never makes anybody egoistic; on the contrary, dropping the ego is the basic requirement of being blissful. Unless one drops the ego, one is never blissful. Bliss happens within you like a flame of light, and mercy is the radiation of it. When your bliss starts reaching others, it is mercy, compassion. But the false and the pseudo-coin which is cheaper to attain is also there. And that's what so many religious people go on doing. (…) The person who is merciful towards the poor, the starving, the ill, and is using it as a means of attaining heaven, of attaining God's grace, is exploiting these people. In fact, this type of man will never like the world without the poor, without the ill, without the starved, because where will he show his mercy then? And how will he attain to paradise? – his whole ladder will be lost. So these people who go on serving the poor and the ill are the people who would like the poor and the ill to remain forever. They would not like the world to be really happy, because the happy person does not need your mercy. They would not like the pain to disappear totally, the suffering to be gone forever – then who will need you? Then you feel absolutely futile. That was the meaning of your life; you were dependent on those people.

Just recently, Mother Theresa of Calcutta got the Nobel prize; everybody is praising her – and the whole thing is stupid. How has she contributed to world peace, I am unable to understand. By serving the poor of Calcutta, the beggars and the widows and the orphans, how has she served world peace, the cause of peace? By serving them, by helping them continue to live, the world war is not postponed. And by serving them, the poverty is not destroyed either. In fact, these are the people who function as agents of the status quo, of the vested interest. They go on consoling the poor; that is the only way to avoid the revolution. Console the poor, serve the poor, give them little bits, and they remain as they are. Tell them, 'you are suffering because of your past karmas'; tell them, 'you are suffering because God is testing you'; tell them, 'you are suffering because God is purifying you'. These are beautiful strategies to keep the poor poor and to keep the rich rich. It is not an accident that Krishnamurti has not got the Nobel prize – and he will never get it; yet he is one of the men who have served the cause of world peace most. Gurdjieff never got the Nobel prize; he would have never got it. Ramana Maharshi never got the Nobel prize. There is no possibility for such men ever to get Nobel prizes, because they don't serve the vested interest. They really create great vibrations for peace, love, joy; they create great light, great understanding in the world. But the vested interest – the politicians, the rich, the priests – are not interested in these people; they would like them to not exist at all. They are interested in people who console the poor, because that is an anti-revolutionary act, consoling the poor. The consoled poor can never rebel. And the mercy that is shown by such people is a strategy for them too: by serving the poor, they are trying to reach heaven. I don't teach service; I simply teach bliss. Be blissful, and out of that, much is going to happen. But that will be natural; so there is no need to talk about it at all – it will be a by-product. Service, compassion, love – these are by-products of being blissful.

The ego cannot be sacrificed, because the ego exists not. The ego is just all idea; it has no substance in it. It is not something; it is pure nothing – you give it reality by believing in it. You can withdraw belief, and the reality disappears, evaporates. (…) There is no need to be against the ego. Dive deep into it; go into it. Going into it means bringing awareness into your house, bringing light into darkness. Be alert, watchful. Watch the ways of the ego, how it functions, how it manages at all. And you will be surprised – the deeper you go into it, the less it is found. And when you have penetrated to the very core of your being, you will find something totally different which is not ego, but egolessness. It is self, supreme self – it is God. You have disappeared as a separate entity; you are no more an island – now you are part of the Whole. In that experience of being one with the Whole, the ego is sacrificed, but that is only a way of speaking, a metaphor – don't take it literally. Try to understand the ego. Analyze it, dissect it, watch it, observe it, from as many angles as possible. And don't be in a hurry to sacrifice it; otherwise the greatest egoist is born: the person who thinks he is humble, the person who thinks that he has no ego. That's again the same story played at a more subtle level; that's what the religious people have been doing down the ages. (…) The ego of the sinner is more easily dropped than the ego of the saint. And the saint can always manage to pretend. And his ego is so polished, so decorated, so sanctified by tradition, by convention, by the crowd, that he may almost forget about it. (…) The real search is not to make your ego humble; that is your ego standing upside-down – avoid it. Rather, follow a totally different path: meditate on the phenomenon of the ego; enquire what it is. And as the enquiry deepens, the ego disappears. Enquiring into the ego, you will come to the self. (…) But no sacrifice – the non-substantial cannot be sacrificed; it can only be understood. And in the very understanding is the disappearing. And this disappearance is beautiful, because it does not leave any traces behind, no scars, no wounds.

Grace can happen only in a non-doing, absolute non-doing, because grace is not something you can do anything about. You can simply be receptive, open, that's all. Nothing positively can be done about it. It is already flowing; the whole existence is filled with grace; grace is the very existence itself. You are closed, and the more you do something, the more you will become closed – because every effort gives you a more egocentric feeling; whatsoever you do creates more ego. (…) Whatsoever you do becomes food for the ego; (…) whatsoever you do leads you into the future – then you are not here and now. And these both are the barriers. (…) The more you do, the more it will be impossible for you to receive grace. The whole effort of the Master is to teach you non-doing, non-action. Or, in other words, the whole effort of the Master is to take you back – to teach you how to die, how to throw the ego completely, how to be in a state of nothingness, a state of non-being. Buddha called that state anatta, the state of no-self: you are, but you are not a self.

Mind lives in the duality of the positive and the negative. It lives like a pendulum, moving from yes to no, from no to yes. It cannot live in the absolute yes; it cannot live in the absolute no. (…) Anything absolute is a death for the mind. There are two possibilities of killing the mind, of transcending the mind: either absolute yes, or absolute no. The Upanishads have used the first possibility, absolute yes; and Buddha has used the second possibility, absolute no. But look deeply and you will find they are not different; they are bridged by the same phenomenon – absoluteness. Anything absolute becomes the grave of the mind; the mind needs duality to exist. (…) You are your mind; in the absolute, you start disappearing. Of course, there is something more in you than your mind, but you are not aware of it. And as you start disappearing, fear arises, confusion arises; one is scared, one wants to cling to whatsoever is available to cling to. It is because of this miracle of the absolute that God has been synonymous with the absolute. God means the absolute. Either say absolute yes, and your mind disappears; or say absolute no, and your mind disappears.

Why has Buddha chosen to say absolute no, why not absolute yes? For a certain reason: with the absolute yes, there is one danger. The danger is that you may not understand the absoluteness of the yes; you may still go on thinking that it is your old positivity. With the absolute no, that danger is not possible. With the absolute no, death seems so clear that you cannot miss it – hence the confusion. This confusion is good. Don't try to escape from it; go deeper into it. Soon it will become a chaos – not just confusion, but chaos. When all that you have known about yourself is shattered, when all that you have believed in has evaporated, when all that you were identified with has slipped out of your hands – the very earth beneath you is no longer available, you are falling and falling into a bottomless abyss – that is chaos. And only out of that chaos are stars born. Out of chaos is creativity. (…) Hence, except with Gautam the Buddha, every other religion has used the positive. It is only Buddha who has used the negative. But you must know that more people have become enlightened through Gautam Buddha's approach than through all the other approaches put together, for the simple reason that with the absolute negative, there is no safety, no shelter at all for the mind, for the ego. It is total death. (…) Crucifixion is the way of resurrection; death is the way of being reborn.

There is no question of accepting, because every acceptance means that deep down, there is rejection. Otherwise, why the question of acceptance? Why in the first place do you think of accepting? You must be rejecting somewhere. I don't accept life because I don't reject it in the first place. It is simply there, neither rejected nor accepted. It is so. Buddha calls it tathata, suchness. (…) If you try to accept, that simply means a kind of repression. First you must have rejected; you must be still rejecting; and you are covering up your rejection with acceptance. Deep down, you are angry, and on the surface, you are laughing and trying to hide the fact not only from others, but from yourself too. (…) True acceptance is not an acceptance at all. (…) True acceptance is absence of rejection and acceptance. One simply knows that this is how things are – the suchness of things, tathata. Hence one of the beautiful names of Buddha – Tathagata, (…) one who lives in suchness, neither rejecting nor accepting, simply seeing whatsoever is the case, only reflecting.

Creativity comes only out of total negation; it comes out of absolute emptiness. The whole world has come out of nothingness, and the whole world will one day move into nothingness. (…) Creativity is nothing that you have to do; you are the barrier. It is because of you that creativity is prevented. Make way; don't stand in between. Move yourself away; let your void, your inner void, face existence; (…) and out of that reflection, creativity will be born. But I am not talking about ordinary creativity: that you compose a poem, or you paint a small painting, or you sculpt. These things can be done without being creative; all that you need to know is the art, the technique of doing them. Out of one hundred so-called creators, it is very rare to find even one or two who are real creators; ninety-nine percent are only composers, not creators. They know how to put words together, they are clever, they are cunning, they are crafty – but what they are doing is not creativity. They are putting things together, maybe in new arrangements, but there is nothing original. The original only comes from the egoless state; it always comes when you are absent. When you are absent, consciousness is present, God is present. And then, something miraculous starts happening, not by you, but through you. It gives you a great feeling of humbleness and gratitude.

Unless one is ready to dissolve one's ego, the fish is going to remain thirsty. Dissolve the ego, and all thirst disappears, because the moment you dissolve the ego, the wall between you and the ocean disappears – then, you are part of the ocean. How can you be thirsty then?

Life is not a celebration, and that's what it should be. Your steps don't have the quality of dance. Your heart is not throbbing with ecstasy. You are not pulsating and vibrating with joy, with love. You are not overflowing with energy. What kind of life is this? Just going round and round in circles, dead, dull, stupid routines. (…) People are dragging; life seems to be a burden, a great burden, somehow to be tolerated. (…) You go on waiting and waiting and waiting, just hoping that tomorrow something will happen… and the tomorrow never comes, and nothing ever happens – all that ever comes is death. (…) life is so miserable that even death feels like a relief. Life is so empty that it is rare to find a human being who has not contemplated, some time or other, committing suicide. Life is so empty that we go on keeping ourselves occupied, with any rubbish, just to remain occupied, so that we don't see the emptiness, so that we don't see the inner vacuum, the inner darkness. (…) Just watch, and you will see that man is living in great anguish, anxiety. (…) There is no question of believing in hell – man is already in hell. You are living in it.

Man is not what he is; he can be more. Man is not finished; man is a growth. Man is the only growing being in existence, the only evolving being in existence. (…) That is the glory of man, if we understand it. If we don't understand it, this becomes the agony. (…) Man is a potential, and much has to become actual in him. And unless you start transforming your potential into the actual, your life will remain empty. (…) If the seed remains a seed, it will remain in anguish; it will not feel the joy of fulfillment, the contentment that comes when the seed has become the tree and the tree has bloomed. Man is a seed, the seed of God. When man blooms, God becomes manifest. (…) Nature has brought man to a certain point, and from that point, man has been made responsible for his growth. Nature cannot do any more; whatsoever was possible has already happened – it has brought you to the threshold. You have to take the further journey now; you have to become a pilgrim. If you don't become a pilgrim, if your life does not take the quality of adventure, of search, of enquiry, you will remain empty, and you will remain thirsty, and you will remain hungry. You will remain spiritually starved.

There is no goal. There is a beginning of the pilgrimage, but no end. To know God is to know that life is an eternal pilgrimage. That is the meaning when we say, God is infinite. You can go on attaining, but you can never say that now the end has come. This is the beauty of existence – it goes on giving you more and more opportunities. When you have climbed one peak, another peak starts giving you challenges.

Zen has no belief-system about anything, and that includes sex too – Zen says nothing about it. And that should be the ultimate thing. (…) Ordinary society is against sex; tantra comes to redress the balance, to help humanity, to give sex back to humanity. And when sex has been given back, then arises Zen. Zen has no attitude. Zen is pure health.

The mystic is really in trouble. (…) He has to find some vehicle to express that which is inexpressible. (…) He knows the truth, but he does not know any corresponding word for it, so he is compelled to use words which have been used by others.

Godel is right, that whatever man makes, whatever doctrine he propounds, whatever philosophy he brings out, is going to be, in one way or other, paradoxical. Something underneath will remain contradictory.

People want definite answers to believe in: this way or that. (…) People want clarity, because they are so confused.

A really enlightened person is just nobody. He has no name, no form, no superiority, no inferiority. In fact, he has disappeared. And this is the paradox: By disappearing, one finds oneself; by not being anything, one becomes everything; by becoming absent totally, one becomes, for the first time, a presence. But all this happens because one becomes a zero. Enlightenment is the experience of being a zero.

The only problem is the ego, but it creates thousands of other problems; it is the root cause. And I am not interested in pruning the leaves and the branches. Cut the root, because cutting leaves and branches is a futile effort; they will grow again. And all the religions have become too much concerned with the leaves and the branches; and by cutting them, nothing is going to happen.

By going beyond the ego, one goes beyond time and space, and one enters into the Ultimate. Less than that cannot satisfy; less than that is not worthwhile. This is the goal for the sannyasin – the ultimate realization of God, or truth, or nirvana.

Nobody can become enlightened without becoming rebellious beforehand, because he will have to fight against the conditionings of the society. He will have to rebel against the beliefs of the society. He will have to rebel against his own ego, against his own ambitions. Rebellion is certainly a necessary part. It cuts you from the ordinary social world and makes you an individual. Rebellion is the fire, passing through which one gains freedom, individuality, integrity. And only after that can one relax and be oneself, be simple, be innocent. It is a new birth. An then, enlightenment is not far away; hindrances removed, enlightenment is always there. It is your birthright.

A mystery school, a spiritual path, is not the path of a soldier. Here, orders are prohibited; here, only intelligence is appealed to. The decision is always on your part. It is only the phony masters who give you orders, because they cannot satisfy your intelligence. An authentic Master is perfectly capable to satisfy your intelligence, and then leave it up to you.

People have been told such nonsense for centuries – as if spirituality is a kind of geography, so that maps are given to you, guidelines are provided to you: Follow the right guidelines, and you will reach the goal. Alas, things are not so cheap. There are no maps in existence, no solid guidelines either. Because each individual is so unique that what may be a guideline for one may prove a distraction for another; what may be medicine to one may prove poison to another. (…) No general guidelines can be provided. The Master simply goes on dropping all kinds of hints. (…) And you have to choose whatever suits you, and you have to experiment to see whether it is workable for you or not. (…) With a Master, life becomes a scientific experiment. It is no more a question of heaven and hell, punishment and reward – it is a question of exploration. And each individual has to explore in his own way; there are no golden rules. (…) In the spiritual exploration, you have to walk and create your path by your walking; there is no ready-made path so that you have simply to walk on it. (…) every river reaches to the ocean with great freedom, finding its own path. The Master can only give you certain hints about how to find your path. (…) But he does not give you guidelines. In the very nature of things, it is not possible. The moment you have found a Master, you have found the path. And who is the Master? (…) A Master is one who fulfills the longing of your heart. (…) You simply find that your heart feels at home, at ease, that your heart has found a treasure, feels a tremendous benediction. And as you come closer to the Master, in your love, in your trust, your peace deepens; your silence becomes not something dead, the silence of a graveyard, but something singing and dancing, alive. The more you are moving towards your life's fulfillment, the more your life becomes a rejoicing, a deep joy for no reason at all, a blissfulness so deep and so abundant that you can start sharing it with others. In fact, you have to share it with others, because it is overflowing – you cannot contain it. (…) That's the function of the Master: to make you more intelligent and more courageous, more loving, more understanding. But there are no orders, no disciplines, no guidelines. Orders, disciplines, guidelines – these have been used by people who wanted to dominate you, by people who wanted to dictate their terms, to enforce their ideas on other people's lives. I call such people great criminals. To impose your idea on somebody, to give some ideal, some mold, is violence, sheer violence. You are being destructive, and a Master cannot do that. A Master is always creative.

Each person has to be unique in his own way. Somebody dies for the Master; somebody lives for the Master – and you cannot say who is greater. No comparison is right. Both are themselves. (…) when time and space both are immaterial, then you have really touched the feet of the Master. Then, whatsoever transpires in you – to live for the message or to die, whatever comes naturally and spontaneously – let it happen.

Mohammed has given a discipline to the Mohammedans – it may have been good for himself, but it cannot be good for anybody else. Buddha has given the discipline to millions of Buddhists – it may have been good for himself, but it cannot be good for anybody else. A discipline is an individual phenomenon. Whenever you borrow it, you start living according to set principles, dead principles, and life is never dead – life is constantly changing, each moment; life is a flux.

Laughter is good medicine, but you should take only as much as you can absorb – otherwise it could kill you; it will drive you mad.

Life is everything altogether, and we allow our people to live in all dimensions. (…) We believe in life in its totality. (…) We believe that everything in life can be enjoyed; just you need a little more awareness, more consciousness, of what is happening. You are not your mind; you are not your body. There is a witness somewhere inside of you who can go on looking at the mind, at the emotions, at the physiological relations. That witness is you. And that witness is capable of enjoying everything, once you get centered there. My whole method of meditation is to get centered at your witness, and then to let life and its games go on – enjoy, laugh, cry; but whatever you do, do it totally, with no shame, with no guilt.

I cannot conceive a man who has any guts not being controversial. The people who are not controversial are simply hypocrites – just goody-goody, nice to everybody, just changing their masks the whole day, to fit with everybody.

If people are innocent, then there is no need for dynamic meditation. But if people are repressed, psychologically are carrying a lot of burden, then they need catharsis. So dynamic meditation is just to help them clean the place. (…) If people directly try meditation, they will fail, reaching nowhere – because they are so full of garbage that first it has to be emptied out. (…) All the techniques that I have developed are for the contemporary man, and doing these techniques, he will be clean, unburdened, simple, innocent. (…) So first thing is something cathartic, which is absolutely necessary for the contemporary man. And then, the silent, witnessing methods can be used.

Dynamic meditation will take all tension out of your mind and body, and then, relaxation is very easy. You don't know how much you are holding in, and that is the cause of tension.

This is exactly the purpose of dynamic meditation: to exhaust your energy, so the mind has no more supply of energy to create past, and dreams, and imagination.

Whatever comes in your dreams, or in your waking hours, from the unconscious, slowly, slowly, give it a reality, so it goes out. (…) There is no need to kill anybody – you can kill a statue; you can kill a photograph; you can burn a photograph – and you can feel at ease. (…) Don't repress it; don't think that this is bad and I should not show it to anybody – it will become a wound, and finally a cancer. Release it – in your private room, you can release it in any way you want.

Dynamic meditation was basically devised to help the unconscious unburden itself. (…) And once the unconscious is completely clean, and there is no energy wasted in repressing it, the same energy starts moving upwards – because, remember that energy cannot remain static; it has to move.

You cannot predict me. I do not even know myself what I am going to do tomorrow morning. I am simply as open as the existence, and as indefinable as the existence itself. (…) There are people who love me; there are people who would like to kill me – they have chosen different parts of me; they have focused their eyes according to their prejudices. But I am not concerned in any way about the opinion of others.

Start like Adam and Eve. (…) Stand on your own, as if no priest has been there before; as if no religion has been there before – uncorrupted, unspoiled, clean. (…) Forget about the past – you are the first man. Start living as if you don't know how to live; nobody is there to teach you – no guidelines exist; no books exist which say how to do this, how to do that.

A perfectly fulfilled man is one who explored both the outer and the inner, and at the moment of death can have a smile on his face that he lived totally, that he's happy that he lived totally, that he burned his life candle from both ends together. If you can burn your candle from both ends together, why be miserly and just burn one side? (…) Enjoy it, because every joy is not simply enjoyment; every joy is growth, and brings you closer to blissfulness, to ecstasy. And unless you have attained to a state of ecstasy, where you can say that I have arrived, I am fulfilled, that the purpose of existence in me is completed, that if now death comes, it is welcome, now that it is the only thing that I don't know – such a man will be enthusiastic about death, will be eager to meet it. And such is the paradox of life – for the one who is ready to jump into death, death disappears. Death is only for cowards; death is only for those who have not lived, who have really remained dead their whole life. Death is not for the living. The more living you are, the farther away is death. If you are totally living, there is no death. Death exists not. Then, there is only life, life eternal.

One should not have 'shoulds' and 'should nots'; one should simply exist spontaneously. If the moment brings fight, fight, and fight totally and intensely. But don't fight for a belief; don't fight for a prejudice. Live in the moment, be alert, and out of that alertness, whatsoever happens, enjoy it. (…) I don't have any belief system; I don't have any creed, dogma – my whole approach is existential. (…) You can ask your questions – and I am a crazy man; I may say anything that comes in the moment. I don't care for any consistency; and I don't care for any respectability. My whole responsibility is to this moment; beyond that, there is nothing.

For the man of meditation, his life will be a sheer joy, with no dark moments, with no frustration, with no tension, no anxiety. Whatsoever happens, he will be able to accept it, without any grudge, without any complaint. His gratitude towards existence will be infinite. (…) You are living in a tremendously beautiful dream – but you have to be awake about it; only then a gratefulness arises. I call that gratefulness true religion. (…) All that a man needs to be religious is a deepfelt gratitude towards existence.

My work is not to create the city, but to create the man. And then, the man takes care of the city and the houses; that is a totally different matter – I don't bother about it. But my vested concern is the individual – the individual is to me the highest value in life. And all the religions in the world have repressed the individual. They have all made him feel guilty; they have all somehow made him think of himself as unworthy, a sinner – all the religions, in different ways, but they have forced everybody into a corner where he is no more human. They have humiliated humanity. It was their vested interest; they needed a world of slaves, not a world of rebels. And you can make a person sink if you make him guilty; you can make him afraid of hell; you can make him greedy of heaven – and this way, you can make him completely forget this moment, this life. (…) No religion bothers that you should be alive, laughing, living, loving, flowering, here and now – and that's my purpose. (…) There is a great conspiracy between the politicians and the priests; it has come for thousands of years. (…) The politician rules people as far as worldly things are concerned; and the priest rules the people as far as their psychology, their mind, their soul is concerned. And they have enslaved man in every possible way – the politician from the outside, and the priest from the inside. They have destroyed all the potential of human beings. My work is to bring that potential back. (…) The psychologist is slowly taking the place of the priest, because the priest is becoming out of date. The younger generation is no more interested in the priest; the younger generation is more interested in psychoanalysis, psychotherapy, in different matters of psychic exploration. The priest is no more in the same powerful position as he has always been; (…) the power of the priests is slipping by, and the psychologist is replacing them – he is becoming the new priest. But the trouble is, the new priest is also serving the old vested interests – he is not revolutionary.

I am an existentialist, and I say to you that life is neither meaningful nor meaningless. The question is irrelevant. A life is just an opportunity, an opening; it depends what you make of it. It depends on you what meaning, what colour, what song, what dance you give to it. Life has not any fixed meaning; life is a creative challenge. (…) Existence is far more profound than any meaning; existence is just a challenge to creativity. (…) Existence is spaciousness, uncluttered with anything; it is so spacious that it allows you absolute freedom to be whatsoever you want to be, whatsoever you have the capacity to be. It allows you unhindered space to grow and to blossom; it does not impose anything on you.

To be caged is to be dead.

Move in spaciousness, without boundaries, without guidelines, with no map, like a cloud in the sky. (…) Wherever the wind takes you, wherever you reach, that is the goal. Ordinarily we have been taught that there should be a goal, and then you start reaching towards it. And if you reach, you have succeeded. But really, going towards this particular goal, you have lost immensely; you have missed the whole richness of life.

Real love is known only after the honeymoon. When you come to me, in the beginning you are enchanted with the new, inspired, excited – something is going to happen. And when you remain here for a long period, every day listening to me, and things settle, then only real disciplehood starts. Then, there is no excitement, and then only, intimacy grows. But that intimacy will grow only if you become aware. Between you and me, awareness has to flow. Otherwise, soon you will start feeling sleepy, drained; you will start leaving, going to somebody else, to another guru, to some other ashram – and there again, the same cycle will start: you will be excited in the beginning, then dull. (…) So, if you are related to me by excitement, this relationship is not going to be very long. Sooner or later, you will drop out of it. (…) Excitement is not the thing; intimacy is. (…) The real thing is to settle and to grow in awareness.

Use me as a jumping board towards a higher and higher awareness. I am not saying something to you; I am being something to you. (…) Listen to me in deep silence, in deep awareness.

To be really religious is to commit suicide. And I mean it; when I say suicide, I mean it – suicide. When a person kills himself, that is not suicide – just the body changes; he will be born again. That is just a change of the body, change of the clothes, change of the abode. But when a man simply drops his ego, he has committed real suicide, authentic suicide; now he will be coming no more. Now there will be no need for him to have another abode in this world of misery, in this world of darkness, in this world which is almost a hell. He will not be coming again. Ego dropped, your journey is finished; you have learned the lesson.

The real seeker cannot search for God, because to start a search for God means you have already accepted that God is. You have already concluded. How can you start a search from a conclusion? You are already prejudiced. You are a believer, not a seeker. The seeker cannot search for God, because he does not know. He can only search into existence, not for God. He can enquire into the reality that surrounds him, not for God; (…) he can only enquire into the reality that is already available. (…) God cannot be the beginning of your search; it is the end, the climax, the culmination. God is the discovery. How can you begin with God?

Religion lives only while there is a living Master. (…) You will have to come out and search for some place where the fire is still alive, where God is still alive, where a Bible is still in the process of being born, where a Gita is being expressed – soon, these words will become scriptures. (…) If you really want to know the truth of existence, you will have to be in the company of someone who has known. (…) Then, there is a possibility – the flame may jump into your heart; you may become aflame.

Come closer to a Master. There comes a moment when you are so close, in deep intimacy, that the flame from one lit candle jumps onto another unlit candle. Then, the disciple becomes the Master himself. That's the only way to seek and to search; all other ways are just to avoid, to pretend.

I am answering this question to provoke in you a respect for your own soul. Nothing else is more important. If you cannot respect your own longing, then you are disrespectful to God. If you cannot assert yourself in the way you want to be, then you are a coward, then you are compromising. Then you will never have a centering; you will never have an integrated being; you will never find yourself crystallized. You will always remain a hazy, cloudy thing. The soul is born through such sacrifices. I am not saying that there will be no problem. There will be problems, many more than you can think of right now, many more than you can even imagine. Friends will turn into enemies; your own family will start looking at you as if you have fallen from grace; and certainly your colleagues wherever you work will start putting you out of their circle, as if you are an outsider, a foreigner. But all these problems are worth facing. These are the steps of the temple of God. This is real sacrifice, real austerity. And slowly, slowly, when one passes through such fire, the gold that you are carrying within you becomes pure; and only through the purity of your inner gold, one day, the golden flower blooms.

To live fearlessly is freedom; to drop fear is freedom. Fear creates our chains. Now you are afraid of the job, career, family, neighborhood. These are all chains made of your fear. Drop these chains. Live in freedom; live authentically the life you really want to live. Don't try to be somebody else; just be yourself.

The people who are living for money and power and prestige are going round and round around street lamps. They will naturally be offended by you when you raise your heads towards the moon. (…) Sannyas means love for the moon. That very love transforms. It is not a question of whether you reach to the moon or not – that very love transmutes; that very love becomes alchemy. You are no more part of the ordinary world; you start living in an extraordinary world. The poetry is born in you; the music is heard of the unknown; some dance starts happening. That's what God is all about. Sannyas is an invitation for God to become a guest in your being; sannyas is readiness to be a host for God.

Meditation is not something that can be done. (…) It is not a doing; it is not an act – it is something that happens. It is not that you go to it; it comes to you, and penetrates you. It destroys you in one way, and recreates you in another. It is something so vital and so infinite that it cannot be part of your doing. (…) All that you can do is to be vulnerable and open to existence from all sides. (…) Meditation is an openness to all dimensions, an openness to everything. (…) It cannot be comfortable, because anything can happen. A mind which longs for security, which longs for comfort, which longs for certainty, cannot be a meditative mind. Only a mind which is open to anything that life offers, welcoming each and everything that happens, even death, can create a situation in which meditation happens. So the only thing that can be done by you is to be receptive to meditation, to be totally receptive – not to any particular happening, but to anything that comes. (…) You must not be in a knowing-mood; you must be completely ignorant – only then can the unknown come to you. The moment your ignorance becomes aware of itself, the moment you know that you don't know, that is the moment you begin to wait for the unknown. (…) To go into meditation is to transcend your accumulated knowledge. The moment this knowledge is transcended, learning begins.

If I am still living in the memory of yesterday, then I am not capable of living today. If I can live yesterday's moments yesterday, then I must live what is happening today this very moment, and what I say must come through the me of this moment. If it comes from the dead past, it is borrowed. Even if it comes from me, from my own past, it is dead weight; it is not knowing – knowing is always spontaneous. (…) When you borrow from your memory, you are not in the moment of knowing. One must not borrow from anyone, not even from one's own past. One must live moment to moment, and live in such a way that everything which comes to you becomes part of your knowing. (…) The only possible way to live is one moment at a time.

The achieving mind can never sever itself from the future; the achieving mind is bound to be future-oriented. And a mind that is future-oriented must be past-based, because the future is nothing but a projection of the past. We project our past memories into future longings. Our dreams of the future are our experiences of the past painted more beautifully, longed for more aesthetically. (…) A meditative person lives in the present, because there is no other way to live. But if you want to postpone living, you can live in the past or in the future.

Yoga is not a method of meditation, but a way of creating a situation in which meditation happens. (…) whenever and wherever a person has truly lived, he has created a yoga. (…) Every person, every individual, has his own way, his own door through which he approaches reality – so no one can follow anyone else. (…) The follower can never be a yogi, because following again means that you are longing for security; you want to be certain of achieving, so you follow the path of someone who has already achieved. But what was a path for someone else may not be the path for you. (…) individuals are unique, and everyone has to create his own path. It is not that a path is readymade and one just has to walk on it to reach somewhere; it is your own life which creates a path for you to walk on. (…) A path created by one person cannot be trodden by anyone else, because the path of yoga is inner. (…) So everyone has his own yoga; everyone has to create it himself. (…) Everyone must create his own yoga; only then can one's authentic being be realized. Otherwise, only a borrowed, phony realization is possible. (…) Nothing will be gained by it.

Everyone has to search in total loneliness, total darkness. (…) The moment you accept your total loneliness, you become a yogi, and you transcend society. This is the only meaning of leaving society. No one can actually leave society – wherever you go, you will create it. (…) You must be deeply in aloneness; you must remain in it; you must live with it. You must walk the path of life totally alone. Amidst the crowd, although there will be fellow travelers, you must be totally alone. (…) There may be five members of a family living together; these are five alonenesses living in a home. (…) the moment you understand your aloneness, you become compassionate towards others and their aloneness. This compassion is the indication that a person has been truly initiated into yoga, because now that you know your aloneness, you can understand the aloneness of all. (…) Everyone uses the other as an escape from his own aloneness, and because of this, there is possessiveness. (…) Everybody clings in his own way; the other is an escape from our aloneness (…) – and no escape is possible. (…) A yogi has come to know this naked fact, that it is everyone's nature to be absolutely alone, and there is nothing to be done about it. (…) But we create illusory escapes, illusions of togetherness. Our families, our nations, our clubs, groups and organizations – this whole society is an escape from our aloneness. (…) One bored person goes to another bored person, and together they try to overcome boredom. (…) Now each bored person will be doubly bored, and will think that it is the other who is at fault somehow.

Buddha has used two words: prajna and karuna, because basically, religion is concerned only with these two words. Prajna means meditation, the peak of knowing; and karuna means compassion. Prajna, meditation, is the flame; and karuna, compassion, is the light that spreads out and fills the whole world. Both come simultaneously; they are one.

Live life; be in life deeply; be involved in it – and still be alone. (…) Everything will come and go; (…) you are alone. (…) From this aloneness, meditation begins to grow. (…) total aloneness is samadhi.

Once you realize your total aloneness, in that moment you come to know that there are not two, that there have never been two. I cannot say that you become one with God, because you have always been Him; you have never been separate. Separation is your illusion, and because of that illusion, you create another illusion, (…) another mental concept: oneness. (…) You are one, not oneness, not separateness. There is no one else – the other has gone; the other has dropped away. And when the other has dropped away, in that very moment, the mind ceases. Mind is the other, and when there is no mind, there is no other. (…) The reality is a conceptless, non-conceptualized existence.

Accept things as they come. Denial and non-acceptance are the only atheism. Acceptance, a 'yes'-saying spirit that says 'yes' to everything, that welcomes everything unconditionally, is religiousness.

Sannyas is a renunciation of the dead past and of the unborn future. It is a renunciation of suicidal tendencies and of the postponement of living. Sannyas is initiation into life.

In sleep, the mind goes to sleep; in samadhi, the mind dies. So sushupti, dreamless sleep, and samadhi appear to be similar, but they are not, because after samadhi, there is no survival of the mind. After sleep, when you awaken, again duality is seen. But after samadhi, there is no coming back; this is the point of no-return.

The primary need of an unstill mind is to be anarchic; only then can it transcend itself. (…) So, first let tension, confusion, anarchy reach a climax. Then, there will be an explosion, and discipline will come as the result. (…) Otherwise, you can ordain discipline, but discipline will be an outward conditioning – the inner being will remain the same. (…) So many things that must be expressed have been suppressed in the unconscious. They have been suppressed for centuries, through many past births. The anarchic being that is within each of us is unknown even to ourselves. It must come out; the ghost inside us must come out. And it can come out only when it is expressed – expressed in its total intensity from the innermost core of being. First one has to become mad in order to transcend one's inner madness. (…) The anarchy within must be exploded. It should not be stilled or pushed down; it must be expressed in total intensity. (…) This is catharsis through dynamic meditation. (…) Then the stillness comes by itself; it is not a cultivated composure.

The whole world is a great madhouse, and we have hypnotized ourselves into thinking that we are sane, normal. But the insanity that is hidden in the background always tries to come out – it erupts; it explodes out of us in dreams; it explodes out of us when we are intoxicated. (…) Drugs or dreams just uncover your self, the authentic being that is within you.

It is total nonsense even to try to discipline the mind if you have not known the innermost core. (…) The ultimate outcome will be schizophrenia – there will be two beings living simultaneously within you; your whole being will be split. There will be continuous indecision and conflict within. And remember, conflict dissipates energy. So, the first step towards a harmony and unity of being is not discipline, but knowledge of that which is within.

The within has been so suppressed for centuries, for millennia, that this suppression has become a part of your self. And not only you, but the whole of humanity has suppressed what is within – you are just a part of the process. You have not suppressed what is within you consciously, knowingly; it is part of your heritage to do that.

Experience, as such, is psychic. There is no such thing really as 'spiritual experience'. (…) The experiencer is not, so you cannot use the terminology of experience. You experience a moment of non-experience.

Language is for events; it is not for silence.

When one comes back from meditation, the ego returns, because the whole mechanism is still there. For a while, you were not part of it; for a few minutes, you transcended the mind, the ego. You were beyond it; you left the house – now, you have come back. But you cannot come back as the same person who left it, because now you know something beyond. You cannot be the same again, but still you come back. The easier it becomes to go out and come in, the more likely it is that a new stage will begin in which you are neither out nor in – you transcend both. This is the culmination; this is samadhi. (…) Satori is not samadhi; satori is just a glimpse, because you can still come back from it. But you cannot come back from samadhi; it is the point of no-return.

Nobody reaches samadhi, because when samadhi is reached, nobody is there.

Guidance is possible only up to the fourth stage, satori. (…) The fifth stage, Brahman, cosmic consciousness, is beyond guidance. Silent awareness is always beyond guidance. Either it happens, or it doesn't happen. The fifth stage is existence itself.

I am against practicing all asanas or mudras. They must come by themselves, or you must not do them. If you do them, there is no guarantee that the corresponding inner state of mind will follow, and it will become a gesture, an act. You can sit like Buddha or stand like Mahavira, there is no problem in it, but it is meaningless; nothing is accomplished by it. (…) You must not begin from without; the beginning must be from within. (…) If you sit in Buddha's posture, the position of the body will create a feeling of tranquility in you. Now you will assume that tranquility has been achieved; you will feel still, silent. But this stillness, this silence, is just a deception. It has not come to you; you have imposed it on yourself – it is not from within, but from without. It will feel very good, but it is a created, conditioned stillness that has been produced and projected by the body. (…) Let asanas come from within; do not impose them from without. (…) Everyone will need to express himself individually. (…) Where did these asanas come from? Whenever the state of mind that Buddha had is there, the body follows it with a particular posture. It must follow it; it will have to follow it. This has been known for centuries, that there are particular outward postures and gestures that correspond to particular mental states. So it was surmised that if we create these postures and gestures in the body, the corresponding mental states will definitely follow – but that is not so. (…) Let asanas and mudras come from within, they will come, and when they come by themselves, they will have a reason of their own. They will work within your body, and through them your body will become attuned to a new situation.

Meditation does not mean a conscious implementation; it means an effortless jump into yourself. (…) Real meditation is a jump into the unknown. (…) With discipline, you can go step by step, but you can never discipline a jump. The first three steps of Dynamic Meditation are not steps of meditation at all, but steps that lead you to the place where you can jump.

Authenticity can only come to you after catharsis. Real asanas and mudras are a catharsis, an expression, an overflowing. And the more they overflow, the more weightless you begin to be. (…) That is the basic difference: if you practice asanas, they will be suppressive; but if they come to you spontaneously, they will be expressive – there will be a catharsis. If you impose asanas on yourself, the action is just part and parcel of your total suppressive routine. If you impose asanas which your mind is not ready for, you will force your body into a particular posture, and the body will have to follow your will. This type of exercise, if done to its logical conclusion, will create a split in the personality. Then you will become two – the one who is suppressed, and the one who is suppressing. Yoga, to me, means becoming one, not two; it is integration, not splitting. (…) Yogasana is an asana which has come to you, which has happened to you; otherwise, an asana is no different from anything else that is imposed on you, any physical discipline. It may prove health-giving, but it can never prove spiritual; it can never help to integrate you. The health benefits that you derive will be at a very high cost, because your personality will be splitting in two. The whole nature of experience of those people who practice asanas begins to be less and less spiritual, and more and more physical. (…) this is a curious phenomenon: these asanas seem to be meditation-oriented; they are supposed to be – yet, all over the world, wherever asanas are talked about, dhyana, meditation, is the least talked about subject. (…) Meditation is the ground; it is the base; it is the seed. Everything must be meditation-oriented, because meditation is first, and everything else follows. (…) Yogic exercises are gymnastics, not yoga.

Outer power has corrupted man, but inner power has corrupted him more. (…) The power-seeking mind can never be at ease, because the power-seeking mind is basically violent. Violence needs power – we want to be above others; we want power, prestige, heights. (…) But a violent mind can never be spiritual – at its lowest, the power will be physical; at its highest, it can be psychic. But if one is seeking truth, bliss, if one is seeking the Divine, then this power must not be sought. You must deny this power; you must be meek. (…) A meek person means a humble person – he is not seeking power; he has left that dimension completely. He is poor in this sense: he is no one. (…) So, one must be aware of psychic forces. Siddhis exist, but do not look at them. Just pass them by; just be a witness to them. They will be with you; they will work in you – but they will be like shadows; they will follow you. Things will be happening around you, but you will not be conscious of them; you will not be strengthening your ego through them. (…) Then, there will be powers, but they will not be ego-centered; they will be God-oriented and God-centered. But you must not be concerned with them. When they come, just pass by and bid them farewell.

You dream in the night because the barriers of the conscious mind are withdrawn. Whatever is suppressed in your mind, desired, longed for, begins to take shape and form; you begin to imagine it. But while you are dreaming, you never know that it is a dream.

I am not saying that there is no such thing as kundalini or chakras. I am not saying that no experiences happen; there are experiences, but you must not know about them beforehand, otherwise you will project. You must be completely unknowing; you must be ignorant – that is the basic condition to proceed further. (…) Information should not be confused with knowledge; each thing must be known and experienced directly. (…) Only in this way will things begin to happen that are authentic. (…) The experience of the seven chakras or the passage of kundalini is different for each individual. (…) The happening is individual, and there are no generalizations. (…) Generalizations never happen; (…) all generalizations are myths.

As you go deeply inward, each of your senses has a corresponding inner manifestation. (…) The essence of every outward experience is also stored within; all your senses have reservoirs of experience stored in your mind. When you travel inward, these reservoirs will be encountered. (…) inward experience is a pure essence; it is just an electrical phenomenon. Because the phenomenon is just energy, it is pure. Nothing obstructs it; it is transparent. (…) don't take inward experiences seriously. They are only meaningful insofar as they are indications that you are going deep. They are only part of the scenery on the way; they are not the destination itself. When you really reach deep within, there will be no experiences. (…) Unless all inward experiences cease, you cannot transcend the mind. These experiences are just the psyche displaying the accumulation of what it has preserved throughout endless lives. That is why each person will feel different things – each one has a different accumulated past; so each one will have a different orientation as far as his senses are concerned.

Experience itself is the last barrier. One must come to a point where one is, and there is no experience. Only when experiencing has ceased does duality cease. When you are experiencing something, duality is still there. You are there, and the experience is there – something without is there. Even if you experience oneness with the world, this experience is part of duality. When meditation comes to a full flowering, there will be no experience at all. You will be, and just being is the experience. (…) Only then is the experiential achieved.

Today's mind is not fixed; it is in chaos. So all the old methods which were meant for fixed minds are out of date. For the chaotic mind, a chaotic method is needed; only then can you be led into deeper realms; otherwise, the results are bound to be shallow. (…) The method is for you, not you for the method. If something is not working for you, change it.

To be religious, or to be interested in the ultimate questions of life, one needs to have really fulfilled all the lower wants and needs. So to me, a poor society cannot be religious. India was religious only when it was at a peak of affluence. For example, in Buddha's time, India was just like America today (1970). In those days, India was the richest land. The religion that we have in India today is just a leftover from those days. (…) There is a basic difference between a poor man's religion and a rich man's religion. If a poor man becomes interested in religion, it will be just as a substitute. Even if he prays to God, he will be praying for economic goods; the basic problem of man will not yet have arisen for him. (…) But for a rich man, there is a basic change of dimension. Now he is not asking for economic goods; he is asking for the meaning of life.

There is every possibility that a person may flower without any guru, but that person too will have to surrender; he will have to trust – if not a particular person, then the Whole. The basic requirements must be fulfilled. Whether they are fulfilled in connection with a person or not is immaterial. (…) the guru is a step toward the impersonal, a way to help one surrender to the Whole, to existence itself. To the human mind, all relationships are personal. It may be love, it may be respect, it may be anything, but it is personal. So the first step toward the realization of truth or of cosmic being is also bound to be personal. Someone will have to be used as a jumping board.

Words are the midpoint between science and religion. (…) These are the three roads: science, which means reason, and which is expressible; poetry and art, which are emotion, and which are expressible up to a certain point beyond which they become inexpressible; and religion, spirituality, which is absolutely inexpressible.

When the heart is in contact with the world, the world is divine; when the mind is in contact with the world, the world is material. (…) Meditation is the way to know God; mind is the way to know matter. Mind and meditation are exact opposites, different dimensions. You cannot have it both ways – you can reach the mind, but in that moment, the heart will not work; or you can reach the heart, but in that moment, the mind will not work. You can use both, but not simultaneously – they are polar opposites.

God is a mythical word, a mumbo-jumbo word that is the invention of the priesthood. Actually, to ask whether God exists is absurd. For those who know, God is existence as such, the very isness. (…) The totality of existence is God. (…) Existence is nonpersonal, impersonal. (…) But the human mind is very cunning. First we invent a personified God – we give God a personality, and then we make Him responsible for what happens. We go on creating problems that are not problems at all, but fallacies (…) – the whole game is being played by you alone; you create problems. These problems are not authentic problems; they are created problems, invented problems: (…) if God becomes a person, then you ask, "why is there evil?". (…) If you call the totality 'existence', you cannot make it responsible; but if you call it 'God', then you can make it responsible.

God is the indefinable. (…) Mind cannot conceive of the indefinable, because mind requires definitions, clearcut boundaries. That is why God, existence, cannot be understood by the mind.

If you say that something is bad, (…) no reply will be given to you from the universe, because as far as existence is concerned, there is no evil. Evil depends on our attitudes; it depends on our moralistic definitions. (…) The distinction is human, mental, contextual, relative – it is not existential; it is not ultimate truth. You have made the definition; you have defined something as beauty and something as ugliness. You have made the distinction, and then you ask, "why has God made ugliness?". (…) Everything we know is fragmentary, incomplete, one page torn from a novel. (…) We don't know the Whole, so we cannot pronounce judgment on it. (…) Words such as good and bad are just expedient, utilitarian; they are not existential. (…) All our statements about good and bad, beauty and ugliness, are nothing more than traffic regulations. We have to make them, (…) traffic does require certain rules, (…) but they are not ultimate truths. (…) The rule is utilitarian; it is neither natural nor ultimate. (…) As society develops in a more complex way, a more clearly defined morality is needed; otherwise you will not be able to live. But these moralities, these conceptions of good and bad, are human expediencies.

God is an existential quest; an enquiry, not a question. (…) God is a search, not a question, and a search cannot be answered. It has yet to be lived; you have to go into it deeply. You will have to be committed to it; you will have to throw yourself into it. (…) Readymade answers are a barrier to the unknown. One has to go into the unknown in total insecurity, not knowing anything. That is what is necessary, and nothing can be done about it. (…) When you come upon the Divine yourself, it is not simply an answer, it is a transformation – you become one with it. You can never become one with any answer; an answer always remains separate in the memory. (…) Those who have known have remained silent. They have talked, but they have not given any answer to the question; they have made no statement at all. They have pointed in a certain direction, but to point is not to make a statement; it is just a gesture. Because of the limitation of words, of language, because of the limitations of the human mind, questioning and answering, one can only indicate, one can only point in a particular direction.

If you feel that you are responsible for yourself, then you become a soul. If you feel that you are responsible for the Whole, then you become a god.

A person who is not capable of loving himself, of living with himself, enjoying his own company, will not be able to be in a deep communion with anyone else. (…) So the crowds are there, but they are lonely crowds.

When you are ready, the whole universe begins to help you. There is no need to ask for any astral help; there is no need to go anywhere – help is always given; a need is always fulfilled. But one has to be ready; one has to be in a state of mind where universal forces can help you. So it is not a positive search, because you cannot seek what you don't know. Help depends on your receptivity, your readiness. (…) The help is always there, but your eyes are closed.

You can either be open to higher forces, or you can be open to lower forces – you cannot be open to both. The very mechanism of consciousness is such that if you are open to the lower, you will be closed to the higher, and if you are open to the higher, you will automatically become closed to the lower. We have only one opening, so it is your choice in which direction to move. (…) Higher forces are always there, but they cannot work unless you cooperate with them, unless you give yourself to them. The moment you are open to them, the moment the invitation has been sent, the work begins. (…) Remember, faith is the opening. Faith means trust, and whatever you believe in, you are open to. An untrusting mind is closed because it is afraid; but unless you trust, you will remain closed. (…) Energy has to flow, and if the lower outlet is closed, it has to find a new outlet. (…) You become open to the higher, and when you become open to the higher, things begin to happen in a very different way.

The first thing to do is to be closed to the lower, (…) because unless the lower is closed, the higher cannot open – it is impossible. (…) If you close the lower, the higher opens. (…) The opening to the lower is habitual in us. Be aware when some lower force is pulling you. Be a witness to it. Don't allow your mind to be open to it. Everything that you are open to becomes deeply imprinted inside you and finally begins to work. So be aware constantly, moment to moment. (…)

Don't waste energy in the lower. Then you will not be dissipating energy – you will be accumulating energy; and the accumulated energy will help to throw open the door to the higher. Once you begin to feel the higher possibilities that exist, there is not even any need to think of the lower. The lower has disappeared; you have entered a different world, a different dimension, a new existence. And then, you begin to receive help from advanced souls.

When I say, be closed to the lower forces, I don't mean fight them; I mean be aware. If you begin to fight, you will remain in the lower and become perverted, which is even worse. Then you are not even natural; you become obsessed. (…) Become aware of your deeper attitudes, your deeper longings, your deeper suppressions. (…) Learn to analyze what is happening; (…) become aware of your unconscious. (…) When I say, don't be open to the lower, I don't mean suppression; I mean analysis, observation, awareness, consciousness.

A suppressed mind is deeply rooted in the lower, because whatever you suppress, you have to suppress continuously. If someone is suppressing sex, he cannot take a holiday from suppression. (…) With suppression, nothing dies; on the contrary, a thing that has been suppressed becomes more alive.

The lower opening only functions in two ways: suppression and indulgence. They appear to be polar opposites, but they are not. They help each other very mysteriously, like friends in a deep conspiracy. If you indulge too much, then you will be pulled automatically toward the so-called opposite, suppression, and vice-versa. Then the third possibility will remain closed to you – that of transforming energy. Both of these extremes are horizontal; and a transformation of the energy, the third possibility, is vertical. If you neither suppress nor indulge, the energy will not be able to move on the horizontal plane; it will begin to move vertically. That vertical movement is transformation; that vertical movement opens you to the higher forces.

The Koran was not delivered to Mohammed in one day; it kept on being delivered to him throughout his whole life. Mohammed had been an ordinary man before; absolutely ordinary. Suddenly, he became different. (…) Mohammed was guided not by his ego, but by forces beyond him; he became just an instrument. When the higher opens, everything turns upside down. Your logic will not apply; your reason will not apply; whatever you have known becomes irrelevant; whatever you are becomes irrelevant.

Man is a growth, a going beyond animality. (…) Only with religiousness, only with religious consciousness, do you become human for the first time. Otherwise, everything is animal-like.

When you are in contact only with the lower, life is just a trivial, meaningless, repetitive routine, (…) a meaningless, absurd repetition of the trivial, going on and on and on. We are just occupied; we are not living. (…) Only very mediocre minds can think that this is life. (…) The higher is needed, always; it is the only saving force. (…) Life only becomes meaningful if you feel the existence of the Divine. (…) Meaning always comes from the beyond; it cannot come from you. Only if you can go beyond does there seem to be a meaning in life.

If the higher possibility does not happen, politics will become suicidal. Until now, we have survived in spite of politics, because we had no means of total destruction. (…) But now that we have total weapons, we can destroy the whole world. And because of our animal tendencies, there seems to be no future for us. For the first time, religion has become the only means of survival. Unless many, many consciousnesses become open to the divine source, there is no future for us.

The robot is helpful as far as ordinary life is concerned, because without it, you will not be able to do many things; it is a necessary help. But as far as higher things are concerned, the robot becomes a problem. (…) The robot is the only difficulty as far as spiritual progress is concerned. Take charge. Be conscious of things which have become automatic. Then, by and by, as you become more and more aware, the lower opening will be closed. And when the higher opens, you need not do anything more; then, the higher begins to do everything through you.

The whole struggle in the Gita between Arjuna and Krishna is due to Arjuna trying to remain himself; he wants to decide for himself whether to fight or not. Closed to the higher, he wants to decide according to the lower. He is resisting opening up to the higher, and Krishna is insisting, "Close the lower and surrender to the higher. Then, no decision will be needed on your part; then, the higher will decide. Surrender to it."

Silence has its own message; it is its own message, conveying many things.

Metaphysical questions, intellectual questions, are meaningless, useless, as far as inner enquiry is concerned. (…) Intellect is an instrument, a bridge to all that exists outside; it has no door to the inner. So the moment you begin to ask intellectually, you can go on asking for many lives and collect many answers, but still you will not be connected to the inner world.

You can know many things about yourself, but to know about yourself is not to know you. The 'about' goes round and round on the periphery, and the center remains untouched.

Here and now, spontaneously, let a question arise in you. Don't carry something from the past; don't carry something that comes from others; don't carry something that comes from the scriptures. Let it come from you. (…) the question must be total, authentic. You must be deeply committed to your question; it must not be just a peripheral curiosity. (…) If you ask in this way, from your deeper being, the very questioning becomes a process of meditation.

It is very difficult to find a person who is not frustrated. And if you find such a person, know that he is a religious person.

Don't think about the world; think about yourself. You are the world, and if you begin to be different, the world begins to be different; (…) the world has begun to change. (…) We are always concerned with changing the world. That is just an escape. I have always felt that people who are concerned with others' changing are really escaping from their own frustrations, their own conflicts, their own anxieties, their own anguish. They are focusing their minds on something else, they are occupying their minds with something else, because they cannot change themselves. It is easier to try to change the world than to change oneself.

Move existentially; (…) go into the problem existentially. (…) Then, a very subtle change happens in your consciousness (…) – your consciousness begins to emerge. And the more conscious you become, the more the false identification will dissolve. Both cannot exist simultaneously. (…) When the false identification has gone, and you think about it retrospectively, it becomes part of your memory. Now you can divide yourself from it – you are separate from it, and it is separate from you. (…) Now there are two things: the memory of your past experience, and you. But in the act of your past experience, there was only one thing: you had become the experience; you were the experience. (…) Be aware of it; (…) this awareness will change the whole thing. The day this awareness comes to you, false identification will dissolve, because for you to coexist with it is not possible. Awareness means a conscious mind, and false identification is possible only in a very unconscious, sleepy state of mind. Be more and more alert: where are you? what is your energy? (…) When you feel that false identification is there, close your eyes, forget about the situation outside, and be conscious of what is happening inside you. The whole energy has become false identification. If you watch it, then suddenly, part of the energy will begin to transform itself into awareness. A pillar of consciousness will arise out of the chaos of false identification. And the more the pillar arises, the more the chaos inside will drop and disappear. Then, when you feel that you are, you will notice that false identification is no longer – you become a self, a center; the other can no longer be the center which either attracts or repels. This meditation has to be done at the very moment of the happening; then you will be a different person altogether. (…) Now, you will be a consciousness, a light unto yourself. Because of this light, darkness will have become impossible. (…) This must be understood very clearly: false identification needs your unconsciousness as its basic requirement.

We say that someone has fallen in love. The phenomenon of love is a falling down, and falling in love means that you lose consciousness of yourself because of love. (…) The same happens in hate. Love and hate are alike, because it is the same energy inverted. (…) Become conscious. A conscious being is neither hateful nor loveful. (…) Buddha is not love but compassion, and the difference is very deep. When you feel compassion, you remain the center; you can be neither repulsed nor attracted. It is a very neutral state. The other will feel very deeply that you love him, but… (…) it is your projection that he loves or hates. In fact, he neither loves nor hates; he remains himself, and the compassion flows. (…) When one becomes a center, when one becomes crystallized, there is neither repulsion nor attraction to anyone. (…) this means that you cannot go beyond hate unless you go beyond love. (…) Every lover goes on continuously moving between hate and love, attraction and repulsion. Freud has said, very truly, that you have to hate the same person that you love – it cannot be otherwise. (…) Get rid of all the scapegoats that you have had for your false identification. You could love your country and hate another country; you could love your religion and hate another religion – because, if you love someone or something, you have to balance that love with hate. (…) The duality is a natural thing. If you love, you have to hate. (…) With love, hate will be there, and you will have to find some object to focus it on. So the more you love, the more you will be hateful. That is the price one has to pay. Remember this: either love and hate go together, or neither of them is there at all.

If there is an enemy somewhere, then the whole nation becomes one. (…) The moment we discover an enemy somewhere, and we are trying very hard to find one, then the whole world can become one.

False identification will disappear not by you doing anything, but by being more aware, more conscious, more alert. Become a conscious being, and you will be at your center, and no one will be able to take you away from your center. Right now, anyone can do it. Some do it by love, and some do it by hate, but anyone can take you away from your center. You have no center really, only a bogus center, which is just waiting for anyone to come and take you away from it. Consciousness means centering, being continuously centered inside. Then both love and hate disappear. Only when both disappear are you at peace.

All the symptoms of false identification are the same: you become tense. (…) Love and hate are both tensions; both are diseases – (…) you cannot be at ease either in love or in hate. (…) remain in yourself, alone in your consciousness. You exist; the other has become irrelevant – then, you are centered; then, compassion will happen. It is a happening that follows once centering is there.

Centering is just being yourself, moving according to yourself, living according to yourself. Many may be attracted to you, many may be repulsed by you, but these are just their projections – it is their problem; (…) you remain unconcerned.

What have you got from the past? Just memories and thoughts. (…) And the past is growing every day, because you go on accumulating thoughts, memories, experiences. (…) Every day, you give your mind more to think about. (…) Every day, you have a bigger and bigger mind, and less and less consciousness. (…) You may even begin to lose consciousness of yourself completely, and then you will become an automaton, a computer, a thinking machine, a robot. (…) Mind means the accumulated past, and it goes on accumulating. What else can it do but go on repeating thoughts? What else is thinking but the repetition of the past again and again? Nothing new comes through. Thinking is never original; it cannot be, because you can only think in terms of the known. You cannot think about the unknown; you can only come to the unknown when you are not thinking.

If you are really in this moment, you cannot think – it is impossible. Thinking is only possible in the past or in the future, never in the present. (…) Don't fall back into the past, and don't jump ahead to the future. (…) Remain in the moment. (…) Live moment to moment. Die to the past and die to the future. Live here and now, so that whatever you do becomes a meditation. Meditation is an attitude, not an activity, so whatever you do can become meditative.

Try to stop a thought, and you will see who is the master. Try to stop it. You cannot. The thought will rebel against your control, and it will come back with a vengeance – with more force, with more skill and efficiency. Whatever you think about is not thinking, really – it is just a rush, a mad rush, a crowd, a traffic jam of thoughts, an inconsistent, unnecessary holdover from the past. (…) So be aware. (…) Live in the present. Live in the meditative quality of the present. (…) The present moment is not part of time at all. Past is time, future is time, but the present is not time. (…) The present is eternal; the present is. It is always here and now, an eternal now. (…) Past and future belong to mind, not to existence. If you can understand this, you will see that time is mind, and mind is time. Dissolve mind, and there will be no more time, and vice versa.

Your so-called thinking is more akin to anxiety than to thinking. In this so-called thinking that you do, you have to grope for the answer – and groping can only be in the dark. Today you think you have solved something, and tomorrow the same problem is there again; everything becomes confused again, and you go on groping in the dark. That is why thinkers change their minds every day. That which was a truth yesterday is not a truth today, and today's truth will not be the same again tomorrow. So everything is just approximately true – nothing is true, nothing is false; it can become false again any moment.

Remember this: the other must not be the center. (…) If your love is centered on me, that will create problems. You will love me, and you will find someone else to hate. This is what happens. If you love your guru, then you will begin to hate and condemn all other gurus. (…) You have to create an enemy. (…) If you love someone, (…) then, too, deep down, the other side will be there. Any moment it can erupt and become destructive. You must be fulfilled within yourself, because only then will there be no frustration. You will feel many things, but they will be something separate from you.

Those who love and then hate are not real lovers. (…) when someone loves deeply, he can only hate deeply; there is no other way. (…) You cannot hate in the beginning; one has to love first. Love is a necessity in order to hate; you cannot hate directly without some love having been there.

The last desire that you have in one life becomes the first desire at the beginning of a new life.

Words are impotent to express truth; truth can be expressed only in silence. The moment we enter silence, the mystery of truth is revealed. (…) Only with the dissolution of ego, we can enter silence.

Silence will be spontaneous if there is full awareness of, but no reaction to, the external stimuli.

When life's goal is sighted, one begins to move towards that goal. Whereas meaningful life is a yoga, aimless life is all indulgence. The life on an indulgent man is like a lake which has stagnant water, which flows nowhere, and which, in time, dries up. But the life of yoga is like a river which for ever is rushing towards the ocean. (…) Be like the river which moves towards the ocean; only then you will find life worthwile.

There is only one misery: isolation from God. (…) The one root misery creates the illusion of a multitude of miseries. We have to be radical and deal with this root misery. (…) We have to destroy the root of all miseries.

All associations are in opposition to somebody or something; the life-force of all groupism is hatred of other groups – without opposition and acrimony, groups can neither exist nor function. (…) Religion, in reality, has nothing to do with any group or society; it is concerned only with the individual. Therefore, the various religions are in opposition to one another only when viewed as separate groups; but the same faiths, if they are understood to be the diverse ways of self-realization, are found to be paths converging towards the same truth. (…) There is only one religion, because there is only one truth. But the paths to that one truth, that peak experience, can be several. In fact, there are as many paths as there are seekers of truth. (…) The individual has to start from where he is. Others cannot be expected to start from the same place, simply because others are not in the same place. The starting points are all different, but the destination is the same.

Accumulation of anything is not real gain; accumulation is only the means of hiding one's lack, and thereby deceiving oneself. And self-deception is self-destruction.

When thoughts rise from within, you gain knowledge.

With awareness, one will be awake to the movements of one's mind; one will be conscious about one's actions. There will be full awareness about all one's doings – one will not be a tool in the hands of external stimuli; one will not do anything unconsciously. In short, a conscious individual will be an individual in the true sense of the term, complete, whole. Where there is no discriminatory thinking, there is no existence of that faculty which introduces one to oneself, and which frees one from mechanical, automatic or unconscious actions.

Production is not creation. True creation is that which recreates you. (…) The greatest art is life itself, and the greatest artist is he who brings to his own life beauty as well as creativity.

In final analysis, the importance is of the individual, and not of the object. (…) We are the cause of our misery, because whatever we are, we have made ourselves such. (…) A miserable life is the result of a wrong way of looking at things; and a happy life is the result of a right approach to life. (…) He who seeks for faults outside, goes astray; he who seeks for them in himself, is sure to succeed in transcending them.

By 'thinking', I mean discretion, the ability to distinguish between the ephemeral and the eternal, between the mortal and the immortal, between the unreal and the real. He who has lost this type of ability to think, wastes his life on the transitory; whereas he who is able to think, seeks for the permanent and not the illusory. (…) Life belongs to that which is eternal; death to that which is ephemeral. (…) True thinking, deep thinking, opens the door for the awakened consciousness to move forward to its goal.

Those that do not travel in the direction of self-enlightenment gradually go deeper and deeper in the abyss of darkness, and this darkness can be destructive.

He who has no thirst for the truth cannot be free. Truth leads to freedom; (…) truth is freedom.

If knowledge is imparted, then it is not religious. (…) One has to know oneself. When it comes through others, (…) then it becomes simply information; it is not religion. 'Religious' means that which has been experienced, that which is existential, that which has been got through living, not through scriptures, not through teachers – not borrowed, but lived.

In meditation, you are not thinking about yourself; you are knowing. (…) You are not; there is only knowing. (…) Then there is only existence; then there is only being. That being is atman.

There is no such thing as self-realized. Self is ignorance; when you come to realize that which is, there is no self.

The kingdom of God is the same as that which Mahavira calls atman, that which Buddha calls no-atman. This is the same, but Jesus speaks in parables – he calls it the kingdom of God. (…) Krishna calls it brahma. (…) Krishna, Jesus, Buddha, the names are more important to us than the reality for which those names stood. If one goes deeper, one comes to know, the source is one. (…) the paths may differ, but the reaching point is one. Those who are realized come to know the one reality; those who are not realized conceive their own realities individually.

Reality cannot be said, cannot be expressed. (…) You can know it, (…) but you cannot define it. (…) All that is beautiful, all that is true, all that is good, cannot be defined; it can only be experienced. So I have got no philosophy.

The more you become conscious, the less and less thoughts become. For some time, the road becomes vacant and you dip in, you go in. If you continue this – this awareness, being a witness to your mind – then there comes a time… no one can predict it – it is unpredictable, but it comes… then some day, you feel that there are no thoughts. (…) you come inside when thought ceases. (…) With thought, the wandering ceases; with thought, everything outward ceases – thought is the foundation of all that is outward. You come in; (…) for the first time, you are dissociated from the outside – you realize what has been always yours.

There is nothing except God. What we call satanic is simply our unacceptance; what we call bad is merely our unacceptance. (…) Actually, good and bad are just two sides of the same coin. I am not referring to the unknown as God in the sense of his being opposite to Satan; I am calling that the unknown which is at the root of our lives, which is the very basis of existence. From this source of existence emerges Ravana as well as Rama; darkness and light both emerge from this very source. (…) One who loves existence would find God as much in the darkness as he would find him in the light. (…) the darkness has its own mystery, as the light has its own also. Whatever significant happens in this life happens with the cooperation of darkness and light. (…) Thus, darkness and light are the basis for the same life-force. Division, polarity, in life, are only man-made.

The day a person stops accepting the challenge of life, he is dead – as of that very moment. Life is accepting challenge every moment. But this acceptance of challenge can be of two types: it can be with anger, and then it becomes a reaction; or the acceptance can be with great delight, pleasure and joy, and then it becomes a response. (…) Bheeshma blew his conch with delight, and caused rejoicing among the other warriors. (…) This is acceptance – if in life, one is faced with war, the war too is accepted.

Really, there can be no method as far as meditation is concerned. Meditation is not a method. Through technique, through method, you cannot go beyond mind. (…) Truth cannot be achieved through mind.

Thinking means non-understanding. The person who thinks is a man of non-understanding. A person who knows doesn't think. (…) He sees, he is aware, but not in thinking. (…) The thinking must go for the truth to be revealed. (…) Mind constantly deludes you; (…) an occupied mind cannot transcend itself. (…) Your mind or my mind cannot conceive of something beyond it. (…) If something beyond is to be conceived, the mind must cease to be. (…) One is to be aware of the mechanism of the mind, how the mind works, how the mind needs constantly occupation. Every moment mind needs occupation; it has become a mechanical tendency. (…) Once you leave the so-called worldly occupations, you become occupied in spiritual affairs – but you remain occupied. One is to be aware of this very process of the mind. That awareness of the mechanical process stops the process. Moments come, they break through, and you see something. That is not your thinking, not a by-product of your thought.

The active must cease. The constant seeking for pleasure, for enjoyment, must cease for one to be oneself, for you to know who you are. (…) The mind likes enjoyment to forget itself. (…) A mind which is constantly trying to forget itself is a mind which is constantly seeking some type of hypnosis, some type of unconsciousness. A mind which dreams or which is constantly engaged (…) is a mind which is constantly escaping from itself; and the mind which is escaping from itself cannot know itself – to know oneself, one has to cut this constant escaping. (…) When the desire is gone, when the very seeking for the enjoyment is gone, then something new happens, then really comes the divine enjoyment, the bliss you are seeking. It cannot come through your occupation; it is impossible – it comes only in an unoccupied mind, in an aware mind. (…) It comes not through your escape from yourself, but through your coming to yourself.

There is nothing like beauty or ugliness; that division is made by our own projections. There is nothing beautiful; there is nothing ugly. Things are; they exist in themselves. Without our projections, they are; simply they are. There is nothing beautiful, nothing ugly. But you can project, and escape from yourself. And we are always thinking about how to escape from ourselves. It has become so burdensome to be oneself; it has become so ugly; it has become so tense to be oneself. (…) in love, in beauty, in films, in wine, in meditation even – we are escaping from ourselves.

If you become aware of your thinking process, then the process by and by is dissolved. If you become aware, if you become aware of your thoughts, the passing, the going, the coming in and the going out of thought – if you become simply aware, a witness, then the process stops by itself.

The mind asking for enjoyment and the mind asking for technique is the mind of a person who is not ready to be aware. He wants to remain in his sleep and to cling to a technique. The technique will become a part of the sleep and will not disturb it, but will make it more convenient, more comfortable, and he will be more at ease in his sleep. The very need, the very asking for a mass technique, is saying that I am not going towards the goal individually.

An enlightened person's words will be spontaneous. They are just coming from the source, fresh and new. These coins are just being minted; they have not been used in the market.

Whenever God descends into someone, he descends in a new way each time; God does not like repetition.

When you have found the Master, service is the discipline; just to be close is enough.

Each man is engaged in two types of journeys. One is the world that is outside him, his earthly destination; the other journey is within himself. Our mortal life may bring success or failure, but it is of no significance; as, when death opens its jaws, man enters it alone, leaving behind all worldly awards and tribulations. The body is reduced to nothingness, to ashes. In the journey within, truth exists as an immortal element. It has no death, because it is indestructible. The inner journey leads to the conquering of all conflicts and to lasting peace.

In the quest for God, one must die daily, so that one may be reborn with added vigour, freshness, and joy.

Man is so allergic to silence, he will do everything to break even another man's silence.

We will keep our eyes downcast all the time, even closed when possible. A wandering eye picks up many unnecessary objects and registers as many unwanted incidents. This can divert attention from our goal. Downcast eyes will give us enough vision not to stumble against objects, and they will protect us from all unwanted sights.

Blissfulness is a transcendence: seeing the duality of life, seeing the constant conflict of polarities in life, one becomes only a witness. The world remains the same, but you are no more the same; you live in the same world, but you are a totally different person. You are reborn. That's exactly the definition of sannyas, a rebirth.

Revolution is concerned with outer things: the economic structure of the society, the political structure, the state. Rebellion is inner; it is concerned with the state of consciousness. Revolution is political; rebellion is spiritual. And a true rebellion transforms you into divinity; it reveals the godhood to you. It makes you aware that you are not the body, nor the mind; that you are nothing but pure consciousness, that you are only a witness. Once this is experienced, realized, life becomes a play. (…) Everything is momentary: one moment it is here; the next moment it is gone. (…) Roses are always there; thorns are always there; (…) but witnessing all, you now have a different vision – everything happens, and yet nothing happens to you. (…) You are on a different plane, a watcher on the hill, alert, clear, transparent, unaffected, untouched – and in the valley, the same world continues. (…) This is what I call divine rebellion; (…) this transcendence is divine rebellion, and sannyas is basically a movement towards such a rebellion.

Wisdom is not knowledge; wisdom is the realization of your interiority. It is not information; it is experience. You cannot accumulate it from others or from scriptures. (…) Nobody can give it to you; you have to arrive at it on your own. It is something hidden in the deepest recesses of your being; you have to discover it. (…) To look in is the first and the last step of intelligence, because once you look in, there is nothing worth looking out for. (…) All desires simply disappear the moment you look in. Desire simply makes you a beggar, and when desires disappear, the beggar is gone; you become a king or a queen. That's the whole effort of sannyas – to create kings and queens, to give you the key of the kingdom of God. The whole emphasis is on meditativeness, inwardness.

The more intelligent a person is, the more he feels that life has no meaning.

The key to open the doors of existence is love. Love existence, and you will be surprised that existence starts loving you, because whatsoever we give to existence comes back a thousandfold. Become a lover, and you will find that you have become the beloved.

First is meditation – first go in; second is love – love more and more, become love itself, because that which is in is also out; that which is within is also without. But one has to start by knowing oneself first; then it becomes possible to know the Whole that surrounds one. (…) Every person is carrying a deep secret; every person is a miniature existence, a temple of God. But begin from the very beginning; begin with yourself.

A man of love is bound to become a sannyasin. To be a sannyasin means to live at peace with existence, in deep love and joy and celebration.

You cannot depend on bliss; you have to create it. It is not ready-made, available somewhere; you have to live in such a way that you start attaining to blissfulness. (…) When the misery-creating pattern is dropped, naturally you start feeling a new kind of lightheartedness, a cheerfulness. (…) you start living in a new way; that life I call sannyas. Sannyas is a radical change, a total change from misery to bliss. (…) Once the rocks are removed, your consciousness becomes a stream – it starts flowing; it starts moving towards the ocean, towards the Ultimate.

The false gods are the gods that man has manufactured; the true God is the God that has to be discovered. You cannot believe in the true God; all beliefs lead to false gods. (…) The people who believe in gods remain as false, as pseudo, as their gods. (…) The whole world has been transformed into hypocrisy by the priests, by the so-called great religions, because they are all based on belief, and belief is blind. One needs experience of one's own; only trust your experience, then you are on the right track. In trusting your own experience, you will come closer and closer to truth. And when the trust in oneself becomes absolute, unwavering, God is revealed.

One cannot achieve contentment directly; one can try, but one is bound to fail. The more you try to be contented directly, the more discontented you will become. (…) Achieve love, and contentment comes as a shadow. Become love, and you will find contentment following you.

Unless the mind finds new desires and new objects, it cannot exist. The mind exists through desiring, so it goes on creating new objects for you to desire and to rush towards. You are running after shadows; you are running after illusion; (…) you are running after the horizon which exists nowhere – the distance between you and the horizon will always remain the same. (…) Your whole life has become a long, long anguish, anxiety, tension. My message to you is, drop desiring. There is nothing to be sought; there is nothing worth desiring. Let the future disappear from your being.

Without love, life is a burden. Without love, one simply drags oneself. Without love, there is nothing worthwile. Without love, if you try to dance, your dance will be false and phony, and it will simply tire you – it will not nourish you; it will not rejuvenate you. (…) Learn the secret of love, and you will know the secrets of life. (…) drop the ego, and love starts overflooding you. (…) Love is the path, and the ego is the hindrance.

Peace cannot be cultivated from the outside; it has to grow within you. It has to be your fragrance, your conscience – not your character. One can become a man of peace by cultivating a certain character, by imposing a certain discipline, but deep down, there will be turmoil, and all that is repressed will wait to take revenge. If something is cultivated from the outside, it always divides you into two; then, the outer and the inner are always in conflict – that is the root cause of all schizophrenia. Schizophrenia is not a disease that happens to a few people; it is almost the normal state of humankind. And the reason is that we have been told to cultivate good qualities: virtue, peace, love – but all these things are impossible to cultivate; you can only pretend. You will be phony, and to be phony is to be in hell; to be phony is to be as far away from God as possible. (…) The peace has to arise out of deep meditation. You are not to bring it; it has to happen to you. And if you can be meditative, if you can learn how to be silent, without thoughts, then peace is a natural atmosphere around you. It is a climate that follows you wherever you go; it becomes your shadow.

Without bliss, one is like a boat without anchor or course, tossed about on the ocean of life. Without bliss, man is without any shelter, accidental, driftwood; without bliss, man lives a life of unrootedness. (…) Bliss creates a citadel around you. Bliss protects you; (…) bliss keeps you alive. (…) Bliss is hidden somewhere inside us, in our deep unconscious. It is hidden like a treasure; it has to be unearthed. That's the whole process of sannyas – unearthing the treasure that you are and that you are meant to be.

The Western idea of God is that of a creator, a serious actor. The Eastern idea of God is that of a player, a nonserious player – existence as a play of consciousness. That's why in Eastern religion, there is no idea of original sin. There cannot be; they won't fit together. The idea of leela and the idea of original sin cannot fit with each other. (…) In the West, God has to be obeyed word for word – a little mistake, and you fall from grace. But in the East, there is no idea of God as a dictatorial force; He is just a player. And He is not outside you; He is inside you – He is inside everybody. (…) There is no question of original sin; there is no question of sin at all. Yes, mistakes are possible in a game, but you cannot commit sins. Errors are possible, but you cannot be condemned for errors and mistakes – they are human. Hence the Eastern God is tremendously compassionate.

In Japan, they make a particular doll; the doll is called a daruma doll. Daruma is the Japanese name of one of the greatest Buddhas of the world, Bodhidharma; from dharma comes daruma. The doll has a beauty about it – you can throw it any way, but it always lands up in a Buddha posture. (…) You can throw it upside down, but it will always come rightside up. That doll is a beautiful message. It says that that's how a Buddha behaves – you cannot offend him; you cannot topple him. Whatsoever you do, he is always okay. He is always in his stillness, in his silence. This is possible only if life is taken as a play, leela.

If you are in love, you are naturally, spontaneously creative; if you are not in love, you are not only uncreative – you become destructive. (…) Creative means that you become a vehicle to God – you are no more there; God functions through you. (…) Love is my fundamental approach towards life. (…) If life is looked at through the eyes of logic, even life disappears, and there is only matter left. (…) Matter is meaningless; matter can't have any meaning. Meaning needs consciousness. Look through love, and matter disappears, and we are living in an ocean of consciousness. With that vision, oceanic joy arises in you, unbounded, infinite; and out of that joy is creativity. (…) The very awareness that God exists brings honor; nothing else can do it. The moment one feels oneself surrounded by God, then there is glory in life, great splendor.

Man is a potentiality, a possibility. (…) We make birth synonymous with life; that is our fundamental misunderstanding. Birth is only an opportunity to be alive; it is not synonymous with life. One can live a very unalive life; one can go on dragging; one can go on moving through life in deep sleep – one can be a somnambulist. (…) To be a sannyasin means being aware of this basic misunderstanding. Once you are aware, you start seeking and searching for a second birth, and the second birth only becomes possible through meditation – hence in old, ancient scriptures, meditation is called the real mother.

Contemplation is a little higher than concentration. (…) Contemplation means an effortless awareness, (…) nonviolent, fluid, relaxed.

To stand out of the mind is ecstasy, and that's what meditation is. (…) A miracle happens with meditation, and it happens only with meditation. When you are standing out, not participating, no longer active in any way, utterly inactive and silent, the mind disappears. Slowly, slowly, it goes farther and farther away; slowly, slowly, you hear only noises coming from a distance; and suddenly, a moment comes – there is no mind. It has faded out; it has withered away. (…) You have come home; you have become fulfilled. The one-thousand-petaled lotus of your being has opened; you have offered your fragrance to existence. That is prayer; that is the only gift we can give to God; and that is the only gift which can be accepted by God.

Unless one is ready to be nothing, love is not possible. Love grows out of your inner nothingness; it is the flowering of nothingness. (…) The basic requirement is to experience yourself as nothing. That's what meditation is all about – the method of destroying the ego. Once the ego collapses, you come face to face with yourself, and that experience blooms into love. You start overflowing with grace, with compassion. (…) The blissful person is simply showering his bliss continuously.

Man has forgotten the language of love. He lives through competition, conflict, anger, jealousy, possessiveness – and these are the enemies of love; all these poisons destroy the nectar of love. A sannyasin has to drop all that is against love, that goes against love. Slowly, slowly, as the barriers are removed, love starts flowing, because it is our very nature. It is not something to be brought in from the outside; it is already there. There are just a few obstructions which we have to unlearn. Once that happens, love becomes a golden light, (…) a light that not only lights your path, but that can light many other people's paths – a light by which one becomes aware of God's presence. (…) I teach meditation only as a help towards the goal, as a means – love is the goal.

You will soon be able to be in the world and not of the world, and that is the real art of sannyas. Yes, there will be problems and challenges, but each problem can be transformed into an opportunity for growth, and each challenge brings a new sharpness to your intelligence. (…) as your love grows, as meditation grows, as your understanding grows, all those problems become very small, very tiny. (…) And once you have learned how to be blissful, your soul starts growing. Otherwise, it remains a seed; it never becomes a tree. And unless the seed becomes a tree and the tree blooms and brings much fruit, life is a wastage.

The whole attempt to force nature, existence, is futile, because there are secrets which can be revealed only when you are in a non-aggressive mood. There are secrets which are revealed only to the sannyasins, and not to the soldiers. There are secrets which can only be revealed to you when you are absolutely absent – just a nothingness, a prayer, a love, with all the doors and all the windows of your being open… just an awaiting, a receptivity, a womb. Then, one becomes pregnant with the unknown and unknowable God.

One has to be two things: at the center, bliss; at the circumference, love – inside, bliss; outside, love. Love is the outside of bliss; bliss is the inside of love. (…) Both are complementaries – the more you love, the more blissful you become; the more blissful you are, the more you can love. So my sannyasins are not monks; my sannyasins are neither worldly nor otherworldly, because we don't divide – it is one universe, one solid universe. (…) We accept the totality as it is, and we try to live in totality.

Don't be a follower. (…) Transcend all following, and then you can love. (…) In fact, when you follow somebody, you cannot love them. You can respect them, but you cannot love them. (…) When you follow somebody, you feel offended deep down. You will take revenge; you cannot forgive the person whom you are following. Hence, followers betray – a follower destroys his Master, and then destroys himself. That is the whole essence of the story of Jesus and Judas. Never be a follower; (…) be a friend – the relationship between Master and disciple should be a love affair.

Mind is nothing but the name of the whole thought process, and the thought process is the disturbance. It continues day in, day out, year in, year out, life in, life out – it goes on and on. You are waking, it is there; you are asleep, it is there. In waking, you think it is thinking; in sleep, you think it is dreaming – it is the same process. Dreaming is a little more primitive language of thought; thinking is a more sophisticated way of dreaming – (…) but it is the same phenomenon. When there is no dreaming, no thinking, there is peace; then there is no-mind. Meditation means a state of no-mind, a state of peace, and when peace is victorious in you, you are fulfilled; you have blossomed. You have come to know the meaning and significance of life. (…) And when there is no-mind, there is eternity.

If even a single person arrives, the whole existence rejoices. It is not only your victory when meditation happens; it is the victory of the whole existence – it is the victory of God through you.

Don't relate yourself to your past; be discontinuous with it. And it is easier to disconnect oneself with a single blow. In parts, you can never become disconnected, and that's what many people try. (…) The tree has to be cut from the roots if it is to be cut at all. That's what sannyas is; it is totally cutting yourself from the past. Nothing is to be saved. If you try to save something which you think is good, then you cannot drop the bad, because they are together, they have an organic unity. That has to be understood: life is an organic unity; you cannot choose a few pieces and drop a few other pieces. Either you have to drop the whole, or you have to keep the whole. That's the basic meaning of sannyas – that we drop the whole, that we start fresh. Then, we start life from ABC; we become children again.

My effort here is to teach you how to transform love into prayer. Of course, I have to begin from where you are.

One has to become a waterfall of love, a continuous flow, with no conditions attached to it. (…) The sannyasin is just the opposite of a soldier; he lives in let-go, with no competition, with no struggle, with no ambition. The moment your let-go is total, love starts happening. (…) And it has infinite sources; it can never be exhausted. You can go on giving it, and the more you give it, the more you have it.

If one remembers continuously that there is a possibility, sooner or later one starts seeking and searching for it. Unfortunately, many people are not even aware of the possibility.

Belief comes from the outside; (…) faith happens in the heart.

Love and faith have both disappeared from the world. Love exists no more; in the name of love exists lust. Faith exists no more; in the name of faith exists belief. (…) It is only through love and faith that you will be able to give birth to Christ in your innermost being.

Unless man starts seeking and searching for something that is beyond him, bigger than him, his real life has not started.

Once you know how to be harmonious with yourself, you have learned the basic art; now you can easily be in harmony with the whole of existence.

Don't fight with yourself, don't condemn yourself – that is one of my most fundamental teachings. Love yourself, because it is only through love that you will become harmonious, that you will become one. (…) Love yourself and love the Whole; don't divide.

People who love according to tradition, church and state, have no need of God; they have already created their own protections. But the person who rebels against church, state, the past, has no protection other than God. To feel protected by man and man's institutions is a great illusion; the real protection comes only from God. Man is momentary; he himself is going to die; and such is the fate of all the institutions that he creates. Man and his institutions are nothing but dreams. One can befool oneself, but one cannot befool existence. (…) One can live in a fool's paradise, (…) one can remain in this deception and lose one's whole life; when death comes, it is too late. (…) Rebellion against tradition simply means that we no more trust human institutions – we only trust God; we only trust in existence. Existence is our security; existence is our protection. (…) with this trust, you start moving beyond time into eternity.

The ego can exist only in hell; that context is a must for the ego to exist. (…) then you live in an illusory world, surrounded by an ocean of misery. (…) Life is precious only if it is lived in tune with God – otherwise, life is hell; otherwise, life is far worse than death.

My sannyasins have to be creative, because my experience, my observation, is that only by being creative do you come closer to the creator. (…) By being creative, you come closer to the creator; by being non-creative, you go slowly, slowly farther and farther away from the creator. Hence the moments of creation are the moments of prayer. When one is absolutely absorbed in some creative work, one is no more; God is. Then God is flowing through you; then God is creating, not you. You become simply an instrument, a medium, a vehicle. A sannyasin has to be a vehicle for God.

The thirst for real happiness can't be quenched by the ocean of otherness; you have to tap the inner spring within yourself. Those who wait on the seashore for joy are standing on shifting sands. Their happiness depends on others, hence it creates dependence, (…) and the other is not reliable. One has to find happiness which arises within oneself. Then it is true; then it gives you independence. (…) The right direction is inwards.

Words are made to express mundane things. The moment you enter into the dimension of the Divine, words have to be left behind. The divine communion happens in silence. (…) a flame jumps from the Divine to your heart, and you become aflame with God – that is bliss.

Unless you love the existence of God, you have not prayed yet. (…) The only way to praise Him is to love His creation. And love has to become unconditional, without any demand and without any motive. Then, love brings great freedom and great bliss; then, love opens the doors of paradise for you. (…) Love more, and you will be able to see God more; love totally, and you will be able to see God absolutely. (…) Love is the only proof of God.

If beauty has its opposite in ugliness, then it is not real beauty. If truth has its opposite in untruth, then it is not the ultimate truth.

When a man is weak in the soul, he is ready to become a slave; he is ready to become dependent. He can be manipulated, oppressed, exploited, forced to do ugly things that he would never have done if he had a strong spirit. (…) Just strong bodies are not enough; a strong body makes you a strong animal, that's all. A strong spirit is needed; then you start feeling the presence of God. And once the presence of God is felt, you start living authentically from your inner being – then you don't follow any outer commandment; then nobody can exploit you. Yes, they can crucify you, but they cannot destroy your spirit; they can destroy your body, but they cannot destroy you, and one can go to the gallows dancing and celebrating, because one knows that the soul never dies. But this can be known only when the soul is strong enough to know, and except for love, there is no nourishment for the soul. Be loving; be love – (…) let love become your life.

A man who cannot love himself is always in conflict with himself, and to be in conflict is to be in misery. And one who is in conflict with himself cannot be relaxed with existence either. So the first step goes wrong, and the whole of life goes wrong.

To be impotent is not to be celibate; to be poor does not mean that you are beyond desire for riches. (…) And whatsoever you have escaped from will remain a repressed desire in your being. (…) if some opportunity arises, it will assert itself again, forcibly – (…) that is temptation. (…) The true transcendence has to be in the world, amidst the fire of the world.

The man who lives in the mind, and the majority of humanity lives in the mind, lives a very indecisive life. To live through the heart is to live a life of decisiveness, of commitment, of involvement. The heart has an insight of its own, a way of seeing, of understanding of its own. It has its own reasons which our reason is not aware of at all – love is the fragrance of the heart. (…) Drop the logic and live through love; (…) move from the mind to the heart – that's what sannyas is all about.

True love is bound to be blissful; true love and bliss are always together. (…) A miserable person cannot be loving, and a loving person cannot be miserable.

Love is beyond knowledge; beauty is beyond knowledge; God is beyond knowledge. All that is really significant is beyond knowledge. That which is within knowledge is ordinary, mundane, utilitarian, but of no real significance. It can't make you grateful to God. And sooner or later, one starts feeling bored with that which knowledge makes available. It makes only toys to play with, and how long can you play with toys? Sooner or later, one becomes mature. Sannyas is a step towards maturity. (…) All knowledge is intellectual, and the whole of life is existential – hence knowledgeable people go on missing life. Take a plunge into life, and even if one has to drop the whole mind for the plunge, it is worth it, because mind is worthless anyway.

There are only two ways to reach God – one is love, and the other is meditation. Love means dissolving yourself into existence so totally that no ego is left behind; meditation means detaching yourself from the world so totally that you cannot nourish your ego any more. The ego needs the world – the I cannot exist without the thou; the I can exist only in context with others. If there is nobody else, your ego disappears. (…) In love, you merge yourself with the Whole; in meditation, you become a witness of the Whole, so total a witness (…) that the world disappears from your vision. (…) Both ways are different in the beginning, but as you come closer to the peak, they come closer. When you have reached the peak, they are one and the same. (…) If you follow love, one day you attain to meditation automatically; and if you follow meditation, you attain to love automatically. (…) My effort here is to create the great synthesis, to create a religious consciousness which accepts both love and meditation as valid.

Love more and more, for no reason at all, for the sheer joy of it, for the insight that it brings. Love is the bridge between the human and the Divine. If we can love, that is religion enough. More than that is not needed; more than that is superfluous; more than that is pure ritual – it is meant for stupid people. The intelligent person will live a life of love, because that is the only spiritual life. He will not be a Christian or a Mohammedan or a Hindu; he will be simply a lover, a lover of existence. But through his love, he will come to know God; through his love, he will become God.

Knowledge comes through logic; wisdom comes through love. Knowledge is available on the outside, in books, in the universities, but wisdom is not available anywhere except within your own being. For knowledge, you will have to go to others; for wisdom, you will have to dig a well deep into your own consciousness. And the deeper you go, the fresher the water you will find. (…) Knowledge is borrowed, hence it burdens; wisdom is yours, hence it liberates.

Unless one becomes blind to the circumference, one cannot know the center.

When one is oneself, bliss follows as a shadow; when one is not oneself, misery is the outcome. Misery is a distance between you and your real self.

Things that are thought to be prayer are not prayer; they are mere rituals, formalities. (…) Real prayer is nothing but a thankfulness, a deep, deep thank you. It is non-verbal, silent. (…) Your whole being pulsates with gratitude – that is prayer; that is bliss too. (…) Prayer and bliss are two sides of the same coin.

The old has to be destroyed before the new can be built.

The pull of animality is powerful because that is our whole past; we are deeply rooted in it. The pull of the Divine is not so powerful, cannot be, because we have not tasted anything of it. When you live with a Master, when you start imbibing his spirit, every day the pull of the Divine becomes greater and greater. (…) And the moment it is greater than the animal, a transformation happens – you start moving in a direction you have never known existed. And as you start moving into the divine dimension, the animal fades far behind. It remains just a memory, footprints on the sand of time, and slowly, slowly, with the winds they are gone.

Life is a bridge – pass through it, but don't make your house on it. (…) Go on moving, don't become stagnant. (…) Then one is certain to reach the ocean one day.

Knowing is enough to transform you totally, to give you a new lifestyle, to give you a new birth, a new being.

Truth brings transformation, not consolation, and each transformation is a process of great suffering, because one has to change everything that one was before. One has to put everything into a new pattern; one has to start learning and living with a new vision. It is arduous. The mind resists change; the mind wants to go on repeating the old pattern. The mind moves in a vicious circle and it never wants to get out of it; (…) the mind goes on repeating the same thing again and again. (…) Being a sannyasin means taking a jump into the ocean, not looking back, not even giving it a second thought.

Man is capable of becoming a host to God, a home to God. And unless one becomes a host and a home to God, one remains unfulfilled. Without allowing God in, one remains in a deep frustration, because the moment God enters into our being, we become God. That is our ultimate destiny. Only with this fulfillment is there contentment and the joy of arriving.

Unless you have experienced meditation, your potential remains in embryo. Unless one is spiritually born, life remains superficial; it has no depth – it can't have any depth. It's just a tale told by an idiot, full of fury and noise, signifying nothing.

Love as a relationship is a shallow phenomenon. Learn something from it, learn swimming, and then go to the deepest experience of love – love as being.

Sannyas means inner enquiry, (…) a great journey into one's own being, into one's own life source.

Sannyas can be rooted only in trust. Just as doubt is very fundamental to thinking, trust is fundamental to no-thinking. Doubt creates mind, mentation; trust creates no-mind, non-mentation. And no-mind is the goal. To function from a state of no-mind is to function truly, naturally.

Attachment is the root cause of all misery – and our mind is such that it starts clinging to each and everything. It starts becoming identified, attached; it does not know how to keep a distance – hence the misery. (…) Love deeply, but remain unattached. (…) Don't be attached to anything; remain cool, unperturbed, undisturbed.

Whatsoever can be lost is useless, meaningless; what can never be lost is meaningful, significant.

Bliss is not the solution to any particular problem; it is the solution for all problems. Those who try to solve single problems are never going to succeed, because there are millions of problems. You can go on solving; there will be no end to it. (…) One can go crazy in trying to solve problems individually; it is like cutting the leaves of a tree – (…) many people go on pruning the leaves for the whole of their life. (…) the root of all problems is the mind. (…) Become a witness, and you will attain to bliss – and bliss becomes the solution, the ultimate solution.

There are very few men; the crowd consists of machines, biologically produced. (…) Our wakefulness is not much of wakefulness; it is only sleep with open eyes. Real wakefulness comes only through meditation. And the only way to open the inner eye is to start becoming more alert in small ways. (…) Sannyas is the coming out of somnambulism, sleepwalking.

One has to be twice-born – the first birth is only biological; the second birth makes one spiritual. Sannyas is a second birth.

My approach is total. I say, meditation is needed, and I also say, a moment comes when meditation has to be dropped. (…) If you cling to the ladder, even if you have reached the top rung of the ladder, you have not reached the higher plane. Unless you leave the ladder behind, you will not be able to move on the higher plane.

All the religions have been against the woman – not that they were woman-haters, no; they were simply trying to protect the monk, the priest and the popes. Of course, I don't agree with their methodology, because this is not a way to protect; in fact, this makes you more inflammable. A monk who has not touched a woman, who has not talked to a woman, and who has no idea about women, is bound to be more in the grip of his instinct than a man who has lived with women, talked to women, and has been as much at ease with them as with any man. (…) The monks and nuns have been even more in the power of the instinct. If you split your instinct completely from satisfaction, it can become so powerful, almost like a drug, it can intoxicate you – (…) repressed sex can become a boiling hot thing inside the unconscious. (…) My effort is just the opposite of all the religions, because I can see what they have done. The intention was good, but their understanding was not deep enough. I want women and men to live together, to be acquainted with each other's bodies, differences, polarities, so that there is no need for your unconscious to carry something repressed in it. Once your unconscious is completely free of repression, your instinct has a different quality to it; it is joined with intelligence. (…) Once your intelligence and instinct have no conflict, you become man for the first time; you are no longer part of the animal kingdom. And to me, this is what is absolutely needed for anybody who wants to know truth, life, existence, for one who wants to know who he is.

The moment a man is finished with sex as an instinct that is forcing him to do something, he becomes in a certain way a master of himself and he starts having insights, visions which the unconscious, instinctive man cannot have. (…) If you get out of your instinctive level, you are free from the priest, the pope, and the pornographer. The pornographer and the priest are using the same methodology. And they are partners, whether they know it or not, in the same business. (…) The priest creates the business basis, repression; then, the pornographer uses it. I am destroying their business completely. (…) The only way to come to the level of intellect and consciousness is not to repress, but to enjoy everything that nature has given you, playfully, non-seriously. And, as you come to the level of the intellect, you will be soon beyond it – it is just like teddy bears; you cannot go on playing with it your whole life.

The more you love, the more you feel you are going higher in your consciousness. (…) Happiness on the instinctive level is only pleasure; happiness on the level of intellect is joy. When you listen to great music, or when you see a beautiful painting – a sudden upsurge of joy. No animal can enjoy a painting; (…) no animal is capable of enjoying anything that belongs to the second level, your consciousness, because no animal rises to that level – only man, and not all men either. Few men are capable of enjoying things which have no biological purpose. (…) All the painters, all the poets, all the musicians have faced a world which is against them. Why? Because what they are doing is something which has no relationship with the whole world and its life. The love they are talking about is not the love that people are living. (…) To paint a Picasso, you need a certain quality of consciousness; to be a Leonardo da Vinci, you need something that is missing in ordinary mortals. What has he got? The whole grip of biology is not on him. That's why he can devote his whole energy to a new kind of creation – not children, but paintings, poetry, songs, dances, statues. This is non-biological creation; this is conscious creation – he is the master of it. It serves no purpose as far as nature is concerned, but it certainly serves some purpose as far as human consciousness is concerned. (…) Just watching Mahavira's statue, you may fall into a meditative state. That was their original function. They were not made to be worshipped; they were made to make you aware of a certain state. The statue is of a certain state, not of a certain man; that man is irrelevant. (…) music, poetry, can raise your consciousness. They can create the situation for the entry into the third level. Very few musicians have been there, very few poets, very few painters, and very few sculptors are capable of creating such artifacts that can give you a resonance inside you. Gurdjieff has given it a special name; he has called such art 'objective art'.

In the conscious state, you have to find out your own religion; you have to choose. You cannot be born in a religion; that is sheer nonsense. Religion is not something one can be born with. It is a search; you have to find it. It is a risk; you have to go a long way, and you have to risk everything – only then can you get it.

When a question is not yours, no answer can be of any help.

Religion of the intellect (…) is pseudo-religion. Christianity, Judaism, Hinduism, Buddhism, Jainism, Mohammedanism – these are all products of the intellect. They are not magico-religious; they have theologies. (…) This is the pseudo-religious mind. The pseudo-religious mind believes in its own imagination, in its own thinking, and is afraid of anything that goes against it or is even a little different from it. Otherwise, religions would not have been fighting for thousands of years. This is something strange: all religions teach love, and all religions end in hatred. All religions teach the brotherhood of man, but they only create enemies of each other. All religions teach that every man has a potential right to reach God, but practically they say, "Only our religion is the true religion. (…) Unless you follow our way, you have no chance." (…) They seem to be competing shopkeepers; everybody is trying to sell his thing – his holy book, his messiah, his god. Pseudo-religion is always basically afraid, because deep down, the pseudo-religious person knows that it is only his imagination, that he has no actual experience. He himself is not convinced; hence, he needs to convince others, convert others.

On the third level, on the intuitive level, only fingers pointing to the moon… everything becomes inexpressible. But everything becomes visible, tangible.

The instinctive man clings to everything: to sex, to money, to power – to everything. (…) at the instinctive level, everything is an exchange.

An unclean unconscious is hindering you. Clean it; and the way to clean it is to satisfy it, to satisfy it so much that it starts telling you, "Please stop! It is more than I needed!" – only then leave it. And with that, your intellect is filled with such a fresh flow of energy that it turns into intelligence. Then the energy goes on rising and opens the doors of intuition. Then you can see things which are not visible to your physical eyes, things which are not even things. (…) But they are realities only for intuition; they are existential. And once your intuition starts functioning, you are for the first time really a man.

At the center of the unconscious is instinct; at the center of the conscious is intellect; at the center of the superconscious is intuition.

If a man is sane, he will use his intellect to help his unconscious be fulfilled. The sooner it is fulfilled, the better, so that you are free from it. Fulfillment means freedom from it. (…) Use intellect to fulfill your unconscious, your nature, your biology, your chemistry. They are yours, (…) they are part of you, and nature never gives anything without reason. Fulfill it, and its fulfillment is going to make a path for the higher potential. (…) All religious people are hung up with the lowest part of their being; that's why they look so sad and so guilty – they cannot rejoice. (…) to go against your nature creates hell here on earth. (…) All that you need is a clean unconscious. Fulfilled, contented, biology settles; chemistry settles and gives you all the energy that was involved in those planes. The energy shoots upwards by itself, and it stops only at the very center of your superconscious mind. And there, intuition starts functioning.

What is intuition? (…) Intuition is in some ways like instinct, in some ways absolutely unlike instinct; in some ways like intellect, in other ways absolutely against intellect. So you will have to understand, because it is the subtlest thing in you. Intuition is like instinct because you cannot do anything about it. It is part of your consciousness, just as instinct is part of your body. You cannot do anything about your instinct, and you cannot do anything about your intuition. But just as you can allow your instincts to be fulfilled, so you can allow and give total freedom to your intuition to be fulfilled. (…) Intuition can give you answers for ultimate questions – not verbally, but existentially. You need not ask, "What is truth?" Instinct won't hear; it is deaf. Intellect will hear, but it can only philosophize – it is blind; it can't see. Intuition is a seer; it has eyes. It sees the truth – there is no question of thinking about it. (…) Instinct and intuition are both independent of you. Instinct is in the power of nature, or unconscious nature, and intuition is in the hands of the superconscious universe, the consciousness that surrounds the whole universe, the oceanic consciousness of which we are just small islands – or better, icebergs, because we can melt into it and become one with it. In some ways, intuition is exactly opposite to instinct. Instinct always leads you to the other; its fulfillment is always dependent on something other than you. Intuition leads you only to yourself; it has no dependence, no need for the other – hence its beauty, its freedom and independence. (…) In some way, intuition is like intellect, because it is intelligence. Intellect and intelligence are similar at least in appearance, but only in appearance. The intellectual person is not necessarily intelligent, and the intelligent person is not necessarily intellectual. (…) So intuition has something similar to intellect, but it is not intellectual – it is intelligence. The functioning of intellect and intelligence is totally different. Intellect functions through steps, step by step. It has a procedure, a methodology; (…) there are steps to be followed. (…) Intuition functions in a quantum leap. It has no methodological procedure; it simply sees things. It has eyes to see. (…) a man of intuition can see whether there is love in you or not, whether there is trust in you or not, whether there is doubt in you or not. He can see them as if these are things. In my religion, intuition holds the highest place.

The movement of human consciousness from darkness to light, from unconsciousness to consciousness, is the greatest revolution there is. Everything in human life changes, even with a slight movement in consciousness. All depends on where your consciousness is.

The primitive man is still within you, because the unconscious is still within you. The primitive man disappears only with the disappearance of the unconscious. When your unconscious and conscious become one, your whole mind becomes consciousness; then there is no way to fall back to the primitive man. Otherwise, nine times more than the civilized man is the primitive man inside you. Any time your conscious mind starts failing, your intellect starts failing, you fall into the mumbo-jumbo of the primitive.

Before death occurs, the whole energy will shrink. Before one embarks on a new journey, the energy which is otherwise dispersed all over the body will return to a point. This is the same as when one moves from a house – he collects all his important belongings. When he lived there, all kinds of things were spread out in every part of the house, from the bathroom to the living room. So at the time of moving, he sorts his possessions. He throws away the junk, packs up the important stuff, and sets out on a new journey. Just as we abandon one life, one body, and commence the journey of another life, another body – similarly the consciousness which was spread out withdraws and once again becomes the seed. Up to now, it functioned as an actuality; now it will once again become a potentiality, because now, like a seed, it will enter a new body. (…) All journeys begin with the seed and end with the seed. Remember, that which is the beginning is also the end; the journey's cycle ends where it started. (…) So, at the moment of death, consciousness would gather at the very center you have lived through all your life. It would converge to, concentrate at the center which was most valuable to you in your life, because that was your most active center; one should say, that was the very point from where your whole vital energy functioned. (…) The place where a man dwelt the whole life will be the place from where he will depart. Therefore, a yogi can leave from the agya chakra, and a lover from his heart chakra. The life energy of an enlightened man would leave from the sahasrar, the seventh chakra. The point from where one makes an exit is the conclusive proof of how one has lived his life. (…) The soul will use the same door for entering another body which it used for exiting the dying body – (…) that's the only door it knows. Therefore, the mental condition of the father and the mother, as well as their state of consciousness at the time of intercourse, determine what kind of soul will enter the womb, because only that type of consciousness, that kind of soul will be attracted to seek that womb which fits with the center closest to the minds of the father and mother during the intercourse. If two individuals who have gone deep into meditation make love not with the desire for sexual pleasure, but as an experiment in giving birth to a soul – they can make use of the highest possible chakras for that purpose. This is the reason why the higher souls have to wait for a long time – because they need a womb of a higher quality, which is very difficult to find. (…) The same is the case with many of the evil souls. The ordinary souls are born right away.

Politics needs no other qualifications except one – that is, a deep feeling of inferiority. Politics can be reduced almost into a maxim: politics means 'will-to-power'.

Every child has to forget his innocence; every child has to get lost in the world. Every child has to go astray, has to make many, many mistakes, has to suffer, has to pass through pain and pleasure and all kinds of dualities, so that one day he can again start feeling a great longing to go back home. Lost in the deserts of the world, a longing arises one day to go back home. That longing is sannyas; that longing is religion.

The world that you have created through your mind is illusory, but there is another world which is not your creation. When your mind disappears, you discover that world – the world of suchness.

Time stops only when you are blissful; time stops only when you are absolutely without mind – conscious, yet mind is not there. (…) It can happen in music; it can happen while watching a sunset; it can happen while you are painting. But these experiences are rare; (…) to be a musician of such caliber that you can lose yourself (…) is a rare phenomenon; it happens only once in a while.

Buddhas in the East have been saying that your fetters may be made of gold or iron, but fetters are fetters – you are chained, you are a prisoner. You can only be free when you are free of all fetters; made of iron, made of gold – all fetters, all chains, have to be dropped. Then, a third phenomenon becomes possible – moksha, nirvana. (…) it simply means getting free of both heaven and hell, because both are dreams.

The really awakened person has no ideas. Nothing is good for him, and nothing is bad; things are as they are. He simply lives in the suchness of existence, in tathata. He does not follow a certain morality, because there is nothing immoral, nothing moral for him. He lives moment-to-moment, spontaneously, without being bothered about what is right, what is wrong, about what to choose and what not to choose. He lives in choiceless awareness, and he acts out of choiceless awareness. Then whatsoever happens is good.

Desire is the energy of life; desire is life. (…) If all desires are destroyed, then you have committed suicide, spiritual suicide. (…) Then what do I mean when I say, be free of desire? (…) to be free, totally free, to have or not have desire. Desire should not be an obsession – that is the meaning. (…) And then, you will have both the creativity, the celebration, the joy of desires, and the silence and the peace and the calmness of desirelessness.

Chaos is not there outside, but inside. (…) The stars are moving in a rhythm; the whole existence is rhythmic – it is in absolute accord. It is just man's mind which is in chaos. And if you see any chaos outside, that is man-made, man-created. Man remains a chaos unless he becomes a no-mind. Mind is chaos; mind is bound to be a chaos – and you have become identified with it. What is mind? Past plus future; (…) memories and imaginations, desires, hopes. (…) Everybody is insane inside. We don't call anybody insane unless he moves too much to the extreme, but the difference between insane people and the so-called sane is only of degree – and anything can trigger it. (…) The psychiatrists, the psychotherapists, all function to keep you within limits. They keep you normally abnormal; that is their function. They are agents of the society, just as in the old days, priests were agents of the society. Psychotherapists are the new priests, a new priesthood which functions to keep this society running, which keeps this society believing that everything is okay. But nothing is okay. (…) People are in a mess! They are just keeping face somehow, managing a façade, pretending that everything is okay. (…) Everybody is on the verge of a breakdown, and anything, any accident, can push you into the world of the insane. You are getting ready; you are always getting ready. The more sensitive you are, the more alive you are, the greater the possibility that you may go insane.

We learn from chaos only if we go inwards, if we enter into the chaos consciously, deliberately, knowingly. If we encounter the chaos, we learn – there is no other way of learning. It is really out of this chaos that stars are born; it is out of this chaos that Buddhas are born – but you have to encounter it. And we go on doing just the opposite; we go on hiding it, covering it. We don't want to show it to anybody, and we don't want to see it ourselves. We are so frightened; we are so scared. We are afraid that we may not be able to manage; we are afraid that if we go in, we may not be able to come back. So we cling to anything on the outside; any excuse is enough to cling. We go on clinging to something or other; we just go on avoiding ourselves. The person you are avoiding the most in your life is you. Your whole life is managed in such a way that you never come across yourself.

To face yourself, in the beginning it is a breakdown, but if you are moving into it consciously, soon the breakdown becomes a breakthrough. To transform breakdowns into breakthroughs is the whole function of a Master. The psychotherapist simply patches you up; (…) he makes you function as your old self again. (…) It is the greatest adventure in life to go through a breakdown consciously. It is the greatest risk, because there is no guarantee that the breakdown will become a breakthrough. (…) Your chaos is very ancient, thick and dense; so when you enter into it with your small capacity, of course, there is danger. But without facing this danger, nobody has ever become integrated; nobody has ever become an individual, indivisible.

Sooner or later, you feel frustrated, but your frustration never teaches you anything. It is very difficult to learn anything. If one life experience has failed you, then you start looking to other life experiences. (…) One dream is shattered; you go on dreaming another dream. (…) Have a look at your mind. Try to understand how you go on rationalizing and deceiving yourself. And you cannot understand what I am saying unless you rise a little higher from the state of consciousness where you are right now. If you want to see more, you have to rise a little higher. The higher you rise, the more you can see. And when you reach the ultimate height, Buddhahood, you can see everything. And in that clarity, sex is the most stupid thing, because it keeps you in bondage the longest. I am not condemning it; I am simply stating a fact – it is your bondage. It keeps you unconscious; it does not allow you to see what you are doing; you are possessed by it. (…) Sex becomes a tantric experience when meditation is added to it.

Zen says, whatsoever you have done has been in a dream – wake up, and it is finished. It is not that when you wake up, you first have to undo what you have done in your dream – just by waking up, all dreams are finished. Knowing that they were dreams is to end them.

Deconditioning is possible only through negations, never through affirmations. Affirmation is the way of conditioning the mind; (…) all affirmations are conditionings. (…) Affirmations mean that you are repeating something constantly, creating an atmosphere of autohypnosis. (…) You have to negate: neti neti, neither this nor that. You have to go on negating till nothing is left to negate. When there is absolute emptiness and no content is left to be negated anymore, this is the state of a deconditioned mind. A deconditioned mind is not a mind at all; it is a no-mind. And how can you achieve a no-mind through affirmations?

You are surrounded by many darknesses: greed, anger, jealousy, lust, ambition, ego. These are layers of darkness. If you start fighting with all these layers of darkness, you are not going to win, because there is no way to fight with darkness directly. (…) do something with the light; forget about darkness. (…) Become aware. (…) Let consciousness be your master and mind your servant. (…) The moment you become awake, the Master comes in – and the servant immediately understands that the Master has come in. Simply be the Master, and the servant bows down.

The ego is a doer. When you are in a state of non-doing, the mind has to cease, the ego has to disappear. Non-doing is the death of the mind and the ego. That is the meaning of zazen.

Life has to be light; (…) seriousness is not a good thing.

Religion is not a desire for God; it is an experience of godliness.

Truth, even if crucified, becomes victorious; and lies, even if crowned, are bound to be defeated. That is the ultimate law, (…) the eternal law of existence.

To go mad, you need some intelligence in the first place; to lose it, you have to have it! Only very intelligent people can commit suicide – and these are the same people who can become sannaysins. The same people who can commit suicide can become sannyasins, for the simple reason that they have seen that this life is useless. Now either they have to find another life, another way of living, or it is pointless to continue. And they have courage enough, guts enough.

I am taking you slowly, slowly, to the cliff – and once you are there, I will push you.

There is only one courage, and that is the courage to go on dying to the past, (…) to drop the known and to move into the unknown. And it has to be done not only once; it has to be done every moment, every day, till the very last moment of your life. (…) Courage means courage to drop knowledge, courage to be innocent again, courage to function from a state of not-knowing. I don't know of any other courage. (…) Courage to me means courage to be intelligent against this unintelligent crowd that surrounds you. Courage means fearlessness. The society will try in every way to force you according to its ideas. It is better to suffer than to compromise, because through suffering, your soul will be born. Through compromise, you may save your skin, but your soul will be lost. (…) Courage means to be an individual; courage means to be a lion, not a sheep. (…) Courage means the courage to be free; courage means freedom. And if you reduce it to the essential core, it is in fact dying to the past.

As far as existence is concerned, meaning is totally irrelevant, and so is meaninglessness. Meaning and meaninglessness are human inventions, two sides of the same coin – existence is beyond meaning. (…) Rise above both meaning and meaninglessness, rise above duality; and then there is a great serenity.

To be lost, utterly lost, is to be at home. (…) The death of the old and the birth of the new are two sides of the same coin, two processes which happen simultaneously. (…) Start looking at the new; (…) you will need a little time to be introduced to it, to become acquainted with it. (…) Slowly, slowly, the new will become settled; the old will become just a fading memory, a dream that you had dreamt while you were asleep. (…) And slowly, slowly, it will go so far away from you that it will become difficult even to recollect it. Then the discontinuity has happened totally – your umbilical cord is cut; you are really out of the womb of the past. You have started breathing on your own, in a new way, as a nobody. It feels strange to be impersonal, but to be impersonal is the only way to be universal. Not to be is the way of being; (…) if you choose to be, you will have to pass through the process of non-being.

Unhappiness is the incapacity to understand life, the incapacity to understand oneself, the incapacity to create a harmony between oneself and the existence. Unhappiness is a discord between you and reality; something is in conflict between you and existence. (…) When there is harmony, when everything is flowing without any conflict, smooth, relaxed, then you are happy. Happiness is possible only with tremendous intelligence, with great understanding, an understanding like the peaks of the Himalayas – less than that won't do. (…) Happiness is when you disappear; unhappiness is when you are too much. You are the discord; your absence will be the accord. (…) Unless you feel a point of immortality in whatsoever you are doing, you cannot be happy, and that point of immortality is felt only when you create immortality within yourself. Gurdjieff used to say, and very rightly, that man is not born with a soul. (…) And unless you create a soul, you will not have any soul; you will exist empty, and you will die empty. You will have to create a soul, and that's why I say that great intelligence is needed. (…) To be intelligent is arduous; it will need tremendous effort on your part. You will have to destroy much that is rubbish within you; you will have to create almost a fire of consciousness, so that what is useless is burned, and only that which is pure gold is saved. Very few people are ready to go through that hardship, through that discipline which creates intelligence. (…) to be intelligent is difficult; it costs much; you have to put at stake whatsoever you have – it is a cross. In fact, you have to die to be intelligent, because only when you are reborn will you be intelligent, not before it. And the cross has to be carried on one's shoulders; nobody else can carry your cross. You will have to carry your cross to your own Golgotha; there is no other way. (…) People remain unintelligent because if you know, if you start understanding, it will be almost impossible to endure the life that you are living. You are living in hell.

Love is spiritual; duty is moral. Love is of the transcendental; duty is of the worldly. (…) Feel thankful, feel loving, deep in gratitude, and go on your way. Try to create more awareness and understanding and intelligence. Radiate with intelligence to express your gratitude – there is no other way.

If you love, you will have to use imagination, dreams, the faculties of dreaming, of auto-hypnosis; if you meditate, you will have to drop all the dreaming faculties, auto-hypnosis, imagination – the directions are diametrically opposite. (…) For the path of meditation, love is the test. They are two sides of the same coin, two aspects of the same energy.

Let this be a fundamental rule of life, one of the most fundamental: whatsoever you are towards yourself, you will be towards others.

A man of meditation comes to a point where there is no temptation left. (…) Temptation never comes from without; it is the repressed desire, the repressed energy that creates temptation. Temptation comes from within you; it has nothing to do with the without.

You must still be enjoying your dreams, your fantasies, because the mind stops immediately the moment you stop enjoying it. There is no other way to stop it. It is just like a bicycle: you go on pedaling, it goes on moving. If you stop pedaling it, it may go a little further because of the past momentum, but then it will stop. Mind needs constant co-operation, constant infusion of energy from your side, constant identification. The mind needs your help; (…) it cannot run on its own accord.

Discipline is not from the outside; nobody else can discipline you. Discipline is from the inside; discipline is an understanding. (…) To become a disciple means to surrender voluntarily; (…) a disciple is one who surrenders according to his own heart.

It is impossible to understand what the awakened ones say unless you are also awakened. (…) When you listen to the awakened ones, you will have to learn to understand their language, not according to you, but according to them.

Once a man becomes awakened, he cannot come back; (…) there is no possibility of his being born again. One can be born only if something in him has still remained unconscious. Life is an opportunity to become conscious. It is a school, a training school, where people become centered, rooted, integrated. Once they have become integrated, once they have attained self-realization, they cannot be allowed back into the school – they disappear into the universal; they become part of God.

Go on passing through all kinds of experiences, and then you will know that one can pass through the world uncontaminated, uncorrupted. One can live in the palaces without clinging, then he is a sannyasin; and one can live in a hut and cling to the hut, then he is not a sannyasin. That's why I don't tell you to renounce the world; I simply say, be watchful. That is the essence of Buddha's message.

A man of Zen walks in Zen and sits in Zen. Whether he speaks or acts, whether he is silent or inactive, his body is always peaceful. He smiles, looking straight at the sword which takes his life. He keeps his balance even at the moment of death. (…) I love the statement that the 'man of Zen walks in Zen and sits in Zen' for the simple reason that meditation cannot be just a part of your life. You cannot make a fragment of your life meditative; it is not possible to be meditative for one hour and then non-meditative for twenty-three hours. It is absolutely impossible; if you are doing that, it means that your meditation is false. Meditation can either be a twenty-four-hour affair, or it can be nothing at all. It is like breathing – (…) you have to go on breathing; even while you sleep, you have to go on breathing; even in a deep coma, you have to go on breathing. Meditation is the breath of your soul; (…) meditation is the life of the soul. (…) Zen is another name for meditation.

Like this cup,
You are overfull of your own opinions and speculations.
How can I show you Zen
Unless you first empty your cup?

Only children are intelligent. And if you can retain your childhood, if you continuously reclaim your childhood, you will remain innocent and intelligent. If you gather dust, childhood is lost; innocence is no more – the mind has become dull and stupid. Now you can have philosophies, and the more philosophies you have, the further away you are from the Divine. A religious mind is a non-philosophical mind; a religious mind is an innocent, intelligent mind. The mirror is clean; the dust has not been gathered; and every day, a continuous cleaning goes on. That's what I call meditation.

Mind is always in a hurry; mind is always in search of instantaneous realizations. To wait, for the mind, is very difficult, almost impossible.

The ego is always an effort to go upstream. (…) The ego is nothing but all the tensions that you have created around yourself. (…) This false self that we go on carrying in our lives like a flag is always in danger of being damaged; it is very fragile; it is very weak – it has to be; it is man-made. (…) Hence the fear, continuous fear that, 'I may be lost, my self may be destroyed'. A continuous fear goes on trembling in your being; you can never be certain about this false self of yours – you know it is false. You may avoid the fact, but you know it is false.

Strength is possible only when the wave knows that it is a wave of a great, infinite ocean. (…) Drop the ego, and infinite strength starts flowing through you. By dropping the ego, you become a river; you start flowing; you start melting; you start streaming – you become alive. All life is of the Whole; if you are trying to live on your own, you are simply being stupid. It is as if a leaf on a tree is trying to live on its own; not only that, but fighting the tree – fighting other leaves, fighting the roots, thinking that those are all inimical to itself. (…) The only way to come home is to surrender.

The Master illuminates and confirms realization. (…) He begins by illuminating, and ends by confirming. (…) His confirmation is as much needed as his illumination. (…) The Master is evidence of truth; (…) the Master is living evidence of truth. (…) The Master helps you to reach your own experience. He does not give you the Vedas, the Koran, the Bible; he throws you to yourself. He makes you aware of your inner sources, (…) of your own godliness. He liberates you from the scriptures; he liberates you from the interpretations of others; he liberates you from all belief, speculation, guesswork. He liberates you from philosophy and from religion and from theology. He liberates you, in short, from the world of words. (…) He brings you to a state of wordless silence. The failure of religion and philosophy is that they all become substitutes for the real experience; beware of it!

Knowledge functions as a wall; innocence functions as a bridge.

Knowledge is introduced to the mind after physical birth; knowing is always of the present. (…) Knowledge is always of the past; the heart of knowing is now – (…) knowing is your nature. (…) The state of not knowing is really the state of knowing, because when all knowledge and all ignorance have disappeared, you can reflect existence as it is. (…) I go against the society; I can't help it. The whole structure of society is rooted in knowledge, and the Master's function is to destroy both knowledge and ignorance, and to bring back your childhood. (…) Society has forced you to forget; my work here is to help you to remember.

The stupid person says, "I know"; the intelligent person comes to know that "I don't know". But there is a transcendence of both when only silence prevails. Nothing can be said; nothing can be uttered.

Enlightenment is not an achievement; it is a recognition – it is already there. (…) You are already enlightened; you are just not aware of it. Enlightenment is awareness of that which is already the case.

When the question has disappeared, then you know. But that knowing is not an answer – it is an existential experience. Nothing can be said about it; or whatever will be said, will be wrong – to say anything about it is to falsify it. It is the ultimate mystery, inexpressible, indefinable. (…) But you know; (…) you are knowing itself. (…) When the question evaporates, one is sitting silently, doing nothing, not even meditating. One has forgotten the question; (…) it is no more. One is pure silence. (…) No answer, no question – this is it. Ah, this!

I am not saying that you are not to use the mind; I am saying don't be used by the mind. Right now, the mind is the master, and you are only a slave. Meditation makes you a master, and the mind becomes a slave – (…) your consciousness should be the master. (…) And the same is the case with the ego – don't be identified with it, that's all. (…) as far as the world is concerned, you have to function as an ego – but that is only utilitarian. (…) Remember that you are part of the Whole; you are not separate from it.

Move towards prayer, because only prayer will give you real contentment; only prayer will make you aware of the divinity of life – (…) it is a path towards God.

An intelligent person does not function out of his past experience; he functions in the present. He does not react; he responds. Hence, he is always unpredictable; one can never be certain what he is going to do.

Come closer, spiritually closer. Bring your being, unafraid, closer to the Master, closer to his light. (…) Remember, you will have to pass through three stages. (…) The first step is that of a student, curious but still a spectator, far away, collecting information, knowledge. The second step is that of a disciple, no more a spectator, but a participant; no more interested in knowledge, but tremendously interested in knowing. And the third step is that of a devotee, utterly one with the Master, partaking of his being, drinking out of his inexhaustible source. (…) Only the devotee understands absolutely; the disciple understands a little bit; the student only hears mere words.

This is my observation: that true sannyas happens only when you have come to the verge of suicide. When you see that the outside world is finished, then there are only two alternatives left: either commit suicide and be finished, because there is nothing worth living for anymore; or turn in. (…) Sannyas and suicide are two aspects of the same coin. If you are focused and obsessed with the outside, then suicide; if you are a little loose, flexible, then sannyas. But a Master cannot be diplomatic; he has to create this crisis in which suicide is possible – and also sannyas, also transformation, also a new birth. But a new birth is possible only when you die to the old, when you die to the past.

I have to be hard! I have to be as hard as possible, because your sleep is deep, and it has to be shattered. I have to hit your head with a hammer; otherwise you are not going to wake up. For centuries you have been asleep; sleep has become your nature. You have forgotten what awareness is, what to be awake means.

In the first type of man, the man of no-mind, the mind has left; the mind has become tired. The mind has come to realize that, "This man has gone beyond, beyond my powers. Now this man cannot be exploited anymore. This man has become utterly unidentified with me; he will use me, but I cannot use him". The second type of man, who is in between, sometimes falls back into the old pattern, is used by the mind, sometimes gets out of the old pattern. It is hide-and-seek. Mind is still not absolutely certain that it has failed; there is still hope, because once in a while, the man starts listening to the mind, becomes again identified. The distance is not great; the mind is very close. Any moment, any moment of unconsciousness, and the mind takes over, starts bossing over him again. This is the second type of man, the meditative man, who has known a few glimpses of the eternal. (…) To see the Himalayas from a distance is one thing; to be on the peak, to abide there, is quite another. The first type of man abides in no-mind; the second type of man has glimpses only. (…) Once you have seen the peak, even from thousands of miles away, the invitation has been received. Now you cannot remain in the world, at rest, in the old way. Something starts challenging you; something starts calling you forth. And adventure has taken possession of you; you have to travel to the peak. It may take years, maybe lives, but the journey has started. The first seed has fallen into the heart. (…) The Master behaves in a different way with both types of man – with the man of no-mind, communion is possible; with the meditative man, communication is possible. (…) And then, there is the third type of man – the man who lives identified with the mind, with the ego, with whom even communication is not possible. (…) The third type of man is obsessed with something which he is not; (…) the third type is metaphysically ill. If you ask the awakened one, then the third type is mad, insane. (…) But this is the situation of ordinary humanity. (…) The highest quality man becomes a devotee; the middle quality man becomes a disciple; the lowest quality man remains for years, for lives, just a student. (…) From mind to no-mind is the revolution of sannyas.

Truth liberates; everything else becomes bondage.

How can you talk nonsense? – What else? Sense cannot be talked; only nonsense is left. So I don't take it as a criticism; it is a compliment. Many, many thanks to you.

At the center, everybody is the same. When you meditate, you move towards the center. In the deepest moments of meditation, all differences disappear. You are universal there, not individual. And you have to be both, individual and universal. And you have to be very flexible and fluid between these two. (…) A person should become capable of living on the circumference and at the center easily. He should be able to move from the marketplace to the meditative space, and from the meditative space to the marketplace – with no problem, playfully, easily, spontaneously.

Meditation means seeing, becoming aware, that the old fears are no more, that the old days are over, that there are just old habits left. Snap out of it with as little fanfare as possible; don't make much fuss about it. Because you make much fuss about it, so many therapies have evolved. (…) But they are not needed by intelligent people. (…) That's why in the East we have not developed any therapeutic models like the West, for the simple reason that we came to understand one thing: that all that is needed is a little intelligence, and everybody has it. And meditation helps the intelligence to become sharp. Just seeing is enough; seeing brings transformation.

Maturity is of consciousness, not of intellectuality. It is not of knowledge; it is of innocence.

Self-cultivation is a time-path; it has nothing to do with eternity. And truth is eternity. (…) Self-cultivation, ego-cultivation, the refinement of the ego, the polishing of the ego, appears to be a path; it is not – (…) it is a deception, a very alluring deception. (…) One goes on and on in circles, but one never arrives. (…) Worldly desires, other-worldly desires – (…) the goods are never delivered. How long can one remain deceived by them? Even the most stupid person has glimpses, once in a while, that he is chasing illusions which cannot be fulfilled by the very nature of existence – the intelligent one comes to the realization sooner. (…) A man who has lived unconsciously his whole life, his death is going to be the culmination of unconsciousness; he will die in unconsciousness – in death also, he will not be able to disillusion himself. And the person who dies in unconsciousness is born again in unconsciousness – it is a vicious circle; it goes on and on. (…) Unless you become alert and aware in life, unless you change the quality of your living, you will not die consciously. And only a conscious death can bring you to a conscious birth; and then a far more conscious life opens its doors.

Anything that the society respects becomes a nourishment for your ego. And people are ready to do any stupid thing. The only joy is that it will bring respectability. (…) basically, you remain the same, the same old unconscious person. (…) deep down, nothing has changed; nothing can ever change by self-cultivation. (…) basically the mind is the same; it will go on creating the same problem in different ways. (…) the roots have to be transformed; just pruning the leaves is not going to help. And self-cultivation is only the pruning of the leaves.

Enlightenment in an instant is attained; enlightenment is attained in a single moment. (…) Why? Because you are already enlightened; you have simply forgotten it. You have to be reminded, that's all. (…) In a single moment it can be attained, because you have never lost it in the first place. (…) Hence this strange idea that enlightenment happens in an instant. (…) That is the essential message of Zen – that you need not be worried about the past karmas; they were all dream acts. Just wake up, and they are all finished.

Sleeping people can understand a language which appeals to their sleep. We understand only that which triggers some process in our being; (…) we understand only that which we can understand. The other things are not even heard; or even if they are understood, they are misunderstood.

Use everything, but possess nothing; relate with people, but don't become part of any relationship. Relating is one thing; relationship quite another. Relating does not take you into bondage; relationship is a bondage. (…) Relate with as many people as possible, but remain free, and let them also be free of you.

All thoughts are casual; no thought is essential. The essential is silence; thoughts are casual. When thoughts disappear, the essential surfaces; great silence explodes in a tremendous melody. And that experience is liberating; that experience is divine.

On the periphery, everything appears separate from everything else; on the periphery, existence is many. As you come closer to the center, the manyness starts melting away, dissolving, and oneness starts arising. At the center, everything is one.

If your love is without awareness, then it is not love yet. It must be something lower, something closer to lust than prayer.

Consciousness is needed, knowing is needed, a state of seeing is needed, but not knowledge. (…) Knowledge will go on enhancing, decorating, enriching your memory, but not your being. Your being is a totally different phenomenon. In fact, knowledge will create barriers; (…) knowledge creates distance. (…) Not knowing is the most intimate; one has to be innocent. (…) Drop all the knowledge that society has forced upon you. (…) that's what's going on in the families, in the schools, in the universities, in the churches, in the temples – they all serve the past; their function is to perpetuate the dead past. My work here is just the opposite. I am not here to perpetuate the past; hence I am against all knowledge. (…) Knowledge is the greatest deception that society creates in people's minds. (…) I want you to become innocent, seers, knowers – not knowledgeable; alert, aware – not unconsciously clinging to conclusions.

The Buddhas have always been life-affirming, but the religions that arose afterwards have all been life-negative. (…) All the Buddhas have been misunderstood, wrongly interpreted, and whatsoever they were standing for has been forgotten as soon as they were gone, and just the opposite was organized. (…) And it happened again and again. (…) All these life-negative religions have been telling you, directly or indirectly, that this earth is a prison, and you are prisoners. You have been thrown here, thrown into life, to be punished. This is utter nonsense. Life is not a prison; it is a school. You are sent here to learn; you are sent here to grow. You are sent here to become more conscious, more aware. This earth is a great device of God. This is my approach towards life: life is not a punishment, but a reward. You are rewarded by being given a great opportunity to grow, to see, to know, to understand, to be. I call life spiritual. In fact, to me, life and God are synonymous.

Neither Indians nor anybody else is specially spiritual or holy. Spirituality is something that happens to individuals; it is the individual becoming aflame with God. It has nothing to do with any collectivity – nation, race, or church.

The earth is our home, and we have to be earthly. A real spirituality must be rooted in earthliness. Any spirituality that denies the earth, rejects the earth, becomes abstract, becomes airy-fairy. It has no more blood in it; it is no more alive. Yes, Jews are very earth-bound. And what is wrong in having money? (…) Don't cling to it – (…) clinging to anything, anything whatsoever, shows distrust, anxiety: tomorrow also, will the money be there? (…) one should not be possessive of money; one should be able to use it. And Jews know how to use it!

Sexuality is a simple, biological phenomenon. It should not be given so much importance. Its only significance is that the energy can be transformed into higher planes; it can become more and more spiritual. And the way to make it more spiritual is to make it a less serious affair.

Only man gets bored, because only man is conscious; consciousness is the cause. The more sensitive you are, the more alert you are, the more conscious you are, the more you will feel bored. In more and more situations, you will feel bored. A mediocre mind does not feel so bored; he goes on, whatsoever is. (…) The more alert you become, the more fresh, the more you will feel as if some situation is just a repetition, (…) as if some situation is just stale. The more sensitive you are, the more bored you will become – boredom is an indication of sensitivity. (…) people who live a very animalistic life are less bored. Eating, drinking, marrying – they are not very bored, but they are not very sensitive. They live at the minimum; they live only with that much consciousness as is needed for a day-to-day routine life. (…) Animals are not bored, and Buddhas are not bored – but in the middle, the boredom is there. (…) Thinking people are more bored – (…) they can see that their life is just repetition. (…) Every day, the same office, the same people, the same work; then they come home – the same wife. (…) It is very difficult to see any newness here; everything seems to be old, dust-covered. (…) Watch people walking on the street, and you will see them completely bored. Everybody is bored, bored to death. Look at their faces – no aura of delight; look at their eyes – dust-covered, no glimmer of happiness. They move from the office to the home, from the home to the office, and by and by, the whole life becomes a mechanical routine, a constant repetition. And one day, they die – almost always, people die without ever having been alive. Bertrand Russell is reported to have said, "When I remember, I cannot find more than a few moments in my life when I was really alive, aflame". Can you remember? How many moments in your life were you really aflame? Rarely it happens. One dreams about those moments; one imagines those moments; one hopes for those moments – but they never happen. Even if they happen, sooner or later, they also become repetitive – (…) by and by, the miracle disappears, and everything settles into a routine. (…) Boredom is the consciousness of repetition. (…) Changing outside things is not going to help – it is just like arranging the furniture in your room again and again. (…) But it is the same room, the same furniture. How long will you deceive yourself in this way?

People who are afraid of being, of disappearing, of moving into non-being, people who are too egoistic and cannot allow their drop to drop into the ocean, say there is no ocean. They are fearful people, afraid, scared of life; and this is the trick of their mind, so that they can protect themselves.

The heart may have brought you here. There are desires of which the head is completely unaware; the head is concerned only with rubbish.

Whatsoever you are is being broadcasted every moment. Your neurosis is broadcasted; your madness also. You cannot hide it; all efforts to hide it are futile. (…) Everything is being broadcasted; you are a continuous broadcasting station. (…) You go on hiding, but everything is being declared, continuously, loudly – everything is yours, and everything is bound to carry your signature. (…) If one becomes a little alert, one stops hiding; (…) then one simply relaxes.

This is one point to be understood: once you are exposed to others, only then will you be exposed to yourself. If you are hiding from others, whatsoever you are hiding from others will by and by be thrown into the basement of the subconscious mind. Others will not know about it, and by and by, you will also forget about it. But whenever you come within the vision of a perceptive man, everything will be revealed. That is one of the basic reasons why, in the East, the relationship of a disciple to a Master is so valued – because the Master is just like a ray of light, an x-ray, and the disciple exposes himself. And the more the Master penetrates and knows about the disciple, the more the disciple by and by becomes aware of his hidden treasures. (…) I tell you, before a perceptive man, before a Master who has known himself, you will be completely x-rayed. You cannot hide from somebody who has eyes. You can hide from yourself, you can hide from the world, but you cannot hide from someone who has come to know what clarity is, what perception is.

You don't know much about yourself; you know just a fragment about yourself, just the tip of the iceberg. Your knowledge about yourself is very limited – not only limited, it is almost irrelevant. It is so partial, it is so fragmentary, that unless you put it in the context of your whole being, it carries no meaning – it is almost meaningless. (…) This blindness, this deafness, this insensitivity, has to be broken – and nobody else can do it. If somebody else tries, you will be offended; you will feel a trespassing. It happens every day – somebody says something true about you, and you feel humiliated, you feel hurt, your pride is hurt. You want to listen to lies about yourself from others; you want to listen to something which helps your already fixed self-image. You have an image about yourself which is false – it has to be shattered to pieces, because once it is shattered, the reality will rise. If it is not shattered, you will go on clinging to the false.

How can one live without knowing oneself? You go on projecting things on others which have nothing to do with others; they are just hidden inside you – but you project them on others; (…) it is you projecting. Unless you know yourself exactly, you will not be able to know what is real and what is projection. (…) Self-knowledge becomes the door of all knowledge; it is the very base. Without that foundation, all knowledge is just knowledge in appearance; deep down is ignorance.

To cling to a thing is to cling to something which is below you. And if you go on clinging to things which are below you, how can you soar high? It is as if you are clinging to rocks and trying to fly into the sky; or you are carrying rocks on the head, and you are trying to climb the Everest. You have to throw them; you have to throw those rocks – you have to unburden yourself. (…) The higher you reach, the more unburdened you need to be. (…) If you want to fly, you need to be uprooted. You need to be like a white cloud with no roots anywhere – a wanderer.

Even the greatest minds are as much unconscious as you are. As far as consciousness is concerned, great, small and mediocre, all sail in the same boat – even the greatest mind lives under chloroform. Come out of it; make yourself more alert; bring yourself together. Let one thing become a centering, a constant centering in you – and that is alertness, awareness. Do whatsoever you do, but do it consciously. And by and by, consciousness accumulates and it becomes a reservoir of energy.

In Zen, and only in Zen, something of great importance has happened. That is, they don't make any distinction between ordinary life and religious life; rather, they have bridged them both. And they have used very ordinary skills as upaya, as methods for meditation. That is something of tremendous import. Because if you don't use ordinary life as a method of meditation, your meditation is bound to become something of an escape. In India, it has happened; people who become interested in God, they renounced the world – and India has suffered badly. (…) All the great minds of this country became escapists, and the country was left to the mediocres. No science could evolve; no technology could evolve. (…) Japan is the only country where East and West are meeting; Eastern meditation and Western reason are in a deep synthesis in Japan. Zen has created the whole situation there. In India, you could not conceive that swordsmanship could become an upaya, a method for meditation, but in Japan, they have done it; (…) and in doing so, they have brought something very new to religious consciousness.

Anything can be converted into a meditation; (…) one has to function out of no-mind. (…) it makes no difference what you are a master of – the taste of mastery is the same; the flavor is the same. You can become a master of archery, or you can become a master of swordsmanship, or you can become a master just of the ordinary tea ceremony – it makes no difference; the real thing is that you have become a master. The art has gone so deep that you are not carrying it anymore; the art has gone so deep that now there is no need to think about it – it has simply become your nature.

All thinking is out of fear. The more you become afraid, the more you think. Whenever there is no fear, thinking stops. (…) Love dispels fear just as light dispels darkness. (…) Thinking is a sort of inner trembling. When one becomes unwavering, the flame of consciousness remains there, undistracted, untrembling. (…) Everybody is carrying the deathless within. You may know it, you may not know it, but you are carrying it within you – it is already there. Just a slight understanding of it, and your life can be transformed. (…) Everybody is born an emperor, but goes on living like a beggar. (…) And the realization will come to you only if, by and by, you drop your fear. (…) When fear comes, watch it; be face to face with it; encounter it. Look deep into it; gaze into the valley of fear. (…) by and by, the more your eyes become clear, the more your awareness becomes alert, (…) the fear will disappear like a mist. And once fear disappears, sometimes even only for a moment, you are deathless. (…) Then fear disappears, and death disappears, and there arises the tremendously glorious life – what Jesus calls 'the life abundant', or 'the kingdom of God'. The kingdom of God is within you.

If you are a mediocre mind, you may never go mad. (…) But if you are really logical, then the ultimate result can only be madness. (…) Stretch your mind to the very extreme of logic, and you will go mad. (…) finally, you break down; this is the failure of logic. (…) Almost all the great philosophers who are logical go mad. If they don't go mad, they are not great philosophers. (…) Nietzsche went mad; Bertrand Russell never went mad – he is not such a great philosopher; he is in a way mediocre. He goes on living with his commonsense; he is a commonsensical philosopher – he does not move to the very extreme. Nietzsche moved to the very extreme and, of course, then there is the abyss. Madness is the failure of the head, and in life, there are millions of situations where suddenly the head is irrelevant. (…) There are a thousand and one situations where life comes in its total illogicalness. Suddenly, your logical mind stops; it cannot function. (…) Division as such is false; nothing is divided in life. One day or other, the division of either/or breaks down; this situation has to explode.

Logic makes clear-cut boundaries. For clarity, it dissects life into two, into duality. Then clarity is achieved, but aliveness is lost. At the cost of aliveness, logic achieves clarity. (…) But life is illogical; life is wild. In life, contradictions are not contradictions, but complementaries. Life does not believe in the division of either/or; life believes in both. The day becomes night; the night becomes day – they melt and merge. Boundaries are not clear; boundaries are blurred – everything is overlapping with everything else.

What is the madness of a devotee? The center of the devotee's madness is his heart; the center of ordinary madness is the head. The ordinary madness happens from the failure of the head, and the devotee's madness happens from the success of the heart. When logic fails – ordinary madness; when love succeeds – extraordinary madness, the madness of a devotee. (…) a man of love will look mad because you function from the head, and he functions from the heart; the languages are totally different. Love's language is foreign to the head; head and heart are the farthest poles of reality. (…) If a person is mad because of his love, his madness is not a disease – he is a healthy person, in fact the only healthy person, the only whole person, the only holy person, because through his heart, he has again become bridged with life. Now he is no longer fighting; there is no more conflict. He is surrendered; he is in a let-go. He trusts life; he has faith; and he knows that nothing wrong is going to happen. He is not afraid; even in death, he will go on laughing and singing, ecstatic, (…) because death also becomes a door.

The whole is bigger than all the opposites; it is not just a total of the opposites – it is more than the total. This is the higher mathematics of the heart.

Ordinarily, you are not a person; you are many persons. (…) You don't know what your left hand is doing and what your right hand is planning to do. In the morning, you don't know what you are going to do in the evening. You say one thing, but you wanted to say something else, and you will go on saying something else still. You are not a unity; you are a crowd. There are many persons inside you revolving in a wheel, and each becomes, for a time, the king. And in that moment, the king asserts things which he cannot fulfill, because by the time the moment to fulfill comes, he will no longer be the king. (…) in fact, we should not use the word mind in singular. We should not say that you have a mind; that is wrong – only a rare person has a mind. You have minds; you are poly-psychic. The heart, this is a beautiful thing, is always one; it does not know duality – it is a unity. The closer you come to the heart, the one arises, and the many disappear, far away.

Each breakdown can become a breakthrough; (…) use this opportunity of a de-structured state. In that moment, don't be worried that you are going mad; in that moment, slip into the heart. (…) The old structure is gone; now one is no longer in the clutches of reason – one is free for a moment. The modern psychology tries to go on adjusting man back to the old structure. All modern efforts are adjustive, how to make man normal again. The real psychology will do something else. The real psychology will use this opportunity – because the old mind has disappeared, there is a gap. The real psychology will use this interval and lead man towards another mind, that is, the heart; lead him towards another center of his being. (…) Use this opportunity and lead the energy away from the old rotten structure which is falling. Leave the ruin; move into the heart. Forget reason and let love be your center, your target. (…) the failure of the head can become a success for the heart.

A sannyasin is one who has come to understand the futility of the so-called worldly life. A sannyasin is one who has understood one thing – that something needs to be done immediately about his own being. If he goes on drifting in the old way, he will lose the whole opportunity of this life. A sannyasin is one who has become alert that, up to now, he has lived wrongly, has moved in wrong directions, has been too concerned with things and not concerned with himself, has been too concerned with worldly prestige and power, and has not been concerned about who he is. A sannyasin is one who is turning towards himself; (…) the energy is moving back towards oneself. Ordinarily, the energy is moving away from you – towards things, targets, in the world. The energy is moving away from you; hence you feel empty. The energy goes away, never comes back; you go on throwing away energy. By and by, you feel dissipated, frustrated, empty; nothing comes back. (…) The energy is just oozing out every day, and then comes death. Death means nothing else but that you are exhausted and spent. The greatest miracle in life is to understand this, and to turn the energy towards home. (…) This turning-in, parabvrutti, is sannyas. (…) You live in the world, but in a totally different way – now you live in the world, but you remain centered in yourself; your energy goes on returning to yourself. You are no longer out-going; you have become in-going. (…) you become a pool of energy, a reservoir, overflowing, and energy is delight, sheer delight; (…) you are in delight, and you can share, and you can give in love. This is the difference: if you put your energy into greed, into anger, it never comes back – it leaves you empty, exhausted, spent; if you put your energy into love, compassion, it comes back a thousand-fold.

When I say, a good sannyasin, I don't use the word in any moralistic sense; I use it in a more fundamental sense, because to me, morality is just a by-product of awareness, and immorality is a shadow of unawareness. I am not concerned with shadows and by-products; I am concerned with the fundamental, with the essential. So don't misunderstand me. (…) A good sannyasin, a good man, is a man of understanding. A good man is alert, aware, that's all. Awareness is the only value for me; all else is meaningless. (…) When you are aware, you behave according to the law, the fundamental law; when you are unaware, you go on destroying yourself, you go on being suicidal.

Everything changes with your inner change. If somebody changes his within, the without changes totally. My definition of the world is this – you must be living in a deep inner darkness, hence the world. If you light your inner lamp, suddenly the world disappears, and there is only God. The world and God are not two things, but two perceptions of the same energy. If you are unaware, the energy appears as the world, samsara; if you are alert, the same energy appears as God. The whole thing depends on your inner awareness or unawareness. That is the only change, the only transformation, the only revolution that has to be made.

Accept whatsoever you are, (…) because whatsoever you do about it will create more problems, more complexities. (…) Don't create any goals against whatsoever, because these goals are coming from your unconsciousness; they are not going to help. At the most, you can become very tense and pretend that you are the opposite; (…) you can move to the opposite extreme, (…) just trying to prove to the world that you are not whatsoever you are. Please, don't try any foolish thing like that – just accept; one has to accept. Once you accept, and you start understanding, you will see that, by and by, it all disappears. It is not that you become something else – but one day, you simply find that through acceptance, whatsoever you have been has disappeared. There is no fight; there is no resistance – you accept it, and it disappears. (…) The fight is dropped; one forgets all about it. (…) My whole point is: accept life as it is, and don't try to change it into something else. Don't try to change your violence into non-violence, your cowardice into bravery, your sex into celibacy; don't create the opposite. Rather, try to understand the fact of cowardice, and cowardice will disappear. (…) always move through the fact, never against it.

In the West, religion is no longer an accepted enquiry; it is a rejected enquiry. So people go on seeking religious enquiries through vicarious ways.

The more you understand the mechanism of the mind, the more the possibility is that you will not interfere, the more the possibility is that you will be able to sit in zazen, (…) that you will be able to allow meditation to happen. (…) the understanding of the mind will be helpful, otherwise you may go on doing something which helps the mind to continue to function, something which goes on giving cooperation to the mind. The first thing about the mind is that it is a constant chattering. Whether you are talking or not, it goes on doing some inner talk; whether you are awake or asleep, the inner talk continues as an undercurrent. (…) The mind can see only one thing at a time, and the opposite is not possible at the same time. (…) Change the focus – it is very easy if you remain loose, relaxed, flowing, non-serious, playful. (…) You can go on changing your attention between the figure and the background, (…) just as if you were looking at a blackboard. Words are figures; silence is the background. Words come and go; silence remains. When you were born, you were born as a silence. Infinite emptiness you came with; unbounded emptiness you brought with you in life – then you started collecting words. That's why, if you go back in your memory, if you try to remember, you cannot go past the age of four, or three – there comes a point where suddenly there is no memory. Because before the age of four, you were almost empty; words started collecting in your memory after the age of four. Memory can function only where words function; emptiness leaves no trace on you. (…) The day you die, again your words will drop and scatter; you will move into another world or into another life again with your emptiness. Emptiness is your self; (…) the self is silence. Mind means words; self means silence. (…) Silence is your intrinsic quality; (…) silence is meditation. On the background of silence, you go on accumulating words, and the words in total are known as the mind. (…) It is a question of changing the gestalt, shifting the attention from words into silence which is always there.

Paralysis is not meditation; paralysis is not healthy. You can paralyze the mind by repeating a mantra, you can paralyze the body by fasting – there are millions of tricks available to paralyze. (…) You are simply desensitizing (…); you are losing aliveness. (…) It is not meditation – it is just low energy, paralysis, insensitivity, dullness, deadness. (…) Remember, meditation will bring you more and more intelligence, infinite intelligence, a radiant intelligence. Meditation will make you more alive and sensitive; your life will become richer. Look at the ascetics; their life has become almost as if it is not life. These people are not meditators; they are masochists, inflicting violence on themselves, torturing themselves and enjoying the torture. (…) This is sheer nonsense. God is not an ascetic; otherwise there would be no flowers, there would be no green trees, only deserts; (…) there would be no song in life, no dance in life, only cemeteries and cemeteries. God is not an ascetic; God enjoys life – God is more Epicurean than you can imagine. (…) The mind goes on befooling you twenty-four hours a day, and you cooperate with it. Then, in the end, you are in misery; you land in hell. (…) Have a very penetrating eye inside your mind; see what its motivations are. (…) Mind is very cunning, very deceiving; watch out. It can rationalize paralysis as meditation; it can rationalize dullness as transcendence; it can rationalize deadness as renunciation. Always remember that if you are moving in the right direction, you will go on flowering. Much fragrance will come out of you, and you will be creative. And you will be sensitive to life, to love, and to everything that God makes available to you.

Creative people get more easily into meditation and go deeper. (…) People who are in some way creative are always easily transformed into meditators, and people who are uncreative in their life are the most difficult. If you live a repetitive life, the mind has too much control over you – you cannot move away from it; you are afraid. Do something new every day; don't listen to the old routine. (…) Do something new, and the mind will have less grip on you. (…) Remember, whenever you have two things, two alternatives, choose the new one; choose the harder; choose the one in which more awareness will be needed.

At the cost of efficiency, choose awareness; and you will create the situation in which meditation will become possible. (…) Don't be bothered too much about utilitarian ends. Rather, constantly remember that you are not here in life to become a commodity, a utility; you are not here just to become more and more efficient – you are here to become more and more alive, more and more intelligent, more and more happy, ecstatically happy. But that is totally different from the ways of the mind.

Don't allow yourself to run all over the world; be here, now. Catch your mind going somewhere else – it is always going somewhere else; it never wants to be here. (…) Immediately become alert; give yourself a jerk; come back home – come to the point where you are. It is not that this will become meditation, but it will create a situation.

Death is already happening. (…) death is not somewhere in the future, waiting for you – (…) it is a part of life; it is an ongoing process, not in the future, but here, now. Life and death are two aspects of existence simultaneously happening together. (…) Life is not possible without death; death is the very ground on which life exists. Death and life are like two wings of a bird: the bird cannot fly with one wing, and the being cannot be without death – death is an absolutely necessary process for life to be. (…) There are only three mysteries: life, death and love; and all these three are beyond mind. (…) Life and death are like two banks of a river; (…) and between life and death, between the two banks of life and death, flows the river of love. (…) The possibility is there for the river of love to flow, but it is only a possibility – you will have to materialize it. Life and death are there, but love has to be materialized; that is the goal of a human being. Unless love materializes, you have missed; you have missed the whole point of being.

Death is the only certainty; (…) with birth, death has become a certainty. Once this certainty penetrates your understanding, you are relaxed. Whenever something is absolutely certain, then there is no worry. Worry arises out of uncertainty. (…) Once it is certain that you are going to die, then there is nothing to do; then one simply accepts it. And in that acceptance, a calmness, a tranquility happens – the person becomes peaceful. (…) if you can die in total relaxation, the quality of death changes, and your new birth somewhere will be of a higher quality. The quality of birth is decided by death. And then, in turn, the quality of birth will decide the quality of another death. That's how one goes higher and higher; that's how one evolves. (…) A person who is really living is not in any way afraid of death. If you are living rightly, you are finished with death; you are already grateful and fulfilled. But if you have not lived, then the constant worry continues, "I have not lived yet and death is coming. And death will stop all; with death there will be no future". So one becomes apprehensive, afraid; one tries to avoid death – and in trying to avoid death, one goes on missing life. (…) unless you can welcome death, one thing is certain – you have not lived.

Even if all your expectations are fulfilled, you will remain completely unfulfilled. And if your expectations are not fulfilled, then you feel frustrated. (…) Just meditate upon your expectations – if they are fulfilled, you will feel bored; if they are not fulfilled, you will feel cheated. (…) the whole problem arises because you expect. Drop expectations; don't go ahead into the future. Once you drop expectations, you have learned how to live. (…) This is what I call a sannyasin – no past, no future, just at this moment alive, intensely alive, a flame burning from both ends, a torch burning from both ends. This is what let-go is.

Once a man has attained, he has to share. Not that he has to do something to share; he simply finds himself sharing because he cannot do otherwise.

Ego is a resistance, a fight against the Whole – that's why it is a sin.

Lao Tzu says that the truth cannot be said, and the moment you say it, you have already falsified it. The words, the language, the mind, are utterly incapable. Truth defies reason; (…) truth defies ego. It cannot be manipulated; it is utterly impossible for reason to encounter it. (…) So truth cannot be said, and every Master has to create an indirect situation, has to push you towards the unknown. (…) Sannyas is a movement into the unknown; it is a trust. It is not a rational decision; it is an irrational jump.

Giving and receiving are two sides of the same coin. Remember, it is just like inhalation and exhalation. If you exhale deeply, automatically you will inhale deeply. If you want to inhale deeply, you will have to exhale deeply – there is no other way. And life is a balance between exhalation and inhalation. (…) the more you give, give in love, the more you become capable of receiving. And when you give completely, utterly, totally, that is the moment of acceptance, (…) of receiving the true teaching.

Meditation cannot be a part; either it is the whole, or not. (…) Meditation is not an activity – it is a way of life; it is your very being. It has to be constant; it has to be continuous. It has to be there, whether you are walking, eating, even when you are sleeping. It must become a crystallized continuity; only then enlightenment happens, never before it.

Breathing is necessary for the body, and meditation is just as necessary for the soul. Without breathing, the body will be dead; without meditation, the soul will be dead. Gurdjieff used to say: 'Don't believe that you already have a soul. How can you have a soul unless you meditate?' And he was right. When you meditate, for the first time, the soul revives in you. (…) then, you have a different quality; that quality is religiousness.

Life should be a balance between inactivity and activity. If you are completely active, you miss something – you miss the inner. If you are completely inactive, you again miss something – you miss the outer. And the outer has its own beauty; nothing is wrong with it. In the West, they tried to be active, more and more active; activity became the whole pattern of life. They did many things, but the inner core was completely lost, forgotten. In the East, they have been too inactive; (…) to look, to open your eyes in India is really to pass through a very painful experience. The East has become inward and has lost all contact with the outward existence; this is an imbalance. Zen is a perfect balance. A Zen Master meditates, but then he also goes to the woods to cut wood, because winter is approaching. He does many things just like an ordinary man; he is nothing special.

The greatest art is to attain a balance, a balance between all opposites, a balance between all polarities. Imbalance is the disease, and balance is health. Imbalance is neurosis, and balance is well-being.

Neurosis is not a disease; neurosis is mind itself – so neurosis cannot be cured. (…) Mind itself, the very functioning of the mind, is neurotic. (…) Neurosis is bound to follow mind like a shadow; hence all psychiatry fails. (…) People who are in madhouses have private neuroses – they have tried to attain their own style of neurosis; they are individualists. (…) You have a mass neurosis – that's why you cannot be detected; you are just like everybody else. (…) Don't choose between opposites; remain in the middle. Because if you choose one polarity, you become unbalanced – and imbalance is neurosis. Then you become addicted to one pole, and life is a rhythm between polarities; it needs the other pole. Don't choose; don't cling! (…) simply move between the polarities, because you are neither. You are just in the middle; you are the rhythm. Sound and silence are both me; life and death are both me; inhalation and exhalation are both me. (…) Opposites are needed; they balance each other. (…) Polarities are playing a game in which they appear to be opposites, but deep down, they are one. (…) Life is a river, and mind tries to flow with one bank – that is the neurosis. (…) The higher the peak, the deeper the valley will be. (…) The valley has to be deep to the same extent as the peak has gone high. (…) Everything has gone wrong because you only want high moments. (…) Enjoy the peak while it lasts, and then enjoy the valley when it comes. What is wrong with the valley? (…) It is a relaxation, and nobody can exist continuously in an excitement – you will go completely mad. (…) You have to balance yourself. (…) All problems drop when you are balanced; (…) problems simply disappear when we are balanced. Problems are just symbolic indications; they are not the real disease. The real disease is imbalance. (…) Mind is a movement between extremes. It is a travel, a continuous movement between two. In the middle, mind simply disappears, because movement disappears. When there is no movement, you are a being for the first time; you are in a state of being. Everything stops, time, space – everything has disappeared. It doesn't mean that you stop functioning. (…) You can go to the right and to the left, retaining yourself in the middle. That's why I call it the greatest art to be in the middle. (…) You move in the middle; you always make a balance – sometimes you go to this bank; sometimes you go to that bank. Sometimes you lean to the left, and sometimes to the right – but you lean to the left just to be in the middle; you lean to the right just to be in the middle. Become like a tightrope walker, for such is life – just a tightrope walk.

Life is always changing; nothing is static. And whatsoever you know will not be of much help. You have to look at the situation, the whole situation. And if your response to it is with a perfect awareness, it is right; then you'll never repent for it. And then you grow through it; you become more aware. Awareness has no past; awareness has no future; awareness has only this: here-now. (…) You never decide beforehand; you are never prepared – anybody who is prepared is wrong. In life, there are no rehearsals – (…) you move unprepared. (…) This is the preparation – move unprepared. Move, and let things happen; you just be aware and let things decide themselves. And I tell you, when you are aware, everything fits; suddenly, everything falls into a cosmos, not a chaos.

The real can be known only through the false, so the ego is a must. One has to pass through it; it is a discipline. The real can be known only through illusion; you cannot know truth directly. First you have to know that which is not true; first you have to encounter the untrue. Through that encounter, you become capable of knowing the truth. If you know the false as the false, truth will dawn upon you.

Society teaches you morality, and morality means giving you an ego which will fit with society. If you are immoral, you will always be a misfit somewhere or other. (…) If the society approves, everything is good. One man kills somebody; he is a murderer. The same man in wartime kills thousands, and he becomes a great hero. The society is not bothered by the murder, but the murder should be committed for the society – then it is okay. The society doesn't bother about morality; morality means only that you should fit with the society. (…) Morality changes; morality is social politics; morality is diplomacy. And each child has to be brought up in such a way that he fits into the society, that's all. Because society is interested in efficient members; society is not interested that you should attain self-knowledge. Society is always against religion; hence the crucifixion of Jesus, the murder of Socrates. (…) One who is committed to God doesn't bother. He has a different depth of morality. It doesn't come from codes; it comes from self-knowledge. (…) Whenever a Jesus or a Buddha happens, he doesn't bother about the man-made conventions. He has a greater commitment; he is involved with the Whole. Each moment he decides his response through his awareness, not through conditioning; so nobody knows about him, about what he will do. He is unpredictable. (…) Societies can forgive criminals, but they cannot forgive a Jesus or a Socrates; that's impossible. (…) The moment the society becomes aware, it kills them immediately, because if you listen to them, there is danger; if you listen to them, they will convert you – you cannot convert them. (…) Just their existence is too much; they have to be murdered. (…) You cannot find a more dangerous man than a religious man, a more rebellious man than a religious man, a more revolutionary man than a religious man – because his revolution is so absolute that there is no possibility of compromise with him. And because he knows what he is doing, he is so absolutely certain that you cannot convert him. And he is infectious – if he is there, he will spread like a disease; he will infect many people.

That is the difference between a sect and a religion: religion is never part of any society. The Pope of the Vatican is part of society; Jesus never was. (…) Jesus had to be killed. Christianity can be accepted, but not Christ. What is Christianity? Christianity is society's effort to replace Christ. (…) Christianity is a social phenomenon, social politics. The Church is okay; the priest is okay – but the prophet is dangerous. (…) Christianity is politics; Hinduism is politics; Buddhism is politics. Buddha, Jesus, Krishna, they are not social at all. They are not social, they are not anti-social – they are beyond society.

The ego is not individual. Ego is a social phenomenon; it is society, not you. (…) The society creates an ego, because the ego can be controlled and manipulated. The self can never be controlled and manipulated, not possible. (…) The society gives a center to the child, and the child is by and by convinced that this is his center, the ego that society gives. (…) So you have two centers. One center you come with, which is given by existence itself – that is the self. And the other center, which is created by the society, the ego – it is a false thing, and it is a very great trick. Through the ego, society is controlling you. You have to behave in a certain way, because only then does society appreciate you. You have to walk in a certain way; you have to laugh in a certain way; you have to follow certain manners, a morality, a code. Only then will society appreciate you, and if it doesn't, your ego will be shaken. And when the ego is shaken, you don't know where you are, who you are. (…) The idea of the ego has to be thrown; others have given you the idea. (…) And unless you throw it, you will never be able to attain to the self. Because you are addicted to the center, you cannot move, and you cannot look at the self. And remember, there is going to be an interim period, an interval, when the ego will be shattered, when you will not know who you are, when you will not know where you are going, when all boundaries will melt. You will be simply confused, a chaos. Because of this chaos, you are afraid to lose the ego. But it has to be so; one has to pass through the chaos before one attains to the real center. And if you are daring, the period will be small. If you are afraid, and you again fall back to the ego, and you again start arranging it, then it can be very, very long; many lives can be wasted. (…) One has to be daring, courageous; one has to take a step into the unknown. For a while, you will feel dizzy; for a while, you will feel very afraid and shaken, as if an earthquake has happened. But if you are courageous and you don't go backwards, if you go on and on, and you don't fall back into the ego, then there is a hidden center within you that you have been carrying for many lives. That is your soul, the atma, the self. Once you come near it, everything changes, everything settles again. (…) a new order arises, but this is no longer the order of society; it is the very order of existence itself. It is what Buddha calls dhamma, Lao Tzu calls Tao, Heraclitus calls logos. Then everything is beautiful for the very first time, because man-made things cannot be beautiful. (…) You can decorate them, but they can never be beautiful.

Ego is always shaken, always in search of food, that somebody should appreciate it. That's why you continuously ask for attention. (…) if nobody is paying any attention to you, nobody thinks you are somebody important, significant, then how will you feed your ego? Others' attention is needed – and in million ways, you try to attract the attention of others. (…) This is a deep begging. A beggar is one who asks for and demands attention; and an emperor is one who lives in himself, who has a center of his own, who doesn't depend on anybody else. Buddha sitting under his Bodhi Tree… if the whole world suddenly disappears, will it make a difference to the Buddha? None; it will not make any difference at all. If the whole world disappears, it will not make any difference, because he has attained to the center.

If the wife leaves you – you are shattered; you start thinking about suicide. Why? (…) Because you don't have a center of your own; the wife was giving you the center. (…) Try to understand this: ego is a deep slavery. Ego has to be a slave; it depends on others – and only a person who has no ego is for the first time a Master.

A man who attains to the self is never in any clash. Others may come and clash with him, but he is never in clash with anybody. (…) You can clash with an enlightened man, but that is your problem, not his.

Only someone who has no problems of his own can help you. Only then is there clarity to see, to see through you. A mind that has no problems can see you; you become transparent. A mind that has no problems can see through itself; that's why it becomes capable of seeing through others. In the West, there are many schools of psychoanalysis, many schools, and no help is reaching people, but rather, harm – because the people who are helping others, or trying to help, are in the same boat.

When you are mature enough through understanding, awareness, and you have felt totally that the ego is the cause of all your misery, simply one day you see the dead leaf dropping. It settles into the ground, dies of its own accord. You have not done anything, so you cannot claim that you have dropped it. You see that it has simply disappeared, and then, the real center arises. And that real center is the soul, the self, God, truth, or whatsoever you want to call it.

A rich man need not declare that he is rich; a poor man always declares. The richer you grow, the less declaration there is. Have you observed it in life? Everywhere it happens.

You cannot approach an individual by a general theory; it will not suit. Every individual needs a direct approach.

Remember one criterion: whatsoever disappears through awareness is illusory; and whatsoever remains through awareness, not only remains, but becomes more crystallized, is real. Make it a criterion; consciousness is the touchstone.

That awareness in which self-consciousness is not, is egoless. And that awareness has a grace, a beauty, that don't belong to this world.

Only those who have come to an inner harmony with nature are victorious. Now there is no fight, because how can the part fight the Whole? And how can the part be victorious against the Whole? It is absurd – but a young man has to try. An old man reaches to total acceptance.

A Master speaks; his words come from his inner silence. You speak; your words come from your inner madness. (…) Your talking is a catharsis; it is a cleansing. But why clean yourself on others? If you want to clean yourself, clean yourself alone. Close your doors and talk to yourself as much as you like. (…) Do it alone, and soon you will realize what you have been doing your whole life. (…) Alone, you will become aware; but when you do it with others, you will never become aware of what nonsense you are doing.

Be silent; first attain to silence.

You are self-conscious, but not conscious of yourself. (…) When you are self-conscious, you are two, because then you exist at the periphery. (…) At the periphery, everything is divided, and not only divided, but in conflict. (…) When you exist at your center, you are one; the energy is undivided. (…) If you are fighting with yourself, there is no victory, there is no defeat. But one thing is certain – if you go on fighting with yourself, you are dissipating energy. (…) It is suicidal; you are destroying yourself. (…) When you are one, you become a creator; when you are many, you become suicidal – you destroy yourself.

Remember this paradox: the more you go inwards, the less of the outer there is. When you really reach to the innermost, inner and outer disappear. Then you are nothing, and everything.

Domination is not a good state of affairs. The one who dominates will be thrown sooner or later – the oppressors will become the oppressed; and the oppressed will become the oppressors. It is just a fight between your left and right hand, and the whole game is a pretense.

Bliss doesn't mean happiness; bliss means the absence of both happiness and unhappiness. Happiness will be disturbed by unhappiness; unhappiness will be disturbed by happiness – they are both polarities; the wheel is moving. Bliss is never disturbed; it is silence, peace, tranquility. You have come to understand; now nothing disturbs. Now you move in the world with no-mind; you move in the world with no projection. And then, everything is beautiful.

Understanding is like fire: it burns you completely; you as you are right now – the ego, the mind. It gives you a different dimension.

If you have really known what life is, who bothers about death?

One has to feel oneself, one has to feel how one is made, and never follow anything else. First just feel yourself, and there are only two possibilities: either you can live a life of spontaneity, or you can live a life of discipline. Both are good, because the basic thing is to become alert and aware.

If you feel that something is left out of your love, that means you are stuck. Your lovingness should spread to the whole existence. As your meditation goes higher, your lower qualities will start dropping; you cannot manage both. (…) Your behavior pattern will change with your inner consciousness change. (…)

Whatsoever happens around does not matter; you remain centered, rooted, grounded in your being – you have become the center of the cyclone. And you will know when you have become the center of the cyclone; (…) you will simply know.

Sensitivity is one of the qualities that develops in you with witnessing. (…) Witnessing becomes your very base of transformation. The more you see your mind, the more you witness it, the less you will find it. It needs unconsciousness to be there; it is an animal that exists only in darkness. As you bring in the light, the mind with its thoughts starts disappearing. And it is the thickness of thoughts that makes you insensitive. When there are no thoughts and you are simply a witness, just a mirror, then your sensitivity is infinite; then anything that comes in front of you is reflected totally.

As you become more and more sensitive, you will have an understanding of people which you never had before. (…) It is true that a man can be known by his friends, by the company he keeps. It is absolutely true, because you cannot keep company which is not in tune with your inner being.

The mind is a chattering box; you cannot stop it. The very effort to stop it gives it more nourishment to go on. (…) the desire to stop it is also part of it; it is not beyond it. One side of the mind is desiring the other side of the mind to become silent – this is not possible. The only way few people have been able to stop it, without making an effort to stop it, are the people who have disidentified themselves with the mind. (…) One simply watches it; (…) you simply become a watcher. Let the traffic of thoughts move; there is nothing to be worried about. (…) These thoughts are only soap bubbles; don't take them seriously. Don't become tense while watching them; be relaxed. (…) It is one of the secrets of inner life that, as your watcher becomes more and more strong, the thoughts become less and less. It is exactly in proportion. When there are hundred percent thoughts in the mind, you have zero watcher. When you have ten percent consciousness involved in watching, ten percent of your thoughts will disappear – because it is the same energy which creates thoughts, that creates the watcher. When you are hundred percent a watcher, a pure witness, a mirror, all thoughts disappear. You cannot stop them, but you can manage a situation, a device in which they get stopped. They simply disappear. And in such a state, when you are aware and alert, fully conscious and watchful, without thoughts, your whole consciousness for the first time in your life returns back on itself, becomes aware of awareness. You become conscious of consciousness. In the silence, when the chattering mind is no more there, one realizes oneself. Unless the mind is silent, you cannot realize yourself. You will remain involved with the thoughts, and those thoughts are meaningless – memories, fragments of memories, imagination, dreams, daydreams, all mixed up; it is a chaos.

Whatever your parents, your teachers, your churches, your priests have done – you have to undo it. (…) the first and foremost thing is to get unburdened of the bondage. (…) To understand what is programmed, what is borrowed in you, what has been forced upon you, is to understand what is false in you. This very awareness is enough. (…) the moment you see the falsity of something, you will drop it. To know that something is false and borrowed is enough to drop it. And once you have dropped all that is borrowed in you, you are again innocent, a tabula rasa, a clean sheet on which nothing is written. (…) This is the most essential freedom; all other freedoms are so-so.

One of Jean-Paul Sartre's books has the name 'No exit' ('Huis clos'), and the book describes hell. It is not the old hell, where you are burnt into fire and you are cut into pieces and tortured. No, there is nothing of it. It is a contemporary hell, and the only hellish thing is that there is no exit. People are sitting in a room. They don't know why. They don't know how long they have to sit there. They don't have any way to go out. They are bored with each other's faces. They have talked everything they knew about. Everything is finished; all communication is dropped. They are in a state of getting mad. And that is the situation of the wealthy man in the West. (…) This is the moment, if the man has courage enough to move out of the mob mind and takes the responsibility of freedom and searches for truth, searches for Masters who can help, he will become a new man, rather than becoming a madman.

I love my disciples, but my love does not include emotions or sentiments. In fact, emotions and sentiments bring the quality of love far lower; they are a sacrilege.

This is the most important thing about life-problems to understand: they are created by your unclarity of vision. So it is not that first you see them clearly, then you find the solution, and then you try to apply the solution. No, the process is not that long; the process is very simple and short. The moment you can see your life-problem clearly, it dissolves. (…) The problem existed in your unclarity of vision; you were its creator. (…) If you are clear, if you can see clearly, the problem will disappear. (…) Just seeing, just watching its whole process – how the problem arises, how it takes possession of you, how you become completely clouded by it, blinded by it, and how you start acting madly, for which you repent later on: 'I never wanted to do it, still I did it'. The very idea of being possessed by ghosts and spirits is nothing but a very ancient symbolical way of saying what I am saying to you. A man possessed by a ghost has nothing to do with any ghost; it is his own unconscious mind – (…) and his conscious mind is so small that the unconscious takes it over.

Even in a communist country, consciousness cannot be prevented from growing, from spreading; love cannot be prevented. In communist countries, they can nationalize your house, your money, your other commodities, but they cannot nationalize your being. That is everywhere just the same; it makes no difference. And to bring the consciousness to its highest peak, any place is as good as any other place. The question is basically the individual's decision.

I love to disturb people, because only by disturbing them can I make them think. They have stopped thinking for centuries. Nobody has been there to disturb them; people have been consoling them. I am not going to console anybody, because the more you console them, the more retarded they remain. Disturb them, shock them, hit them hard, give them a challenge. That challenge will bring their capacities to the climax.

I have never followed anybody, and I never allowed anybody to follow me. These are my fellow travelers; my sannyasins are not my followers; they are my friends.

Only an ordinary man can become certain, clear. The extraordinary man is too much burdened with his ego, with his knowledge, with his schizophrenic mind, with all kinds of arguments.

We are life-oriented; we love to enjoy everything.

It seems to me that a person who remains consistent his whole life must be an idiot. A growing person has to contradict himself many times, because who knows what tomorrow brings? Tomorrow may cancel this day completely. And I am ready to go with life with no hesitation.

Your service is not compassion; your service is your greed for heaven.

I have not made the commune. I started on the way alone. People started coming to me, and it became a vast caravan which is now spread all over the world. And people are still coming. I have not made it; it has happened. It was not a planned thing, not something considered. I don't have any discipline, any rules, any regulations. Somebody coming and becoming a fellow traveler is welcome. If he leaves at some crossroads, we say goodbye to him with the same joy, ecstasy, as we had when he joined us. And we tell him, "Whenever you want, the doors will always be open for you". But I have not made the commune. Certainly, when five thousand people are living here, so many arrangements have to be made; but all that credit goes to the sannyasins. I have nothing to do with it.

God is a belief; heaven is a belief; hell is a belief. The reason why you believe in these things is within your psychology; the priest is only exploiting.

I wanted to fight with everyone, from the primary school to the university. And I wanted to know if all these knowledgeable people have something in them, or if it is all borrowed. And I found that all they had was borrowed; not a single teacher or professor had any experience of his own.

After the experience of enlightenment, there is no question in you. So for twenty-one years, I was continuously questioning people, and after that day, I have been continuously answering people. I don't have any questions.

For me, it makes no difference where I live. Wherever I am, I never go out. Rajneeshpuram may be in the Soviet Union, or in America, or in India. It does not matter to me; I don't know who is living outside.

I am talking in all the dimensions. A man can be reached in many ways, and economics is not excluded. He can be reached in music; he can be reached in poetry; he can be reached in wealth. All need a certain kind of intelligence to create; and when I say I am a rich man's guru, I mean that I am the Master of all those who are creators in any dimension of life. Of course, the poor man cannot create; he cannot even manage his physical survival. You cannot expect him to understand Van Gogh, or the theory of relativity, or Bertrand Russell. And if he cannot understand Bertrand Russell, he cannot understand me. (…) So, naturally, it is difficult for the poor people. You cannot hope that Ethiopians will come to meditate here; nor am I going there to teach them meditation. Their need is different, and I fulfill the needs of those who are hungry for something higher than bread and butter.

God is just a projection of the ego. As ego is false and a substitute for a true self, God is the ego of the whole world, a substitute self, because our egos cannot exist without support – and God gives immense support.

The person who is asleep needs colorful dreams, changes – every night, marriage, divorce, job change. The asleep person becomes bored very easily, for the simple reason that his joy is derived from something outside; it is not coming from his own inner source. I have never been bored since I came to know myself. I have been trying in every possible way, but I don't get bored, doing the same thing round the clock for years – because there is no comparison with the past; there is no comparison with the future. Boredom needs comparison. (…) It depends on how conscious you are to make the world new every moment. (…) It is only to a sleeping man that the tree is always the same; to the awakened man, it is new every moment.

Your sleep is very deep; it is no ordinary sleep – it is spiritual sleep. You need people who can shock you and break all your shock absorbers. Every person has grown buffers around his sleep. Even if a shock is given, the buffers absorb it – it never reaches to the person. The real function of a religious man is to teach you how to break the buffers, how to come out of the shell of darkness in which you have been living for many lives. No prayer is going to help; only a Master can help you – a craftsman who has broken his own buffers, who has somehow sneaked out of the shell of sleep. That is the function of a Master. But all the so-called religious leaders go on putting more buffers on you. (…) These leaders who are helping people, comforting people, consoling people, are making their buffers thicker and thicker; they are just worthless and dangerous to people's spirituality. (…) You need a Gurdjieff; you need a Krishnamurti – not a Billy Graham. (…) Billy Graham is good entertainment, with nothing spiritual in it. (…) Billy Graham is simply a good salesman amongst sleepers. And, of course, sleepers will be very much impressed – this man is giving them what they want. When you come to a person like Gurdjieff, he is not going to give you what you want; he is going to give you what really is your need, because the wanting comes from your sleep, and your need comes from your real being. So, a man like Gurdjieff will not have gatherings like Billy Graham; he will shock you so much that you will never come near him again.

I never hit anybody who does not want to be hit. That's why I never go anywhere – you have to come to me, because otherwise, that is against the freedom of the individual. If he wants to sleep, it is his decision, and he is completely free to sleep. (…) who am I to create disturbance?

I care out of my compassion. It comes with cosmic consciousness itself. It is a quality of cosmic consciousness; you cannot separate it.

I love mankind, but the way they are, they need immense changes. Because I propose those changes, they become hostile. They think I am taking away very precious things from them. I am taking away only their chains, but they have been in those chains for centuries. They have already accepted them as ornaments, so my compassion and my love and my concern only create hostility in them. (…) That is the situation of humanity, so many chains: God, heaven, hell, Christianity, Hinduism, Mohammedanism, Buddhism, communism. All kinds of chains are there – political, social, psychological, spiritual. And I am speaking against them all; I want to cut them all. Naturally, they feel offended. They cannot understand me, but I can understand them.

I'm available, but I will not even call you to come and drink from my well. The well is there, open, available; so those who are intelligent are going to be caught in my net sooner or later – and I want only the intelligent people. (…) The ordinary masses and the crowds, the cripples and the blind and the sick who go to Billy Graham for some spiritual miracle, they are not my people. (…) I am just here, and if anybody feels thirsty, the well is available; (…) I don't prevent you from drinking from my well. If you don't feel thirsty, it is your business.

Every religious Master has been a showman, and I have defeated them all. (…) It helps their work; it attracts people to them. And those who come close, they know that the showmanship is just on the outside; inside, there is immense work being done.

I am the first religious man who is telling you exactly what is the case. I am exposing myself totally; I am not keeping any secret, no private life. All your religious leaders were somehow cheating, exploiting, deceiving.

The person who wants to know the truth has to be completely deprogrammed. He should not have any belief; he should not have any religion; he should not have any nation; he should not have any race; he should be just a simple human being. From there, with that innocence, like a child, he has to start. (…) Our work is first to destroy whosoever you are – whosoever, without any condition. We destroy you first, dismantle you first, and unless we have deprogrammed you completely, there is no growth possible. We don't teach any growth. Once you are deprogrammed, you start growing on your own accord. (…) First I have to demolish the old building completely; I don't believe in renovation. (…) Our approach is first to deprogram the person completely, and then leave him alone to himself. Don't give him another program. Leave him alone, empty, just a pure nothingness. And out of that nothingness grows everything that existence wanted to grow in that man. We bring the person close to existence, from where he has been taken away. Once we see that you are communing with existence, our work is finished. We don't give you growth; we simply take away all nonsense that is surrounding you and which perhaps you think is growth. Growth comes of its own accord; you just have to be utterly open and vulnerable. (…) I am not a businessman; I am not trying to be respectable. (…) A businessman tries to be respectable, and I have been trying my whole life to be notorious. Unless you understand me, you will not be able to see why I unnecessarily create hostility in people. I am not businessman; I have nothing to sell them. If they are courageous enough to come nearer to me, I am going to burn away their whole personality. I'm going to take their whole skin off their body, and then leave them alone, so they can grow fresh from the very beginning. That growth will not be in any way a credit to me; that growth will be a credit to the person who dared to come, who dared to pass the fire, who dared to risk his life – the whole credit goes to him.

The word monk means one who is capable of being himself, individual, alone, independent. That is the meaning of the monk: alone. (…) Monastery means people living there totally independent, completely free from any strings, and yet they have one thing in common: that they all want to be alone and individuals. This is the common factor that keeps them together.

For many lives, you have been human beings, man or woman. But if we go deeper, you have been animals. If you go still deeper, you have been plants – but that is millions of lives back. The whole physiological, biological evolution stopped at man. This whole growth up to now was horizontal. At this point, man has come to a crossroad. He can go on horizontally, changing man to woman, woman to man, but there is no growth. Now he has to take a vertical route, not horizontal. And that vertical route is my whole effort. Meditation is a way of giving you a vertical route. Then, there is no need to be reborn. (…) Once you are fully alert, aware, conscious, enlightened, then this is your last body, because only bodies can move on the horizontal line. Now you are a soul; you will have to move vertically.

Christians believe in only one birth; Jews believe in only one birth; Mohammedans believe in only one birth. It is only the religions born in India who say that there are thousands of births. It is a long process; seventy years is not enough for a sleeping person to be awakened – he needs more time. They believe it; I know it. (…) But I don't want you to believe it, because for you, it will not be a truth; I would like you to explore. Go back into your past lives, (…) and as you go backwards, you are simply amazed at what kind of person you are and how many forms you have taken before. And this is a great help, to understand that no form has been a contentment to you. From every form you have died in discontent and despair; so now don't miss the chance of moving vertically.

Why do some people suffer from schizophrenia? Because from two different directions, two conditions meet in them; but they cannot mix and become one – they remain two. Sometimes, one is up, and the person behaves in a certain way; (…) another time, the other is up, and the person behaves in a diametrically opposite way. You start thinking he is sick; you take him to the psychiatrist. He is not sick; he is simply suffering because two long traditions have met in him. All that he needs is to be a witness of both the conditionings and separate himself, disidentify himself from both the conditionings, and the whole schizophrenia will disappear. In fact, the moment he disidentifies himself from both the conditions, he will have a richness that you cannot have, because he can use from both the conditions, both the heritages, things which he wants – he is now the master.

I am teaching my people not to argue about truth, because there is no way through argument to reach the truth. Whenever two arguments fight, all that is proved is who was more capable of arguing. Truth is never proved that way; truth has to be experienced. So deny every belief, and deny it absolutely. Not even a lingering shadow of belief should be within you.

Whatever I say to my people is hypothetical, just the way science works. A scientist enters into an experiment with a hypothesis. Hypothesis means not belief, but just that one has to begin somewhere, so for the moment he accepts a certain concept and enters into it with absolute alertness, so that he is not deceived by his own hypothesis. He has to be aware that it is only a hypothesis, and not a truth.

Out of consciousness, many things will be there: celebration of life, love, laughter. Out of it, so many branches, and so many flowers… but the nucleus remains consciousness.

Things go on changing in existence, and a man of consciousness remains in harmony with existence, with the continuous flux of existence. (…) My approach is to go on dying to the past moment continuously, so that you can be alive in the new moment that is coming. Death to the past; life to the present. And the future is going to come to you as present, never as past.

I am the center of my circus, and when I am gone, who bothers what happens to the circus?

The society that exists today is retarded. Its mental age is below thirteen; it is worse than asleep. What do you expect of a seventy-year-old man, carrying a small intelligence of a thirteen-year-old boy? The distance between his intelligence and his life is so big.

The awakened person moves together almost as an organic unity. With his physical age, his mental age goes on growing. With his mental age, his spiritual awareness goes on growing. If a person really goes on growing, simultaneously on all levels of life, then only you have a perfect Master someday.

Every search is a blind gamble. Those who are afraid of blind gambles remain stuck and starve; they never grow. One has to take the risk.; one has to stake everything. And as far as I have known, anybody who has taken the risk has never been a loser. (…) Risk is there, but I know the path. I know that if you are ready to lose your grip, you will be immediately on the clear ground, on the way; you are not going to lose anything. This is the whole function of the Master: (…) not to give you beliefs, not to give you philosophy, (…) but to give you confidence in yourself, to make you a gambler from a businessman.

This is my basic standpoint: not to go out, because that is interfering into somebody's world. I am not a missionary; (…) I don't want anybody to be converted; and I don't want anybody to be convinced that we are right. In fact, the people who try to convince others that they are right are basically, deep down in themselves, not convinced that they are right. Convincing others, they are making an effort to convince themselves. When they see that they have a crowd convinced, they feel at ease.

My concern is with people and their growth. The city is their concern, not my concern. (…) it is up to them, a mundane affair; I don't care about it. I trust them; they will be able to manage, and they are managing. And they will be able to develop it technologically, but it is not my concern at all. (…) My concern is their spiritual growth. They should be deprogrammed from all past; (…) their intelligence should come to its highest peak.

Your psychologist, even the founders – Sigmund Freud, Carl Gustav Jung, Adler, Assagioli – even they knew nothing about themselves, so how can they help you to know yourself? (…) They can't help themselves; (…) the suicide rate of psychologists is double that of average human beings. (1980) (…) and the same is the situation with madness. (…) And the same is the proportion of all kinds of perverted acts.

Only the individual exists. Societies are just names; collectivities are all names. The reality is only of the individual.

My approach is that man is both together, material and spiritual. This existence is not split into matter and spirit. The existence is one organic unity, just as your soul and your body are an organic unity. Your soul cannot exist without your body, and your body cannot be alive without the soul. I am destroying the whole idea of the separation, of a split between matter and mind, body and soul, materialism and spiritualism. I call myself Zorba the Buddha; (…) my effort is that Zorba and Buddha have to be bridged. (…) Buddha means the Awakend One, it is a quality; (…) and Zorba represents the materialist life in all its luxuries.

Nobody is going to succeed me, (…) because all the religions who have followed those lines have turned poisonous, have turned into curses for humanity. I don't want to be a curse to humanity; I am a blessing, and I want to remain a blessing. And my message for my people is that the moment I am gone, your religion is gone. Then whatever remains is just a corpse; don't start worshipping the corpse. I am a free man, and I want every sannyasin to be a free man. My love is the only binding force between my sannyasins; otherwise, there is no theology, no belief system, no agreement on anything. Only one thing is keeping them together around the world, and that is their love for me. When I am not there, nothing can keep them together; there is no bridge. Each sannyasin is individually connected to me. (…) The moment I am dead and gone, there is no point in making a church, popes, successors – because they have done so much harm; I will not allow my people to do that. When I am gone, then my sannyasins disperse. (…) My love was keeping you together, and I am no more there. And it is good that I am no more, because now, your last attachment is also dropped. I was the last attachment to be broken; now you are totally free. You were free from your family, from your nation, from your religion, but a small, thin thread of love was binding you with me. Now I am no more; I give you the last, the final taste of freedom. And then, whatever happens, happens; I am not responsible for it – I never think about the future; (…) I don't think about what is going to happen tomorrow. (…) My concern is purely with the individual, and then it is up to him. Whatsoever he wants to make out of it, he will make out of it. I trust in my love, and I trust in the dignity of the individual that is sitting before me, and the trust will take care of everything. I never think of tomorrow.

I am not responsible for anybody; I am not even a member of this commune. (…) I can do anything I want, and my sannyasins can do anything they want. (…) It is their freedom. Out of freedom, they have become sannyasins; out of freedom, they can become non-sannyasins – (…) they can be here; or they can leave. There is no problem; it is not a church, and it is not some contract which has always existed between the leader and the follower, the Master and the disciple. But this delicate thing is rarely understood, that they both become dependent on each other.

Celibacy is unnatural unless you are impotent; and I don't think any impotent person has ever become enlightened. (…) In fact, just the opposite is the case. The people who became enlightened were really too much sexual – that's why I call them Zorbas; they were so much sexual that finally they understood that there is nothing much in it. They experienced it through and through, and found nothing in it. And that was the point from where they started searching for something else; that led them towards Buddhahood, enlightenment. (…) Only an enlightened person can make love, because it is no more his need. He can be without it for years, and not even for a single moment will he feel its need. But he can enjoy it as fun. (…) I can make love; (…) it does not disturb my enlightenment. My enlightenment is not made of such a fragile matter; it cannot be disturbed by anything. In fact, people have been asking me whether enlightened people transcend sex, and I have sent the answer to them that the enlightened person finally transcends enlightenment, too.

Women's liberation is automatically men's liberation; women's slavery is automatically men's slavery – they go together. (…) It is natural, because if you repress their energy, somehow they are going to revolt against it. (…) the woman has her own ways of taking revenge, (…) and every woman has been taking it for centuries. She will be nagging the husband; she will be spying on the husband – she will make the husband just a henpecked person. All husbands are henpecked! I have never come across another category. Outside, they may roar like lions, but that is not to be believed.

The male ego functions in this way: unless it makes somebody feel inferior, it is not satisfied. The woman functions in a different way: unless she feels somebody needing her, desiring her, she feels frustrated. A man's need seems to be to dominate; and the woman's need seems to be to be needed. (…) The male psychology is to go after the woman; (…) the woman's psychology is to escape, but to remain receptive – she never escapes too much. She always remains within the boundary, so that the man can catch hold of her, but she lures by running away.

The vested interests have kept man almost drugged. (…) It is so difficult to find an individual who is clean, completely clean, (…) unburdened of the past, unburdened of any guilt, unburdened of fear and greed, unburdened of politicians and priests – just clean, so clean that he becomes a mirror.

I speak to help you to be silent. I say something so that you can go beyond words; I use words to help you to go into wordlessness.

Everything I do is a certain device. (…) I am involved in some great alchemical work of transforming people from their sleep into enlightened souls, and I have to try every kind of device possible. (…) Everything that I say or do is part, organic part, of my whole work. And my work is to bring go people awakening on as big a scale as possible, as it has never happened before.

I say, if you don't share your bliss, it will go stale. It will start stinking very soon; it will die. You have to share it to keep it alive, flowing, increasing, expanding.

If bliss, ecstasy, joy, were all available, like water, for free – nobody will be able to appreciate their value. (…) Anything that is just given away is never taken by anybody. The higher the cost, the better people will keep it, save it in their treasuries. Give it free, and it has no value, because people don't understand value unless it has a price. They understand price; they don't understand value. (…) The world understands things in its own way. Otherwise, my bliss is freely available to anybody who can appreciate it, who is vulnerable to it, who is open to receive it. There is no price tag on it. But those who cannot understand anything unless they pay for it – for those poor people, we have to put a price on everything. Call it compassion.

Buddha is half of the truth; and Zorba is half of the truth. (…) And remember one thing, truth can only be the Whole. (…) Now it is time for Zorba the Buddha to appear. (…) Nothing has to be sacrificed, and everything has to be experienced.

I have never said that I am an honest person. I have never claimed that I always speak the truth. (…) I have never said that I never lie. If a lie is helpful, I am the first person to lie immediately. Truth is not a value to me; (…) I don't have any problem in accepting the truth that I lie. The whole question is: what helps to wake you up?

Anybody who joins with me, joins on his own responsibility; anybody who leaves me, leaves on his own responsibility. (…) I don't take anybody's responsibility, and I don't promise you any hope. (…) It is your own making; I am not a party to it. (…) With me, only people who have tremendous intelligence can stay.

I am for the individual's total freedom, death included.

I am not going to write a will that somebody should be my successor. There is no need. I give freedom; I don't give bondage, like the Catholic church. (…) My approach is very simple: while I am here, I will sing my song, I will have my dance; and when I am gone, I am gone.

Most people die unconsciously; before death, they become unconscious, so they never know it. My people are learning meditation; there is no need for them to be specially prepared for death. I am preparing them for life, and in that very preparation, they are getting ready for death. (…) The whole life is a preparation for death. (…) The whole life you have to prepare; then only, in death you may be able to retain consciousness. (…) The whole life you need to prepare, and then death is the climax of life; then it is not the end of life, but the climax of life. (…) Death is not the end of life – it is the culmination of life; it is one of the most beautiful experiences. If you have really loved, then only will you experience the beauty of death; (…) if you missed life itself, you will die in a coma. Before death comes, you will become unconscious; so you will miss the experience of death. The people who are living consciously, living consciously every moment, can die consciously. (…) So live today with intensity, with totality, with as much consciousness as possible.

Belief covers ignorance. (…) Belief is always for the ignorant; faith is always for those who are not courageous enough to enquire. I teach doubt; I teach skepticism; I teach enquiry. And a person has to remain in the state of not knowing until he comes to know.

In existence, nothing is ever completed; only in novels, stories begin and end. In life, there is no beginning, and there is no end. Abruptly things start, and abruptly things finish. There is no preface, there is no appendix, there are no footnotes, nothing.

Life is really hilarious; you just have to know how to love it.

The answer is within you; nobody can supply it. And all the priests, prophets and messiahs have been doing just that: they are supplying you the answer. And a borrowed answer is not going to help. Those borrowed answers have made the whole humanity miserable; they have taken the enquiry away from the people and left them utterly poor.

My people are multidimensionally rich.

Life is absurd; to search for meaning in it is going to be frustrating. That's why the West has come to a certain philosophy of existentialism, which talks only about meaninglessness. (…) So I am not giving a philosophy to people; I am giving a device for them to discover the ultimate silence of existence.

There is no punishment in existence and no reward. Each action has its consequence; it depends on you what you want to call it. (…) Religions bring the idea of punishment and reward, and through that, they bring heaven and hell and the whole theology – that you are a sinner, that you are a saint. To me, there are only people – neither sinners, nor saints.

One thing – the rich are rich because they know how to exploit. The poor are poor because they are not intelligent enough, and not allowed to be intelligent enough so that they are not exploited. Second – the poor go on increasing the population of their own; the rich don't increase their population.

The first thing you have to understand is the difference between facts and the truth. Ordinary history takes care about the facts – what actually happens in the world of matter, the incidents. It does not take care about the truth, because truth does not happen in the world of matter; it happens in consciousness. And man is not yet mature enough to take care of the events of consciousness. (…) he is not mature enough, not insightful enough, to take notice of what happens beyond time and space, beyond mind, of what happens in consciousness.

The pilgrimage of consciousness is endless. So what was happening in the consciousness, in the body, will go on happening outside the body. That is a simple understanding.

One never comes again to the same. Things come and go, but it is never the same. The first remembrance is for all those who have known and remained silent. The first respect is not for words, but for the sheer achievement of one's self. It does not matter whether one serves others or not; that is secondary, not primary. The primary is that one has achieved one's self, and it is so difficult in this world to know one's self. The Jains call the person arihanta who has attained to himself and is so drowned, so drunk in the beatitude of his realization that he has forgotten the whole world. The word arihanta literally means "one who has killed the enemy"; and the enemy is the ego. (…) The arihanta never looks back, never bothers about any kind of service. (…) The siddha once in a while holds out his hand to drowning humanity, but only once in awhile, not always. It is not a necessity; it is not compulsory. It is his choice; he may or he may not. (…) The Masters, the uvajhaya, have achieved the same, but they face the world; they serve the world; they are in the world, but not of it. (…) The Master has known, and imparts what he has known. The teacher has received from one who has known, and delivers it intact to the world, but he himself has not known.

Children have been exploited for centuries, just because they are willing to trust. You can lie to them very easily, and they will trust you. If you are a father, a mother, they will think you are bound to be true. That's how the whole of humanity lives in corruption, in a very slippery, thick mud of lies told to children for centuries.

In polite society, nobody ever asks a real question, and the question of suicide is the most real of all.

I am not against the idea of ending life. If one decides to end it, then of course, it is his right. But I am certainly against making it a long torture.

The so-called mahatmas and saints are all cowards. I have never come across a single mahatma – Hindu, Mohammedan, Christian, Buddhist – who can be said to be really a rebellious spirit. Unless one is rebellious, one is not religious; rebellion is the very foundation of religion.

I have been looking for the door to enlightenment as long as I can remember, from my very childhood. I must have carried that idea from my past life, because I don't remember a single day in my childhood in this life that I was not looking for it. Naturally, I was thought crazy by everybody. (…) And as far as I was concerned, as I grew, I started looking at the whole world as crazy. (…) My interest has remained the same: to know what is the ultimate truth, what is the meaning of life, why I am here and not anyone else. And I was determined that unless I find the answer, I am not going to rest, and I am not going to let anybody around me rest, either.

In the last year, when I was twenty-one, it was a time of nervous breakdown and breakthrough. (…) That one year was tremendous. I was surrounded with nothingness, emptiness; I had lost all contact with the world. (…) In my own home, I had become almost absent. (…) My whole concern was to go deeper and deeper into myself. And the door was so magnetic, the pull was so immense – like what physicists now call black holes. (…) the black hole is just a womb – the old disappears into it, and the new is born. (…) to everybody else during that one year, I was mad. But to me, that madness became meditation, and the peak of that madness opened the door.

Man has created a world of nouns, and he has become encaged in his own world. He has forgotten the world of the trees, the world of the rivers, the world of the mountains and the stars.

In the East, we have been watching the death experience of people. How you die reflects your whole life, how you lived. If I can see just your death, I can write your whole biography, because in that one moment, your whole life becomes condensed; in that one moment, like a lightning bolt, you show everything. A miserly person will die with clenched fists, still holding and clinging, still trying not to die, still trying not to relax. A loving person will die with open hands, sharing, even sharing his death, as he has shared his life. You can see everything written on the face, whether this man has lived his life fully aware, alert. If he has, then on his face there will be a light shining; around his body, there will be an aura. You come close to him, and you will feel silent – not sad, but silent. It even happens that if a person has died blissfully, you will feel suddenly happy near him. (…) When you die, you release your energy, and with that energy, your whole life's experience. Whatsoever you have been – sad, happy, loving, angry, passionate, compassionate – whatsoever you have been, that energy carries the vibrations of your whole life. Whenever a saint is dying, just being near him is a great gift; just to be showered with his energy is a great inspiration. You will be put in a totally different dimension. You will be drugged by his energy; you will feel drunk. Death can be a total fulfillment, but that is possible only if life has been lived.

If you accept death, a distance is created. Life moves far away with all its worries, irritations, everything. (…) Once you accept death, (…) if you can meditate and accept that it is coming, (…) you become aware that something deathless is there.

Getting married to emptiness, getting married to nothingness – this is the marriage for which all the great saints have been searching. This is the moment when you become a bride of Christ, or a gopi of Krishna. Everything disappears, (…) the path, (…) even the footprints.

Mind is ambitious – ambitious for money, for power, for prestige. And then, one day, when it gets fed up with all these extrovert activities, it becomes ambitious for enlightenment, for liberation, for nirvana, for God. The same ambition has come back; only the object has changed. First the object was outside; now it is inside. But your attitude, your approach, has not changed; you are the same person in the same rut, in the same routine.

Enlightenment happens in silence. How can you bring that silence into words? (…) whatsoever you do, the words are going to destroy something of that silence. Lao Tzu says: 'The moment truth is asserted, it becomes false'. There is no way to communicate truth. But language has to be used; there is no other way. So we always have to use the language with the condition that it cannot be adequate to experience.

For many lives, I had been working, working upon myself, struggling, doing whatsoever can be done – and nothing was happening. Now I understand why nothing was happening. The very effort was the barrier, the very ladder was preventing, the very urge to seek was the obstacle. Not that one can reach without seeking; seeking is needed – but then comes a point when seeking has to be dropped. The boat is needed to cross the river, but then comes a moment when you have to get out of the boat and forget all about it and leave it behind. Effort is needed; without effort, nothing is possible. And also, with only effort, nothing is possible. (…) The day effort ceased, I also ceased – because you cannot exist without effort, and you cannot exist without desire, and you cannot exist without striving. The phenomenon of the ego, of the self, is not a thing; it is a process – (…) you have to create it each moment. It is like pedaling a bicycle: if you pedal, it goes on and on; if you don't pedal, it stops. It may go on a little because of the momentum, but the moment you stop pedaling, in fact, the bicycle starts stopping. It has no more energy, no more power to go anywhere; it is going to fall and collapse. The ego exists because we go on pedaling desire, because we go on striving to get something, because we go on jumping ahead of ourselves. That is the very phenomenon of the ego – the jump ahead of yourself, the jump into the future, the jump into the tomorrow. (…) If you are in the present, the ego is a mirage; its starts disappearing.

You cannot stop desire; you can only understand it. In the very understanding is the stopping of it. Remember, nobody can stop desiring – and the reality happens only when desire stops. (…) The desire has to be understood. You can understand it; you can see the futility of it. A direct perception is needed; an immediate penetration is needed.

When Buddha says, the world is a mirage, the world is unreal, the world is maya, he does not mean that you can pass through the wall. (…) He is saying that there is a reality; once you come to know it, this so-called reality simply pales, simply becomes unreal. With a higher reality in your vision, the comparison arises, not otherwise. In the dream, the dream is real – (…) it is the only reality; (…) there is no comparison. In the morning, when you open your eyes, another reality is there. Now you can say that the dream was all unreal; compared to this reality, the dream becomes unreal. There is an awakening – compared to the reality of that awakening, this whole reality becomes unreal. (…) You create your own dream around you, and unless you become awake, you will continue to dream. The world is unreal because the world that you know is the world of your dreams. When dreams drop and you simply encounter the world that is there, then the real world appears. (…) There are not two things, God and the world. (…) If you have clear eyes, clarity, perceptiveness, then there is only God. (…) The moment you start seeing, only God is. But right now, whatsoever you see is not the truth; it is a projected lie. (…) You are using the real world as a screen, and you are projecting your own ideas on it – that is the meaning of mirage.

I have never been in the body again; I am just hovering around the body. And that's why I say, it has been a tremendous miracle. Each moment I am surprised I am still here; I should not be – I should have left any moment; still I am here. (…) somehow the Whole must be willing me to be here, because I am no longer here with my own strength; I am no longer here on my own. It must be the will of the Whole to keep me here, to allow me to linger a little more on this shore. Maybe the Whole wants to share something with you through me.

Enlightenment is a very individual process. (…) there are no fixed stages through which a person necessarily passes. Every person passes through different phases, because every person in many lives has gathered different kinds of conditionings. So it is not a question of enlightenment; it is a question of the conditionings that will shape your way. And everybody has different conditionings; so no two persons' paths are going to be the same. That's why I insist again and again, there is no superhighway; there are only footpaths, and those too, not ready-made. Not that you find them already there and you have just to walk on them – no. As you walk, you make them; your very walking makes them. (…) that's why there is no possibility of a leader and a follower. (…) To each individual, enlightenment will happen differently. And the same is true after enlightenment – to each individual, the expression of enlightenment will be different.

Enlightenment is nothing but awakening. For the enlightened person, all our lives are just dreams. They may be good dreams; they may be bad dreams; they may be nightmares; they may be very nice and beautiful dreams – but all the same, they are dreams. (…) All the methods that are used are simply somehow to create a situation in which your dream is broken. How much you are attached to the dream will be different from individual to individual. How deep is your sleep will be different from individual to individual. But all methods are just to shake you, so that you can wake up.

I was working alone on myself, with no friends, fellow travelers, no commune. To work alone, one is bound to get into many troubles, because there are moments that can only be called dark nights of the soul. So dark and dangerous, it seems as if you have come to the last breath of your life; this is death, nothing else. That experience is a nervous breakdown.
